this is a fate worse than death, for you instead."Then, why should I believe you or the rumors about the place?You'd just probably get back towards where you'd belong, both of you and."Be tortured.'The helmet paused, there was no mouth for him to talk, though he still needed a moment to drag some air inside through the small gap it had.'Worse than you'll ever get to know in your lifetime, and even if that small fraction of yourself would get to the point of making it there.'A race against time in a dangerous land, the rocks were cold and the weather was anything but fine.The camp was already set, yet she waited there, alone, the biggest of the camps, standing with a tied man, two helmets and outside two guards to prevent any disturbance.'We're finally alone, the three.Hem, four of us.I know you're not sleeping, those breathing patterns of yours are quite unnatural, you know?'Barnabee was surprised yet again at the knowledge she had, the fierceness of her guard.Ever since he has been taken in her possession, not even a second was it dropped or lowered for anyone at all, friend or foe, she played safe.And now, along all.'You've read me.And you're right; I didn't want you to know that I was awake."I feel that there's a need to warn you that, if you make any attempt to the runway, my men will."I've heard it, so there's no need for empty threats, they won't kill me unless they want their world to be damned."Very well, no secrets, right?"No secrets.'The helmets said, breaking their secret vowel of silence that they've silently prayed.'As much as it pains me, I will have to deliver all three of you and feed you to the Silo.Even though, from what I understood, you've kind of deserved it."I did what I wanted and what I needed.No one can look into themselves and tell me otherwise, that they'd not risk everything for their deepest wish, to do that thing I've done, the life I've lived.I thought you'd understand, being a cutthroat and such."Bite your tongue, we're nothing alike.Plus, the thing you've done."Beats even us, right brother?"Spoken truly, as we've always done.'And outside too, their voices were as audible as a whisper to an ear, to their brother, stealthily hidden from their gaze.The camp had no light, it was too dangerous then and at the time, hence they were in the blind, towards both what lay underground and to the pest that lunged around.I'm coming brothers, just wait there and guide me.He thought, and in a whisper he said, and as the same, they both heard it as well, through the rubble and the nuisance of those two bickering at one another.'I'm here, just feet away from the camp.Where have you two gone?'It was a miracle that it was said without being heard.'The main tent, next to the eagle shaped stone.'At which she gave no sign of having the slightest clue.'It won't change anything anyway, you've heard the man.Either you go inside or everyone does.Quite peculiar in a way that the two of you, well, unless you're lying would do us a favor."How is it fair then?I should've have been trialed and judged, if it weren't for a slight mistake, I would've been free now."You would, but you're not.It changed nothing now since you won't have a chance to escape.""Then why not free us then?We can most certainly help."I won't fall that easily for such a pathetic attempt.'Her back was turned, facing all three of them, which turned out to be a mistake.The tent was lifted, as the third knight somehow managed to snick with the back against the eagle rock, coming from behind, lunging at her glimpse.There was no time for Everett to reach the knife hidden around the waist, as it happened too fast, the sword being lifted and the hilt hitting her around the head.An instant second strike thrust her against the ground, unconsciousness with no scream, he waited to see, if anyone from outside would hear the fall.Seconds passed and Barnabee made no sound.Another one of them, just what I needed, though If I attempt to scream I've no doubt that I'll get no chance to escape.'So ma'am, why did you come here, seeing how it wasn't your task to take me to the Silo.'The helmets were silent, all three of them now, though he nodded and expressed himself despite being tied down.Hopefully, I won't get heard, though the metal from which the helmets were made must've been too dense.'Play along.'Oh, yes.I've come here to retrieve all three of you.Though seeing your current situation.'Don't leave us here brother!'I can see it through the visor, that you're thinking about it, even now.'It's true, I must admit, despite having come here to save you two insupportable buffoons, the thought came to mind.'His voice echoes twice, as the legs slowly approached.The rest of their bodies were nowhere around, perhaps even too far to get.'And I need no witnesses to give me away.'Wait, you can't!'Before the other could protest, the sword already came and slashed one in half, leaving a small dust, raise in flames from the ground.Speechless and shocked, he witnesses his brother kill the other, whilst the ashes came to be.Am I next?What can't I talk?Why won't Barnabee?Were the last thoughts it had, the last image of his brother being cut, followed by an upward, arced swipe, the other one had being deceivingly killed too.'Now, Barnabee, you're coming with me.'The whisper came as he approached him.Barnabee could only speculate why none entered by now, the blade must've been muffled, protected from the sound.'Then, how come you've not taken her first?Why did you?Take them?'It only worked on the metal they were made out of, else she would've shouted.You know you could be whispering, right?'If you want them to get suspicious and come inside.'A lock, behind, though he found it as a problem, the moment where the blade would hit the lock, would be the same one they'd rush inside.And they were something to consider.Two of my brothers taken by a small gang, shame, though they must have something hidden up their sleeves.'Do you know where the key is?'Barnabee pointed and her, and alas, his hands were freed.'Follow me and make no sound.I believe you know by know, or perhaps my brother told you, that if you try to run, I will cut your legs and drag you there myself.'So they'd said.'A white lie, though it did not matter anymore, plenty of crimes were committed, another one now as well.He took, half of his brother's helmet, though it made no sense at the time, they came from where he entered and hugged the ground, crawling in the dirt.Too dark to be noticed, twice to see, the metal framework had already a dark twisted image of a smile, as the sword trailed on the ground.Once they managed to reach a safe distance, still close, yet far, it was then revealed, the reason behind the helmet being taken, from such a distance, afar.'Get up.You'll want to see this!'Barnabee noticed just when it was pointed to him, next to what they stood.The sliced helmet was thrown inside one of the holes, bouncing against the walls and right into the fragmented halls that waited underground.'Why did you do that?'It's unfair, though you will not get to see what's going to happen to the camp.We've got other things, more important to see once we're at the Silo.That way.'He pointed towards the rocks, another path to take, pushing Barnabee faster, as if in a hurry.Unable to take his own decision, other to follow his own demise, Barnabee wondered what lay there, below, having heard the sounds of hornets there.'Are they?'No, they're no simple creatures, though, just as small.The thought of it crossed my mind once.Hurry now, before they get your scent and get to the horse.That's our only way out.'A pleasantry in disguise, not even a second did he forget what he's done in the tent.'Ma'am.'It was half way in that they found out, the guards broke in and every single one from the camp arrived there, backing towards one spot.A splash of water awakened her, startled as she was, she did not see and entered the phase she previously came into.The jug of water was the only victim, yelling at it.'You cursed!'Though there was no other injured, her vision began fading away from the despair.'What?'Calm down, here's mine.'After receiving another, she found herself into the tent, with no prisoner, helmets cut; everyone in camp at their guards, even the lamp's fire was gone.Again she asked, 'What?'No time to explain.'An arched sword was given, the one that one of the knights had, it seemed to have decayed a little since they were slain, though it was still as usable as before. Therefore she stood, ready to strike as a prowling cat, as the bottom of the heart laid the despite she had for those, and she swore. 'If I get my hands on that knight, I swear.' The tent was swallowed in despair. Yells were heard and at the opposite of the cliff, near the horse, Barnabee saw the camp being taken from every direction. There were many of them, though he had no idea what. 'Are they?' 'They will be fine as long as they stand still. Actually, they won't, especially that one that I knocked out, she seemed to have some fierceness around her. Something you did not have, nor have here. So tell me, before we go.' The knight released his arm that was previously begging to be held by him. 'You've got a choice, so we may not. Do you want to go?' It was the choice of freedom, though honesty was given too. 'This is the explanation, you may or may not be aware of it, but this world will be swallowed. It already began. One way or another, you'll be dragged inside, back there.' 'But, why?' 'Did you forget already? Brother?' It was a strange question, what he implied. 'I've got no brothers, what are you talking about?' The questions inside the head swirl just as the clouds above, the grayish paleness of blue and the strangeness of the dirt. What is he talking about? Could I be one of theirs? 'Does that mean you're no suit of armor, then?' 'I am, brother, worry not. Once your body returns there, you will be too, once again, just like us.' 'So those two before me, they're not dead?' 'Not at all, at least not their bodies. Though we've stalled enough, and the explanation was given to you, as my promise if fulfilled. Whatever you do from now and after will be your concern alone, that if you decide to do so.' The freedom of choice, to doom the world, or to become like them, a lifeless suit, likeness of brothers that were cruel with one another for nothing but the sickly disgusting sake of it. Refusal would possibly mean the end of everything. 'You've got any proof then, of what you're talking about?' 'So far, I've seen nothing.' 'Look around.' He almost yelled, bold shiny whilst staring in the darkest of the night, eye to eye, the visor shut. 'What? There should've been here even before.' 'No that, you fool. Look at the land, how ravaged in has become. Have the stones not started turning, cracking and missing chunks? Did you not see the many other holes that were not deep enough to make it into the underground ravine? This used to be a luscious green land before, though now? Now, there's nothing out of it, nothing at all.' 'How can a Silo swallow the land?' 'Why don't you accompany me then, and make your choice after you see for yourself?' Barnabee looked behind, though there was nothing there, no tent. Already they've been usurped and fell underground, more than likely to become bones and pieces after he was gone. The decision was clear. Now, unforced he said. 'Take me there.' The curiosity of Barnabee arose, he hopped on the horse and on their way they were gone. Just a bit more to the destination, though it was true what Barnabee preluded. Down, they staid, torches lit with a sparking fire, both cruel and killing every single hiding impurity in sight. 'Stand your ground.' She yelled, her story, seemingly ending her. The last of her men having a barricade in front, as others approached their last of their hope. Stings there flung across the room they were in; filled with juice of any kind of poison their bodies could procreate. Luckily for the insight, of the seer, they covered themselves with cloth blooded with water, to avoid the poison to come into contact with the skin. 'We will last until the day men, just hold on.' She said, the mark was given then. Two lances, boarding the reflection of moonlight came into the wall, breaking everything between the two factions and almost burying them alive. Whatever lay after the wall. 'What's this?' She asked, and a small echo attempted to arrive, even through the smallest of holes that were spread across the system, to reach Barnabee and the horse. What used to be the sound of shock, a human distress, after going through such a distance, became animal like. Animals there? 'Are you sure we should leave them there?"There's nothing more we can do for them, I've already told you they were gone.And so we are, just a little more and we're off this cursed land.'They weren't aware, but what they've cut and the ground they sat upon laid the foundation carved and glued out of a combination of bone and saliva.'It must've been hundreds of thousands of them that died here, ma'am.We're all doomed!"Not yet.It should take them a while to come."Wait!Listen!"The seer said, placing his ear on the opposite side of the wall.He could listen to the shriek of the damned; everyone who stood there once had their story to tell, what they've done, how they died.All of them, in a most horrible way, though they've changed for a help.'Help us get through and we shall somehow repay the favor!'The testimony of the seer left some of the others, feeling unsettling.It was far more than enough that they were all caught inside a space so small.Now we need to listen to this old fool too, a madman soon to become dangerous at last.They've all doubted why Everett decided to take him in the first place, even if none of them decided to go against her decision, doubts remained.Will he stay with us or finally go?What is he doing, at it again?'Shh, I need silence to listen to the dead.Even the thoughts of doubt you've all decided to harbor against me.'And their faces went pale.'There!'He said, pointed by the spirits, a glowing hand came out of a wall, backing up the claim.It was now that both the worth of the seer was not only proven, but also any speculation that would've stood against him fled.'Fantasm?!"Shh, quiet man or I will rip off your tongue myself.Are you sure of this?If it happens for us to cut through the other side and find itself in a place where even more of them lay."I trust most deeply the spirits madame, they cannot lie.'The hand fluttered into dust, as he continued to be staring intently, both at her and after seconds through.At this point, she blocked the would-be path where whoever daring would have to not only break through but risk getting all the attention.'Very well.If my trusted seer does as he thinks best, so will I.Guards!"Wait a second, you can't be serious about it.'As he opposed, the number was already obvious to her, as was the surrounding.With the help of a few back steps then a few front, counting every single one after the wall, she said.'There are two of you, two of my guards, the seer and I left now.In case you haven't noticed, we've got no food, nor water, even the air is lacking here, or perhaps you haven't noticed your own slowed down breath?If we wait some more, we will die, so the only option is to go through the passage made through the bones.'Already have the guards started going and cutting through.'Can we really trust our eyes, in a place like this without air, and such a man like that, wearing a dead crow on his head?"I'd advise you to hold your tongue for now.'The sudden opening caused the entering of a strong ray of light.It was the backside of a cave, leading to an opening outside.'We're saved!'They yelled, hearing the clattering and muttering of bones from behind.It was a run now.'Wait, mistress, fire, fire!'She nodded and in return, the last reserve of bottled rum was taken from Jar, thrown in the back, followed by a small rock she found.Both surprised by the action, the even caused even the guards to be amazed, as the rocks flew and bounced, causing small glimpses of fire reach the bottle of rum and conflagrate the bones.'We need to get out fast before it reaches the masses of saliva and explodes!'The seer had spoken, it was too late for her to rethink and say.'What?Why haven't you told me that sooner?'It was anger, though survival instinct kicked in faster than before.They reached, hearing the cried from before, reaching outside after climbing a small hill that had previously fallen underground.On the nick of time, he pulled his old bones the last, before hearing a burst come out of there.It reached the concoction and released the ghoulish sound, a rumbling fear of burning rushed from underground.The ground shook, despite them crawling on their knees, they felt the heat from below, ever blooming pan that couldn't cover what was happening underground. The horse too, now on the other side trembled, as Barnabee asked. 'What's going on?' At which the knight pointed towards the distance, a small hill of ants. 'Those fools are still alive it seems.' Relief was visible, though not on the knight, though it was revealed, that in the darkest night, every hole across the land lit with a fire so red, it could've rivaled what waited for Barnabee if they were to arrive and enter through the Silo. And alas, from her, finally with her men at a safe distance, she saw them above, with her turn to point at them for the others to see. 'As I said before, we'll catch them, I swear on my own life.' But it reached the vast amount of paradise below, the gate opened in the form of a chasm. The scent of death reeked not only above and everywhere else, but it also spread atop the sky, along with a grim of dust and red smoke, as dark as the night. Remnants of what used to be bones, along with the spirits only the seer could passively see finally arise towards their destination, or so he thought. They watched until he pointed it out. All the attention was pointed at the chasm, from its mouth finally appeared, the gust of fire and the vibrating creatures, fainting towards the sky. Followed, by their queen, at last, a moldering amount of poisoned, melting form that had nothing to do with anything at all. It boiled to the bone then disappeared, in no time, there was nothing left of her, neither there or here. The eyes became ash and the cry of the devoured animals and humans died within it, finally releasing the blue dust, the blue smoke that released all of them from their curse. A tear formed on the seer's eye after seeing it happen. With the promise kept, all were safe, though she swore once again; making sure her lips would've been read. It was far enough, though the fact that Barnabee couldn't see from such a distance made no difference, the message was not for him. 'I will find both of you before you reach that Silo, and I swear, I will have my men cut you to more pieces than both of your friends added together.' The grip she had, through the distance, subsided, though he knew still that if they were to reach in time. 'Hiew!' There'd be no doubt either, that there'd be nothing for her to do, to disagree or attempt anything else instead, as nothing would work after that point of no return. And as it was, they were both on their way, walking the few miles left. 'Do you think they'll catch us?' His throat was obviously thirsty and they were about to hit the morning sun too on an area even harsher than the bone sand mourns they had previously stood upon. 'Aye, we will take a break along the way; I can hear yer raspy voice. Perhaps we can cover our tracks if we're lucky, though....' The indecision was obvious to Barnabee, as the knight himself wasn't sure if they'd be able to outrun. Though it did not make any sense. I saw them all there, standing on the ground like ants, with no horses. Then, how is it that he's not sure we can just outrun them? 'Why?' 'What exactly are you asking me?' 'Why? Are they able?' 'It's simple Barnabee, you're not seeing well by now, the lack of water must've drained you already. Either that or the spores.' 'Spores?' He asked, though, he could swear that they were still on the sand, going through and trying to outrun. Barnabee was heavy, though not enough to slow down the process. 'I'm sorry for that, though your sacrifice will not be wasted.' 'Who died?' 'Shh, Barnabee, just. We're almost out of it; you needn't worry about it, just keep being like you are now, the same stat. You'll be more than alright or at least that's what I hope.' Another mushroom popped, in the vicinity of the knight. It was a sudden pop, the opposite of the previous one that shared the same fate as the one in front of him. It doesn't matter at all, as long as the effect remains, he shouldn't be affected at all. A grim came, the thought of the fact that, he only came into possession of the small bag of repellant that were tied by the key he stole from Everett not only came in handy, but it provided an alternative to not being caught. 'Don't worry; this should give us an advantage over us, though I dare not underestimate her even further. She escaped and more than likely knows about the absence of her precious bag. Hold tightly Barnabee and don't let go of me. "Why is the horse running too fast all of the sudden?" Don't speak, you'll only exhaust yourself more, just relax, I'll. I'll calm down the horse, okay friend?" The horse was already pulled in, yet another sign, nature was bent towards the point where forest's strongest mud became flaccid to the touch, in minutes the horse was pulled underground and suffocated behind. He did not know though if the seeds would work, he'd have been used to normal sized mushrooms and their mildly poisoned spore, though, now? Now it became more of a death trap, for Barnabee and Him? The gauntlet started growing small bits and suckers, patterned with a whitish tint, seemingly still getting bigger and leaving rust. I cannot take the bits, damn it. 'Quite the problem you've got there. Brother!' It came in a form of a growth, a poisonous blue cloud, though as it came out, shaping itself to the eye level, it appeared to be no spore or gust. 'We're both here. Sent to watch over you, even though you've acted such.' "I didn't ask for any help, especially from you two. You would've done nothing else but slow me down, not to mention that, if I left you there, you would've made enough sound to alert everyone in sight." "Oh? Afraid of two pointing knives?" The same ones that cut both of you two so easily, even before I came? Perhaps, the same one band that managed to get both of you, go. 'It was getting worse and he knew too well that he couldn't waste any time now.' The Silo isn't far, you'd better hurry until we grab ourselves new amours and take him for ourselves. "Just try brother and I." A sudden glance stopped, and both of them came closer to observe. He had to shake and do the action with only seconds before it came close to spreading across the rest of the body. The gauntlet was no longer attached to his forearm, thrown in the puddles and dragged below. 'Hells, this whole continent will be dragged. Down?' "You two, where is the Silo now? Tell me before I." Silence yourself fool and listen. You may have cut us down, though you don't need to act stupid. You know as well, by what's happening, where is the Silo now located. 'He's right, you know? So how about you guess where it is now? Here's a clue too, it's not above anymore!' "Then where do I go?" Both gusts blue and glowing became the form of skeletons and flew around in circles around their brothers, in a dance that fascinated Barnabee, still caught in the sands and on the horse. 'But, he'll die!' "Who will die? Can I have some water, please? My throat. Still dry." Damn this man and my brothers. A few more steps until he was finally safe, he had to leap by two legs, the spore was now dragged down, the small pieces were taken by a small air hole that gripped the air and everything around. The mushroom fell, as trees followed, all absorbed and taken there. 'You know you can always wait, right? After it drags everything in.' "Baaaam. Everything goes out, united at last." As my brothers said. The gust moved, though still aware he wasn't dragged below, having no willing fullness to help his brother after what happened between them. 'Two worlds united at last. And the best part of it, we played our cards right. We weren't held responsible and we were promised to be kept this way from now on.' "A fair change, that would've been for both of you cretins if I didn't decide to drag him there and leave you in that form forever!" The ground under him already crumbled in pieces, though he still decided to leap. Suddenly the gusts, beyond his awareness entered one of the gaps between the helmet and torso, hiding inside without being noticed, not even by Barnabee despite being so close to him. The boots hit the sand. Suddenly it became glass, the only path he could walk upon, cracking under him from the extra weight he had on him. That wasn't alone, as it was clear. Only a few steps towards the bottom were made. Through the transparent feet curtains, he saw a hole, perhaps a system that pulled down a well filled with a vortex of wind. Both cold, and afraid of height, Barnabee started screaming, only to be grabbed by the mouth. 'Shut your hole and don't move Barnabee. Anything extra. "Would make both of you fall. It came out of a mouth, opposite than the other, though making no more than simple cracks. The startling sensation of coming out directly through his soul and armor made him shake the metal to the point of the crack, the vortex pulling him down with all the glass. Both outran the shards as he could clearly see and yelled. 'Barnabee!' With One foot, the bounced off the falling debris and rocks to turn and land on his back. The taunts never stopped and they both made sure to enjoy it to their best of ability as they said. 'Yes, make them fall, brother, make them fall faster. They won't survive at the point. "This is what you get for acting with such arrogance, and now you get to rip what you've always deserved. A fall that would break him into pieces, and more than likely kill the intoxicated Barnabee, held only by a head. 'Never!' He yelled, finally landing on a rock. There was no pressure, they didn't feel the wind, being an only ghastly apparition. Though at the moment of impact, through the sheer force of the weight, falling through the eye of storm slightly slowed down the hit on the back. Barnabee was right, though immediately turned to face the giant rock they were on. The knight raised himself to imitate the position, suddenly impaled; the shards of glass weren't heavy enough, light. Forcefully trusted around in the vortex before they came from all sides. Some broke and fell to the floor, though others managed to impale the pieces that weren't covered by armor, but leather to keep it tight. The shoulder, oh the irony they both yelled. 'You've got no shoulder, and no arm, what will you do now?' Whilst the other one observed, flying through the area and scouting ahead for something. The deeper it seemed to have been going, the closer to the point of the land being blended. Trees ahead, rocks that were still falling underground, despite the fact that everything was illuminated by the light of the sun. 'Could there be another sun, brother?' "I could be, we dare not question the Silo and its guidance, do we now?" "Are you two going to keep pestering me until I'm done? Or could you finally release yourself from this world?" "You're not that lucky brother." "Not at all. The thickest smile came on their way, as his back was turned, barely balancing Barnabee with one hand. One in the shoulder whilst the other one in what was left. Jump after jump, they followed on giant roots that seemed to have belonged to a giant tree above of them. 'And thus. "You have to be. "It's a fairground yet. Or are you so afraid of hurting yourself, even more than what you've done to both of us?" "No, just leave, take my arm but leave. "You know we can't do anything but follow you and observe, right? You said it yourself, once you deliver Barnabee, we're off to a better start, stuck inside of your arm, unable to leave. "Then get out of my arm!" The yelled made the floating stones around fall, the gravity appearing to be messed up with, though he didn't care nor seem to noticed. For him, there was only a distraction and a burden to carry on an arm. 'We would, though then we'd be stuck as the ghastly apparitions, unable to interact with anything. "I've had it with you two imbecilic!' A mistake, being so closely to him and at the same time expecting to not retaliate, even if he had one hand left. He turned and hit the back of his leg, soon to become a motion that threw both of them steps back on the root, the smouldering grass. Soon, it seemed, the temperature would be raising, making in an even more hellish place than it already was. 'Such catacombs, above of us!' Barnabee finally awoken by the commotion could only focus in front, through which the root would give passage through. A giant room, seemingly with no end other than the normal course of the root, catacomb doors and bridges laid from every side above of the towards no destination. Below laid nothing gulping for air, wanting them to fall off, though he said. 'Let me down, I can walk on my own now. "Very well, though dare nothing, I've got an arm. "We've got one too. "Why is your arm talking?" Focus Barnabee, we need to get there, to save the damn world from dying. "So you can get paid, isn't that right?" My reasons matter not to you, neither should theirs. We've all spoken too much. "Let go of us immediately." The hand was taken from the ground by him and reattached. "We're all in this together now. Brothers, Barnabee and me. We can settle the dispute once we're inside, alright?" The moment was quite inopportune for a discussion between them, leading to an even more unstable pathway. IT bends. Quickly before it collapses! Before realising it, Barnabee was grabbed by the collar and dragged away. "Let go of me, I've said I'm coming." Though the reasons behind the decision were still far from being hidden from them. Why go straight to the hell's mouth, knowing what lays there, hearing the stories. It was a giveaway then. They suddenly stopped, even Barnabee acknowledging that. It was a moment of both precisions that required an utmost good judgement of what was about to happen. Stuck at what could be metrically described as the middle of the root channel, they stared towards the above. Other than the downward sea of spines, the other bones that somewhat seemed familiar to one of them, the latching bridges rustled in placed. Their shadows fell on them stronger by the second as there was still a piece of light, the sky having not be devoured yet. Though one mistake and they'd all be crushed under them, the heaviness being felt through the air, the arc in which they were anchored on the walls, through which they'd fall would be devastatingly even if somehow they'd be missed. A root of the calibre they've felt could possibly withstand something of immense size and speed, though nothing so big such as them. Noted by one of the brothers themselves. "The pathways between the catacombs were made to withstand an assault of legions of troops, all heavy armour and carrying siege weapons on the run. We roamed once there." Aye, and now. "Now, their time was amidst, no longer would anything stand, nor were their chances well endowed by what was happening, the break was about to occur. Only a second, a blast. It was strong, bouncing only through the vibration that reflected through the sand and fragments of melon seeds and other fruits, falling as well. It reached the root and they've felt it too, immediately being pointed towards one of the upper bridges, vertically placed, though able to see them well, as the other side judged. "Everett!" The knight said, pointing his good arm at her, noting everyone was there with her. The seer spoke into her ear and they knew then, they'd have to do something. "The explosion might've broken the balance. And in return he obtain something else, from behind, it felt like a lightning strike, falling at an unimaginable speed and cutting through the wood faster than they'd ever think it would. The ground shook as they could barely feel themselves quaking withing. Barnabee held by the tooth of the hand, trying to not slip the bent root, cut from its other path, ready to be dragged down. "It won't last for long, what can we do? You. You both said you'd get me to the Silo and I've already accepted that. But it's almost as if fate doesn't want me there. "Don't tell me you're getting cold feet Barnabee, you know there's no way back. Not now anymore, perhaps for the better, I've got a good feeling about what wait for us there. "But. "Don't worry." The forearm said, before continuing the banter with a slight observation of what was ahead. A small glimpse of insight from him, pointing out the upcoming event. "They might catch onto us. They're next to fall. "How can you tell? There are many others before that could crush this root before. "No, it will happen, take a closer look at the seer. Trust us, we know. "It was the calmness of how he said it that raised suspiciously. No, there is no time for that, I must defend Barnabee unless I want to end up like both of them. "Ready yourselves then, we're in this together now, brothers, as are you Barnabee. "Wait. "His voice was distorted, the root having shaken and lowered down from the other part of the catacombs entry. IT wouldn't be long until it fell. One last thing before they'd all fall. "A bargain. "Now?" "Is there a better place? I've got no time to waste so here it goes. Whatever lies beyond the Silo, all three of you will have to defend me, at the price of the soul too."You've told him about that, you idiots!"So what will it be?"Their silence was unnerving and suddenly he could feel the control over his arm coming back.'Fine, I promise.'Once the seal was given, they only waited, both armed with what they had, having seen, as predicted, even through the deafening silence, the small bridge was hanged by ropes so they'd grab and hold as tightly as they could.'Traitors!'He shouted as hard, knowing that the seer was more than likely told what was about to happen.The root fell, and the bridge as well, ready to come in contact with the heat raised.The vines around the root appeared and embraced both before falling.And in the middle of the hummus and broken air, they came back and said.'Hold on, we did as well as we could.'"You dare come back at me after what you've done?"We've got bigger problems than that, and if you're not seeing, we saved both you and Barnabee.'A mockery of what they've done, the bridge slammed and broken the root in half, taking the vines which latched on the ropes.They were flying kites, merely meters above of the kneeling men.And among all of them, Everett.'You!'She yelled, being furious of what happened, rustling through the air pressure and pain.They've all felt it deeply inside.So much of it, just laying through their small bodies, feeling heavier, making it harder to move, so much of it that even the sentences allowed additional breaths of heavy air to strain her lungs.'Will pay!'Another strain occurred.Something almost crushed the two flying kites against the falling wall in a distant awakening call.A dent was fixed on the other side of the bridge as it had apparently managed to land a hit on a rough area surrounding the amalgamation of receiving rocks.They flew, the pieces of metal from the impact managed to cut through rocks that were already in motion, cutting them clean off in halves.The intoxicating sound was present, though Barnabee and the knight survived, being slightly away.'Embrace for another!'The seer yelled and as the words came out of the mouth and into the ears of the already disturbed crew.'Lady away!'One said, holding her off from hitting her head against the small bridge's rear at the end.Already had she stumbled on the impact, only to recede.It was indeed another strike, coming soon after, right as predicted.The hard edge of what laid under them came as a sudden blunt strike that managed to break their bridge into pieces, leaving them stumbling in the air.Screams erupted, though by now some already fainted or died from the enclosure of winds that they were heading towards their frail lungs.Two main pieces, at which Barnabee, regardless of what happened, thought of which as ironic.Two knights and even numbers.Such amusement could've only been triggered by what he saw under and in front of his arc of sight.The knight was directly in front, and under, he was just as stuck as he was by the two only pieces of the bridge, falling at roughly the same time and speed.Meanwhile, her fate seemed to have been sealed by now, there was no way of escaping, as soon as they found solid ground she'd die.Her lungs almost at their full extent.Though, along all, the seer became a hawk and suddenly pulled off her backcloth, preventing her from falling any further below.'What?'It was a surprise, more than whatever she ever expected, a miracle, guided away from the falling structures, she was lead towards a safe landing, slowly but surely.'How did you do that?'It was the scent that immediately gave it away, refilling her lungs with what was needed in order to keep living past the mess.Though, after realising he couldn't speak, she was left silent, seeing the rest of her men die.All but her and the seer, watching the two land.'No.Hold still!'Everett shouted, her gun cocked out of her waist.It was a clear shot waiting only waiting, aiming and firmly pressing the trigger.At least twenty seconds were needed for the propeller mechanism inside the well-crafted firearm which required her to keep the aim clearly pointed.Which it was, still time to change.Either the vine or Barnabee instead, he'd died along with the world.The hawk made its noises of disapproval whilst trying to move back and forth, making sure she'd not do anything reckless. Has she forgotten the sake of what's at risk? Despite the attempt, she said. 'Keep still, we're almost.' A mistake, Barnabee noticed with fear running through and away from his eyes, seeing Everett become greedy and grabbing the hawk by the ankles. It broke the balance, forcing the creature to lose balance, its head being crushed by one of the rocks. As for the firearm laid unbalanced as well, firing at the wall instead as she fell. 'Everett!' Barnabee felt pain, even towards her. 'Barnabee!' The knight yelled back instead. 'Nooo!' And at last, Everett, as she fell towards her long, awaited death. Her landing was against his side of the gap, breaking her spine before landing in the vortex, though not before leaving a trail of blood. The distraction left the moment be savoured, what he waited for the second they were reunited. Whilst distracted, he broke his own plant shackles and threw himself, propelling against the air, as the small segments of armour got released, making him lighter. It needed perfect timing as well as coordination between the three of them to keep the parts at an even distance so they'd not fall away and unable to be connected together after. And it succeeded, grabbing a hold of Barnabee and connecting every part once again. Barnabee found himself grabbed and held against his will, one gauntlet and apart, face to face as if ready to dance. 'We're almost there, can you feel it?' He asked the voice changed to reflect all three of their personalities combined into one. The cold came and everywhere around, everything started freezing, all but the two of them, held warm by the heat emanating from their ghastly apparition. 'Take me then. I'm.' He paused, feeling desperation and defeat, what he needed and had missed for gods know how, was the embrace of the night. Sleeping and waiting through it, he missed the landing, once and for all. Thought that wasn't all for him. His pupils were forced awakened after breaking through what seemed to be the final floor. They were wrong, admittedly, seeing through the arced break-out of the structure. And still, from where the vortex came it was unknown. 'This isn't a dungeon.' Noted by one of them, after they broke through the stone, revealing the gigantic city laying underground. The structure from which they came from was nothing but a tall tower leading towards the world above of them, a gateway between them. He beckoned as he saw and asked. 'Is this where the Silo is?' More stone came and bounced off the knight, away from the frail body of Barnabee who was still afraid he'd die before they'd get the chance to reach the Silo. So many died, for nothing and we may not even be going towards the right direction, he noted alas. A sigh too, falling in the deepest of depressions, defeat after defeat. The city's majestic scale and the fantastic view did nothing to repel the dragging fear. He felt alone despite having someone near him, closely sided to hear his plea. The expression was more than saddened, it dragged on the armour and refused to watch anything. Even as the vote sagged, stopping to reveal that below of them, nothing but flaccid shrubbery was dragged down, nothing but a small fraction of what was outside was dragged down. Not only that but above, what they thought to be the other side of the world was nothing as well, Everett decided to follow them on her own, leading her to what happened then. A trickery, as they might as well be on the other side of the plane, far away from the Silo that was still waiting for them to come. Still ready for the impact of the ground, to join the bottom ravine of the ancient conglomeration of structures. Yet, Barnabee denied himself from showing any feeling at all. He fell them into despair and closed his eyes, not a second after acknowledging what was happening, silently waiting for his demise. 'Barnabee, wake up, this isn't the time to give up.' The knight tried reasoning, acting as if he cared. So did they, nothing was evenly placed anymore. He felt the landing, though slowed down by mush that stopped mid-air as well. Breaking no bones, nor armour, they fell on a slope, riding through as if to ice, the bridge was not recognisable anymore from what was on. Now he felt, a first in a long time, waiting for the legs to touch the ground, a soft pleasure, as the expectancy would've been of excruciating pain. Though in his mind he knew that it was coming just as well. It was somewhat crushing for all three of them, knowing to be entangled with Barnabee and at the same time unable to return. The path they were now taking was harshly crushing against the stone of the building, against small towers with broken glass atop. With each second it was getting a lot more dark. 'Hold on Barnabee!' He said, the voices now accompanying one another instead of letting one predominately do the work alone. By the vines, it grabbed and tied even further, against themselves and him, so they'd be ready. It bounced against one side of the stone, then the other, the bridge started going like a whirlwind in a new path, breaking each side it left before falling. He remembered what he saw whilst in the air, the ancient city's design was structurally built so whatever path one would take, it would progressively get him closer towards what laid to the bottom. Wildlife died around, so did the vines start crumbling. 'Hold on Barnabee!' Again, he yelled, the vines broke, leading both towards a roll after being thrown away from the platform. It stopped bouncing, proving to him that he was wrong, it failed to take the curve and land to the bottom, making its final rest shoved inside what could once be called an architectural's delight. From the point of view they had, it was now cut by a small knife with no hilt. Though there was no time for that, as he held Barnabee from falling at the other side of the cliff. The gauntlet was alone, and he had not strengthened on the other hand, nor fingers to grab. They needed Barnabee to react. 'Pull yourself together Barnabee, don't fall. If you die here and now, so will the rest of the world.' It seemed to be of no use whatsoever, through his eyes, it was so much clear that the spirit to fight has left the body a long time ago, with no sign to return. Heavier by the second, the opposite happened, the knight being dragged down, unable to remove his gauntlet. The voices stopped singing together and said. 'We're not leaving you Barnabee, neither is he. Brother, you're coming with him as well, as you've done this by his own hand.' The same one that was no longer in his control, the empty Barnabee pulled and they both fell. A long, straight shot against the rock, it would crush Barnabee or would've. His hand was grabbed and once again, the manoeuvre saved him with the help of embrace. They rolled throughout the air until, by the odds, they were both slowed down by another wind tunnel that laid on the floor, leaving them safely and away from being crushed anymore. It was the midst of the confusion that happened, making him smile and remember. Even numbers, haha. Barnabee was quite amused, thinking of the possibility that it might've been a dream all along. Activated, his mind leads to yet another thought. If I am dreaming, what may it be my obsession with evens? The rain seemed to be coming, though it made no sense underground, even as it might've explained the coming on the winds, the knight shuddered. Carefully observing the small hole in the wall, the golden circle that surrounded it, he noted of something peculiar, the set of marks and a sign. Written in the language of the old, he read it out loud, something that fascinated Barnabee. No longer did he stand on his bare arse, lifting himself to level with the posture of the dark knight, even to be neck in neck with him. 'What does it say?' He asked, seeing how some drops of water turned out to be nothing but sand, moist sand. 'It's a wind tunnel.' So it appeared, fluctuating from going on and off on a whim. After staring at the symbols intensively, the knight turned around and grabbed him by the back of the head, continuing the stroll. Barnabee said nothing, knowing that, after all. He saved me, again, then again, time after time, despite wanting to bring me to my judgement. They were momentarily silent, walking around the pale autumn that was left when the supposed town was still alive, noting that he was even more silent, despite now having light in his eyes. Smoke came out of the gauntlet and as they walked, the two brothers made their voices heard by him. 'Worry not, you've got the both of us still.' 'Yes, as my brother said, we shall protect you on the other side instead of trying anything on you.' 'You two again?' Barnabee was turned, then left again to fall on his arse. He looked at them bicker, so easily carefree. Wondering what was going to happen next, judging from where they were. And then, after looking around, a pair of eyes in the dark, they were noted. Quickly they hid away, though not fast enough for him not notice. The gaze that temporarily roamed turned around at the knight and saw him firmly distracted, trying to spread the ghastly smoke with one hand, whilst taunted still. Crawling with both hands and legs firm, he started going slowly, at least until the dark. Could it be that Everett or any of the others survived? I cannot shout at her, still. If she is alive, she needs to know that I bear her no harm nor ill thought. Midway, through the dirt, absent of life or any growth, seeds scattered were obvious. They must've come from above, somehow, what dragged us here must've been a wind tunnel. Barnabee came to thought to it, and he did not remember what exactly happened after they came into the eye of the storm, other than a faint light. And what appeared to have happened to her. A quick evasion, and his reflected deemed themselves to be worthy, he came on his back like a turtle, furiously docile to breathe. The knight grabbed him with a sudden reluctance though continued to go with him nevertheless. A spark of like awakened, as few drops of faint water had come from above, revealing that, through the outside world, tough above, it had been raining for a life. There was still hope. He pulled back. The gaze he left met the one of the knight, now washed by drops on his rustless armour and restless spirit. 'Well then, do you wish to fight here and now? Perhaps you thought there'd be a chance for you to have a change of heart. What is it then, spit it out!' The voice certainly had the harshness of three broken knights, at their lowest, forced to share a body that wasn't theirs in the depths. 'I saw someone in there, that's all and thought that perhaps it'd be best for us to look out, just in case.' 'In a case for what? Is this a trick, of all the sudden? Have you been waiting throughout this journey to turn on us?' The knight's armour grew hotter as his rage was suddenly unable to be subdued. It's been a while since he's been shown it, though, small smoke lumps came out of the opening from under his shoulders, the gaps between joints. Another sudden burst of arrogance that bot lit and dimmed the place around them, as small drops of water, sand dirt and other elements flew around them. 'No.' Barnabee said though he had not the guts nor the strength to finally say it. It was a sudden situation in which he was forced into, and to his surprise, his body felt abruptly light, his feet dimmed and a force that he wasn't aware of came to him. 'No!' He repeated, though now with conviction. Both feet were firmly pressed against the ground. The mere pressence of hope shook the knight in his polish boot, as three of them fell on their under the back and stared at him. How can this happen? Why is he so strong? How? The three of them asked themselves, each hearing the thoughts of one another as they wondered, what made him radiate, the aura of light that came from him, invisible to others let them think there was more to him. But he's a sinner, he's done so many ill deeds, how is it possible that someone so bitter became, so suddenly, bright and warm. It was true what they've thought, even the air, and the ancient swallow in mud kingdom started blushing in his wake, green with flowers on the side. It must've been hundreds of years since something grew on the sickly pale ground. But did it mean he'd forsake the world? 'Will you not come with us then?' The rage subdued, they've spoken with the shyness of a Squire, holding on the missing spot of the hand as if it belong to a saint. 'I will follow you once I'm done.' He smiled and for a second, it appeared as if they've stared at not Barnabee but another man, differently, in more than one regard, as he pulled them up, gently. 'She's to come with us too. So wait here.' With a handshake as if to promise, he kept on the path near, where he once saw someone on the run. And, more, he was not stopped by them. We will wait then. What? Another one of them wondered as all three, maintaining the shyness did not do anything to stop Barnabee. Instead, they just. They just took his word and waited. It wasn't too far that he went either, though through the darkness he saw nothing but light. Dark forms appearing fully lit and the land, as ghastly as the thought was, became at clear as the day the kingdom was first built. He walks on the polished ground and clear roads, he saw street signs and distant shops, with every turn a new parade and above of them, the sky was vague. People lived, though he knew that just one would glow, the one he saw peep at him, at the moment when he had no hope. I've got to find her, before I'm gone, one last time and one last glance. His heart wouldn't let it happen otherwise. It was most important for him to see her again, even if the chance was. Even if the people around were long dead, the land broken, forgotten and missed. 'Where are you? I'm so close now. I know you saw me.' He recalled to her, the conviction remaining just as he reached, the glowing point of a light, a silhouette in the dark. It must be her. The forms were there, though walking with a limp, and waiting against a wall as he stopped. It was dark again, the people and the image of the blooming town went off, the architecture was gone as the broken still images of stone broke free. And over there, the single, now dim light was getting weary. She lifted her hand as she saw him coming. Slowly he approached but stopped to kneel and grab. It was the remnants of what used to be a fire spewing device. Luckily that she won't need this anymore. Though, even as he threw it away, not only did he realise that it did not work, but also. It's her. He came near and was greeted by nothing more but a wounded maiden, too tired to speak. 'You've used the last of your strength to run here, to raise your hand, to signal me to come. Now.' The thought of this very step being her tomb, buried was too bitter for him to endure, for he'd have one worse where he'd be just as alone. 'Come on, your time's still yet to come.' Her name was distant from his mind, though the face and hand were nothing more than unique. Barnabee carried her from there on in his arms, looking at her, as she looked back. Blinking from second and each step, managing to be aware that she wasn't dead, nor would her time come. Until they point where they realised that. 'You've kept your promise.' The knights said. 'Come on, we've got a long way ahead of us.' The knees, though metal couldn't stay still and shook away, as they saw them, kept to the promise ahead. 'Don't worry. She'll be fine.' Barnabee looked directly ahead, despite appearing as if the town would lead to a slope, leading deeper inside, somehow he knew the way. 'Follow me.' The helmet nodded and did nothing more than follow. It was once again that he knew but stopped. Barnabee turns at the sound and saw him kneel, surprised as he was, despite being unaware of the beacon of light in which they appeared. 'We swear on oath to you now, Barnabee. That, whatever happens from now on, to her and you, to us, that we will do our best to keep you from danger. On this side and the other, we will follow you through a worse fate and worse than any other.' 'You may stand at rest!' His voice beamed as he touched the shoulder, warming the souls that were so cold and bitter, after so many years. Still as confused, but it didn't matter how or why. The present was the only set of moments that mattered now, what and how they felt, the power he emanated from within, as they went through the rubble and blossoming garden, underground. 'A wind tunnel!' He said, it was clear, even to his brothers yet to follow, though, ahead laid the biggest of them all. One that would yield to no other and reign supreme over any other wind tunnel of any considerable size at all. It called to them, as it was built, in what appeared to be, directly connected to the town. 'Thye must've once gone through there when the city was swallowing itself under the ground."You think we can go through there and reach the Silo?"I'm sure of it!"The wind was getting ten times stronger as they approached the point of the tunnel.Its embrace felt just as strong as it looked like, the ring that encompassed it appeared to be nothing more than an architectural delight of the old.Compared to the buildings in the town, Barnabee notice that it was new, though not in the sense he expected, still.Various other, small rings of wind laid spread across the city and each time they passed near one, they could feel the various spread temperature changes.Cold and warm, then turned around, dropping as low as an ice storm, at which the blizzard coming from outside was visible, up to the fiery.'Inferno!'Barnabee stopped as he said it, looking at the tunnel from which the abominable heat came from and wondered.Could this be it?Though the chance would say that we'd end up in a furnace and die.He immediately spoke to the knights.'Do the three of you recognise this?The heat, the sparks, the small tender bulks of dark smoke coming out?'It was a slim chance, but as the knight approached, the sudden wind tunnel dropped a concave cap that covered the hole, closing itself before he'd even get the chance to do so.'Damn this wretch!"Relax, we're going towards the next one.Just hang on a little tighter, we're almost there!'Still, no sound, only a nod, the exhaustion had gotten to a level that she'd not been able to anything else than that.The fall had broken and yet, he still hadn't any clue how she survived such a fall.Thought curiosity still wanted him to ask.'How?'A sudden wind blast suddenly interrupted both, at one of the towers of the old, not far from them got torn by its abruptly immeasurable strength.Of such power it was, that, as the rubble and bricks flew above their heads, they could visibly see the wind waves and ships that carried whilst breaking into dust particles, the parts and everything else.'Dodge!'The hand of metal came with a quickness unseen and dragged them both to the bottom just in time.A small point fragment of the old tower's metal band was meters away from decapitating both him and her, angled just so it'd hit them right, it ended up cutting through the building in their sight.'Run!'The knight pointed towards a building, the sturdiest, strongest one that appeared as if it could shelter them, and they ran.A vigour came by and made them leap and head towards the call.If it were to be a call, that'd be nothing more than a mistake.No mere run had the level of desperation that could be a witness in their very steps, each attempt to push the ground a few feet under, only so they would be able to leap forward and avoid.More and more, the speed increased as various ringed forms were thrown at an unfathomable rate.The strength was immeasurable, a testimony to the power the wind had, that every flying brick stood in their varied planes, just so, that the ring would be perfectly fit and thrown, reaching and breaking through another wall of stone.No more fragments or bits, the knight immediately took them near the corner as they notice.'The slope.'Indeed, it was leading further down, arced towards the underbelly of the town.And not a second wasted, they went with it, only to avoid, the deadly projections of the wind.Neither did they nor any other could deny the strength needed to come so far, and yet, it wasn't over.She still looked confused and despite how much she wanted to ask why nothing would come.'Hang on.It's only going to get more rough from here now on.'The calm before the storm, ever so apparent in his voice.More violent rings came from the sides.'It was a trap all along!'The knight yelled, just a moment before a circle of fire burst out one of the adjacent houses and melted his only remaining hand.He shouted at last.'Gah!'As they all stumbled now, falling and rolling.Everett wounds were already distantly closed, now bound to open and let blood droplets come across the surrounding area.Luckily, the other two were saved, but not without a price, now both possessing the metal boots with no wanting to give them up.Still, hit and avoiding rubble and stones huge enough that they could easily crush their head, they managed to land almost fine, with no more than wounds. 'Come on.' Barnabee lifted her in his arms whilst grabbing the knight by the shoulder, just so he'd be able to walk. 'Look Barnabee! My metal gauntlet!' The hollow trunk that once was his polished hand now pointed at the gauntlet that once melted, mere seconds ago, at a point from which both Barnabee and Everett stood so closely to it, that they felt the cinder flowing through the air. The sudden realisation left an impression on Everett, now awakened to notice what had occurred. Despite still being on the field of battle, with an unknown enemy laying hulking around at them, with rings thrown directly towards them, the knight still took a moment to point out what they were dealing with. 'We're dealing with someone more clever, a hunter, it seems. Though at this point, it seems to me, that it can't reach.' The rings stopped, once realising that they were not in the area that they so previously just passed by, leaving but a few strokes of air, for them to look around. Flatness on the bottom, though it was no mere dead end. 'We've got another slope, just like that one, there.' They saw how it work, how much deeper it went and how many or break, flat, though decent enough that they'd get. 'I don't think she'll pull through if we keep going there.' 'We can't either, this armour is already broken and too tight for all three of us already. Not to mention that one well place circle of flame and that'd be the end of us.' 'What can we do then?' 'Barnabee, there's no way back anymore, look for yourself.' It was clear already, even with additional holes left where the circles had already cleaves the areas from, they'd be too much of a target to succeed. And it was already as hard as it felt, climbing on a slope as opposed to riding one. 'Riding.' His thoughts were now clear, even then, seeing how, at the very step they'd take, it'd be the last. 'What was that?' Both the knight and the boots asked in unison though at a different angle. There was an idea already thought, the knight was ready to run there and sacrifice himself, just to give him the chance to get safe on the other side. Knowing, though, it was ever clear. 'You won't abandon her, will you?' The answer wasn't verbally given but through a look. The intensity it held against him was more than an indicator of what he meant, he'd not do it even if it were to slow him down, perhaps even dooming them all. Regardless of what happened to them, even without a body to come through, the three of them knew where they'd end up after their shell would become obsolete. But could they trust him even if it wasn't that sure where it was, the entrance was still mid-way open by now? And by the time it'd be fully opened, to its full extent, the world would succumb to a worse fate than death. 'I will Barnabee. We trust you to come.' As he became ready for a flight, step after step, he was suddenly stopped by a hand on the shoulder. It still cracked the metal joints that kept it together, forcing the sudden illusion that bones were inside, cracking after a hard day of work. 'There will be no need for it. I've got a better idea.' He gave a smile, despite knowing that time was getting shorter. Judging by the surrounding, as cramped as he was, the knight nodded and laid off his back. He hadn't realised either, and when he did, after hearing what Barnabee had to said, it appeared to them as nothing short of a genius. To two of them at least. 'It won't work.' 'Don't worry, it will. I can swear on that, so just trust me.' He stood still for the moment, barely block so he'd not start the slider. Everett was getting stable now, she'd survive, now holding on the knight and looking at Barnabee. 'Shh.' Before she could speak, he made sure, yet again, assuring both of them that everything was in control. 'Do not worry. I'll make sure that both of you will be more than all right. Conserve your strength and I'll do mine. May we all meet on the other side.' Both stood now at a hinge. Going on the plan once again. 'You will slide first, with the help of the speed, you should both easily outrun the circles. And whilst they're distracted with you.' 'You'll go through the building and go around.' 'Right, if this works, we should all meet at the most convenient of crossroads, if that is. If not, at least we'd have survived the flames." Barnabee, there must be an alternative to this. We can't be sure that we can outrun it. "It's either this or waits for the world to be swallowed. And, I'd like to avoid this if possible." He said, with the side of his boot on the helmet, a slight push, threw them before they'd get another say. As planned, immediately, the rings inflamed and broken through brick, melted the metal that laid around and everything else. He ran and dodged, though there was nothing shot at him. It was a climb and a jump, but he quickly turned around and entered, the floor, penetrated through the wall, he saw stairs and ran to them. The light came from behind but it was already too late, as he was already on the stairs. Step, step step, no flame, there was nothing coming anymore, nothing from the second one. 'Hah. I knew it, I knew it well!' It was almost a burst into dance, as he had thought, the rings couldn't move nor aim at all, all were shot through the same position, direction and every single time it shot it missed, for Barnabee wasn't there standing to be pissed. He had reminded, though. 'Everett!' He looked and saw another path, through the window, it leads towards the bottom, buildings on the side. It was leading to a square, now with the full view in sight, he saw how they all lead towards the square. And in that moment, yet he waited, wondering though if it was clear or not. 'What if there are more of which all are pointed yet at me? I'd be dead even before I'd get the chance to get to her.' Though he had already jumped on the roof, right through the window, with no concern of what it would happen. 'You won't stop me, you hear!' He shouted at the sky, revealing to all the location which he had. If they keep firing at them, they won't make it in time, he won't be as sharp before they reach that point, closer to the square. It must've been a few kilometres by his first impression, quite a stretch that, too. With more and more, incoming, the flames now started coming, from buildings that were getting destroyed, planets that were once showing sign of not being dead, now laid in flames. The wind tunnels were everywhere and now, his location was revealed. 'Hold on.' The knight reassured, making sure she'd not get hit, though each side made it a hundred times rougher than it already was. Dents were made, and they felt the pain, shared through legs and head, even she closed her eyes during the turns which already had them shake. 'What happened?' The voice was distorted, even at that, they have heard it clearer than she could ever do. They stopped. 'A boot responded, trying its best to steer. Right then left, another slope another break through the control. None of them have realised that Barnabee was on the other side. It was still somewhat faster than them despite not having their advantage and head start. His feet were tired though not his heart. Each step was rhythmic as he avoided each strike. He didn't let go of the memento, though unnoticed by her, he had already taken a few of her hair strings and held them in his arm, together as they went throughout the town. Now, as he tried his best to outrun the fire, he pulled his arm back just to feel inside his pocket. It's still here, thank you. Though there was no light sky to thank, no gods, other the ones worshipped by the depths. Everything was being destroyed. Why is this happening? Though he stopped and entered another. Step, step and yet another pair of stairs, he couldn't go straight on the ground anymore. This time, he notices, and avoided, as the patterns changed, now, whoever shot the rings, whoever played this sick game of fire yelled. 'We will stop you.' They shouted as they shot where he'd be. Approximation and chance, he couldn't hope to compete against that, as they were a poor man's weapon of choice. By this point, on the roof, the small buildings, shaped in stone were close to each other and on the other side there were only silhouettes. He had seen and remembered what hers looked like, even by the distance, compared with Everett, theirs left the impression of giants. Giants in the depths, firing rings of fire at him, though not anymore. 'You won't stop me now!' A grunt was audible, even by the distance between, though now they could see each other well. The little man. 'The little man, catch him now!' But he will see us?' And their beards dark and grey, filled with the small creatures and insects that roamed the depths in which they stood, present. Their slumber and home invaded, and now, he came. 'Go now, we were promised for his head, though don't eat him yet.' As one jumped and started chasing, a surge of fear, the sickness left by the holy plight that once filled his spirit emerged. It was only momentarily that he had previously recovered his strength, now face with such might, he didn't feel as if he was going to rescue his so-called companion and love, but. But he was running away from the towering figure. 'Giant?' Barnabee could barely believe his eyes, to such an extent that he almost knock out a few stone slabs that were tied to the roof. A human-like, though older and dirtier by hand, with features of a fat baby, instead, with the chubby legs he gave chase, seeing how his friends were still mending to the flames. It was visible, now how it worked. They're using torches, as big as their hands. And the wind tunnels were just right there, all of them aligned, to whatever purpose, it was unknown. Ahead, it got dangerous, as the giant was approaching, it'd need only to outstretch and grab Barnabee, and all would be over. When the middle point came, the one that had made the distinction between the two sides, the giant changed direction. Now, neck in neck, only a leap was needed and the rest of the distance would be cut short. 'Alone?' Seeing how he was there by himself with none of his brothers near, the fire on his left was getting brighter, through right, he saw the path from which they were still sliding, ever ahead, the sight. 'I need nothing more small boy. Just one of my touch and I could turn you into stone right where you are.' Was that a bluff or could he do such? Though his gaze was full of bright and wonder, not a second wasted as he looked upon and reflected. How could it be that I had gotten so far and why am I chased from such a distance by them? The fire was suddenly shot, disrupting his thought. He saw the giant yell and shout, in the agony, he felt as the massive body was stricken by flame. It went through though not as a circle. Two sides, it took the ones that didn't manage to cover the giant's body, breaking the stone and making the building Barnabee was one collapse. Such a jump wouldn't come at a price, as he joined the giant on the ground, ankle sprinkled and in pain. 'Gah.' And then he asked. 'Was this your plan all along?' Though he wasn't sure, seeing how he was in a much deeper pain than him. Both alleged and almost being close to being paralysed. 'Traitors! Traitors! Traitors!' The giant was trying to get back up, though the pain was clear, almost as clear as the blisters he had on the part of his face and giant arms. Half of the beard was now gone though he still picked himself and dusted. And ancient tongue rammed out his mouth after getting up, from which Barnabee could only hear. 'Bashaa Gar!' What is he saying? Barnabee asked himself, though he hadn't realised from his fall, that part of his ear drum was damaged, close to being smashed. There was nowhere to run, he saw the mad beast turning at him, then picking him up. A hand, that's all it took for him to grab Barnabee, though it was more softly than what he expected. And a good too, that was followed by confusion. The giant asked. 'Are you not Barnabee? The one to be taken to the door?' 'I am.' 'Very well, then we shall go.' The surprise came more than expected, as the other silhouettes dared not come closer, knowing that I'd be no surprised to fight their own kind, with fire rings being thrown around. Now Barnabee was held and the giant started running again. He pointed then, as being held still above by the hand. 'Follow them. They're my companions and can help us.' It was sudden, though he didn't complain. Barnabee saw something that perhaps other would never get to experience in their entire lives, to ride a giant, held by him or not. To him, it still counted. And whatever laid on the other side, he knew he at least had a story to tell, to the beast, or to hell. They ran without a trace on the ground, whilst his brothers shot at him and tried to take him down. 'Why are they doing this?' Barnabee asked, despite having so much to observe and such a scenery that would take any other's breathe. He had not seen such a thing yet, there were plenty more to come and he encountered plenty again, a long time before he was an adult. Stories they used to tell to him as a child, though now they were long gone from his long passed memory, a sad thought, though. That such a marvellous creature, as crooked and with half of a beard. It changed. The blisters were gone and his beard regenerated before his eyes. He recalled the old chant that turned out to be true, told whilst drinking from his mother's buzzom, he heard. 'Oh giant oh giant, you cannot make, Children of your own, oh children that make us go on, You have grown old but cut one off, it will grow back, There's nothing to harm you or stop, From taking my child, other than, Bound to word of my love, Bearing for my child when I'll be gone.' It laid with him, though made no sense, up until now, Barnabee still didn't think, this couldn't be. That my mother had foreseen the future and placed a charm upon me. Though it'd have saddened him, to think of his mother and what she'd think of the man he'd grown to be, still she had a heart of glimmering gold, a jewel so old that it made even the giant that was foretold. To protect my child at all cost. 'Thank you!' There was no moment for a response, as the giant stood still, then jumped. It felt like a termor to poor Barnabee, who was going and going on the ground as it was shaken there. And still, half way through, the path ahead clear, this time it was unavoidable so instead he charged. Like a barring ram, he crushed a house and took to care, as Barnabee was doing his best to shield his eyes from sharp pieces of gravel that did nothing more than to attempt to pierce him through the heart. The space between the giant's fingers was big enough that it revealed most of Barnabee's soft areas and were his most important organs laid, heart, liver, lungs and most important, head. 'Hold on little man.' It was now, at full speed that he avoided all the flame rings, though from the other side stopped. There were still giants that recognised who he was, more important, what he was and stopped. The good intent wasn't there, but decency for their own race, they lit the rings but did not fire, making only a segment of the brightest light that was seen underground. Now, whilst being helped to escape from the underground, he did not weep nor would he return for the others, he swarmed and grabbed the two sliding ones, reaching the flat land, where no ring laid, though other were coming as well. Though he hadn't seen it, the giant cannel, no light was coming but the wind and the cold from above. Despite being scared, they gave no remark for the giant, as they saw Barnabee being calm, without giving any warning of what was happening now. A look revealed that they were coming, but from the side, the rings started blowing. It wasn't aimed at them, but it left the warning shot and a bitter taste in their leader's mouth. Such bitterness in his eyes could be seen, but it wasn't directed at them. 'How dare he betray us? How dare they help him now? One of us and. Bah, bring the siege!' He sent them, though they waited for an order. 'What do ye want us to do?' 'Blow the ring, now!' 'But it's out only way out if that falls...' Answered another, with no will to finish his thought or to think of what would happen to them, in case, the worst of the king, they'd be trapped there, forever. Even legends had truth in them, somehow, in which their kingdom would be trapped, as they couldn't climb up. The mercy of the depths, the gods of which maliciousness could spoil them bitter, in his mind it was worth it if it meant to stop. 'We were promised the world outside. If we stop them from going through that gateway, we will be able to take over the world once it's shattered and blown. Not the sturdiest headstrong bunch, they listened. 'We need to go now.' 'Where?' Barnabee started and only now he saw clear, the prized location was near, though unknown to him, what did it too. 'It will take us back to the outside world, in the worst part.'He didn't stop for a moment, leaping and going through.She was hurt, though Everett just as the knights and Barnabee, all together, endured.Since they were so close now, to one another, nothing could stop them from achieving what they desired, freedom at last, back on tracks.And what it took from then was a few blocks away, of stone.'We're not alone!'The giant said, seeing the first blowing puncturing barnacle shell being shot at them.It missed by a mile, though it blew away making it light, then dark again.'Dark shells of Viatah.'They pulled the light in, making it suddenly dark, though he had roamed the land for centuries and didn't need any of it to clearly see it in his mind.Their wretched hides were broken as they shimmered in the dark, and yet another strike, another explosion that sent the shrapnel-like bits of shell directly against the shattering stone.Still, their aim was off, which is the least said, as their pointed weapons did nothing but scrape an area far beyond them.And time was being shortened for at least a few miles.They kept shot after shot and none was dimmed, none reached them, and their effort remained in vein.For, now they were so close and the wind started to be dragged.The ancient ring felt the approach and small stones floated around, along with fire and shrapnel, other small bits were dragged.'There's something else in there, other than the wind.'Barnabee felt the soft touches of cold, reach under his once yellowish cheeks than now became as red as they are.'It's not fast enough.'The giant spoke, with almost a roar like motion, seeing how his comrade's attention shifted from them, directly on the rings.Shells managed to hit, though they were thrown back, repelled by the endurance the metal from which it was made.Though they avoided the pieces, behind the final charge became.'They're too many to take, we need to go in, now!'The knight said, his metal armour pale whilst compared with the hide of the giant.'We go in now, look, it's already getting too late.'The springs finally came, water flowing from cracks, it took only a few more shells and there was a dent.The dent then became a full-endowed crack, which at its pace became a bigger one.Expanding, and so it did, until the point where it encompassed a huge part of the rings, who was now soon to pass.

Hosts

Which is the reason he couldn't stop, two, not, three hosts that received the letters? It was too late for that, for even he, the great of celestials could not reach that many just in time, with the limit of a person, to add to that. So it was that they had reached, not at the same time, different days, adjacent to one another, the research was saved, and to the selected few the truth. One was a family, deep in the heart of mountains, near the rural area of Bitterofk, a mainland state. They lived alone in solidarity and used to steal the mail of others. He knew that well, which only added to the arrogance of his clever stuck. Sending all letters spoiled, to an abandoned house, the father of the family knew they'd find. A fair maiden and a child, that lived in the middle, right under the clouds received it too, though she hadn't heard that name in a long time, ever since the birth. And another host, the house of skin. Much wasn't known, nor if he could trust, though the crone had no way of sending it back. The horn of the animals her tribe had slain were not rotten, making her house, covered in tar as black as she had been left from the time. Yet, despite who they all are, Argus still once had decided to trust them, even more as he had given several locations for them to meet. So it was that the man return, bearing his axe on the shoulder, right on time, after a plunder of which his wife did not know. 'Evening.' He said, returning as if he was on a hunt. Though other that wood which was left outside and a few rabbits for stew, something was hidden, deep inside. She can't understand, she just can't. He said to himself. 'Evening Bordon.' Said the wife, his name was used only in the little times she was mad.

Lorraine

Her name was Lorraine. And thirty-five steps ago she died. Though she hasn't realised it yet, looking atop of the street. She always had random thoughts full of deceit. It wasn't that much of a difference at the times, a rustic part of Northernberg, with as much population to suffice as it already had gone past its limit. Hence the job opportunities for those who had the certain appearances. Though, out of all, who already left, she remained on the street, not having the means to go by for another night. The other had plentiful, yet she had none, not that would suffice for that for whom she has slaved herself for. It was already worse since it was snowing, but she didn't care. She was frozen there, looking behind, the bloody footprints, dry in the snow. Unable to move forward, she could either stay or move back, though she remembered that moving back would only mean she'd die. Earlier, before it started snowing, she met a man. It wasn't too different from the many other nights, and the man looked, to her at least, less of an asshole, sort to speak. 'Looking for a hook?' She asked. Despite the cold weather, her lips were dry. The man had his dark riddles with oysters coat, a common thing that wasn't out of the ordinary, and to the contrary, it appeared to her that he was wealthy. An easy gig, it seems to me, he's probably a gig and wealthy. The man moved his hand and before she could protest, placing it against her chest. Annoyed by it, and seeing how there wasn't anyone to see, with a blow of rocks that were held inside, she smashed his head in, along twenty oysters that were placed inside of his hat. He laid on the ground, with a bloody look on his face. It was a shock, perhaps too much for her to take. 'No, what have I done? Sweet mercy!' Lorraine never checked her back, to see what was inside of it, as the owner of the brothel, and her soul, always enjoyed playing tricks on them, to make them sore. She was reminded once more of the cruelty the man had, as she ran across, unable to throw away the purse she carried, tied directly to her bone. Each step grew, significantly heavier, as did the belt, the lashes and the purse, everything on her started slowing down, as she realised, there was a bloody footprint trail, leading directly to her. The crime scene wasn't far, and she stood there, looking for a way out. 'There, it must be, the airboat, just waiting for me.' In her mind, she imagined, a desperate attempt to remove all clothes off at the same time so they wouldn't crush the entirety of her body, so she wouldn't die. But then she realised it, as her body came to a full stop, snow coming by her shoulder, the clothes weren't sagging nor dragging the body down, it was something else. Something else kept her from moving, a burden, even stronger than the cursed clothes she had. The sounds of the pneumatic compressors were now audible to her, signalling that there wasn't any chance she'd escape if it were to come back to the crime scene, with a bloody purse over her shoulder. Unable to remove it she sighed. Stopped there, trembling in her feet, waiting for the snow to take her. For far too long, she knew the rules of the town, and as soon as she was found, with the weapon at hand, she'd be eliminated on sight. No one would care for a broad, not in the slightest, smallest sign of compassion. The sounds were approaching, most likely following the trail of blood. Lorraine was stuck, watching over her shoulder at the corner, then, in the smallest fraction of movement she could force, after finally understanding that none of the other muscles would attempt to listen to her commands, she turned it back around. Seeing the bridge, waiting. A sharp noise was being made, bricks shattered, a trail of dust would be left. The compressors were quite painful at the touch, deadly but not fast enough to kill the one they'd be used against. 'Damn you, if I weren't stuck!' Lorraine couldn't help it but say that, in a hurtful stutter, unable to do it as they were so close, the light was visible down the corner, making the shadow under her expand. The compressor was almost fully charged against the wall, the heat was so powerful by this point that it would melt the ice and the feeling of cold, that soon left the air. With a breath, she took some of the mixed air, of cold air, that came from the wind in front of her, and the hot one in the middle. The waiting was killing her, even more than the compressor would. So, I'd rather end it now, rather wait and die like a cornered dog. One step behind, the muscles suddenly released, knowing the type of trap she was in, but not the one that placed the burden, she knew only what had to be done. Another step was made, the heat grew. It'd be only a few steps behind, after the ones she additionally took, that her skin would form blisters, only from the gust of air that was pressed in the foundation of the brick house that was being destroyed. Unable to scream, as she would've done it, that was way too clear to her now. They want to torment me to no end, but who? Who did this? Surely, it couldn't be the hellish fiend that sent me here on the streets, no way he'd stop me like this. Neither could it be the ones trying to get rid of me now. Her thoughts were grabbed to a halt after her body rejected the movements towards the point of heat. What could they be waiting for? She asked herself, now that she was unable to do anything else. They were clearly there, same for the light that ran down, across the street, the blood too was followed by a pair of footsteps, bloody prints, sure, but the heat should've melted the ice if it were for them to be hidden away. Seconds passed, the light diminished. Her eyes widened, Lorraine's shadow died. The sounds of the compressor went away, and as he turned to see, the body finally being released, a scream, a shout and a splatter of blood ran across the street, before being turned into a cone of fire. With a beating heart, full with a feat of fear, she knew that there was someone there, stronger, faster that came and kill those that wanted to hurt her. 'I'm next.' She said, finally released, with control regain, she threw the purse away and jumped, rolling into the snow, to clean herself and be covered in white. Immediately, the cold shock made her lift herself up, and see, to her surprise. 'The airship's still here.' As she started running towards it, doing her best to hide her fear. Seeing the shadows under her constantly disappear under her eyebrows. It was clear that whoever did all that occurred was just messing with her for nothing more but own amusement. 'So close, just a few steps!' Her mind rushed, and a self-defence mechanism arise inside of her, making her speak out her thoughts at an alarming rate, at which, the sound gave the position, directly towards where she was being lead. 'Don't go!' And over the bridge, the one that was tied to the ground, it released itself to float above the air. The airship left, making her stand there, inches away from where it went away from. It was almost as if, at the point of which she arrived, combined with the sudden expulsion of air throughout her lungs, she has given up, awaiting her fate in the middle of the street. Alone and afraid, cold struck forth, for a second she felt the heat, as the airship flew above of her, blocking the snow, heating the air with the flame it had. No one approached her, despite that she waited, once again, though this time over her own volition. 'Come!' The voice said, breaking ice and snow, out of a cone, under her. Suddenly, as she looked down she saw the snow white disappear over a slight heat feeling that made the ground look as pale as it was before snowing. Lorraine turned and saw a man who wore a suit of metal, tight and tipped around the edges, black, with a slight reflection, accompanied by no other than a commonly built of the face and body. The only distinct characteristic other than the suit and the crisp beard was his soothing voice that called to her. And she called back, afraid of being caught. 'Will you hurt me if I come?' She asked, unable to hide the fear she felt, neither the obvious distrust that she felt towards the suited man. 'I will not.' His hand reached, a pair of fingerless gloves, she came immediately and touched them both. 'Such heat, I've never felt before.' Even her voice seemed to be replenished by the presence of the man, and for a second then, she forgot what she has done. The slight warm grasp turned into a malicious pull, out of the mouth, bloating the neck in front of her, came another torso of another man, with no head and nothing else. It lifted itself as if to come from the man, using him as a pillar to stand tall. By sheer luck of heart, the beating stopped her from fainting as she said no word, trapped once again, seeing how the lower body was a stove, and out of the elongated torso, ripped a hellish pair of long wave like holes. Fire, brim and with enough heat to burn everything could be felt from it, as she realised then, reminding herself involuntarily and vividly to distract herself from the danger. The gust of fire that most likely killed those men. 'It was you. It was you!' Again she said. The mouth moved but it was a stretch beyond proportions. 'You lied!' She said, with confidence at hand, though she remained helplessly unable to hurt it, or cause any minor inconvenience, as she wanted. The elongated torso flailed, uncontrollably above the air, throwing the heat and melting the snow everywhere. Or at least any other place than her. Knowing nothing, being frustrated, she did the only thing she thought of doing, which others who fell victim to it, most likely did not. With enough space, she bent the muscles of the leg and hit the man over his pride, making it flail more and fell behind. A huge bit was taken and it was clearly in pain, having a chunk of the torso eaten by itself, and on the other side, she felt, the impact was enough to break her leg and bleed most profoundly, only after a shout of pain. None of them was dead, she knew it would retaliate, so she turned around and started crawling on the snow, pushing herself, towards the bridge. I need to get. I need to get to. Water. Her thoughts were harder for her to hear and put into practice, pain coming through, whatever happened on the impact, pierced her bone and broke it in half. With each pull, the torso started pulling itself towards her, making it a race, between their own malicious, one to escape the crime she committed, and the creature trying to burn her alive. The body seemed paralysed, looking over her shoulder, Lorraine said. 'Served you right.' And as it heard it, with a full strengthened bit, it bit itself, the torso released, a gush of blood sprouting out of it. And what remained was a crawling body that was evocating hellish gusts of fire out of it, in waved, getting as strong as it could be. Lorraine desperately yelled. 'Help, anyone, please!' But no one was there to hear her and even if they were, they'd be unable to help the situation. Does it plan to blow itself up? The waves seemed to shake its own torso, as the man who bit it off the rise of the ground, a stump of skin, from which the torso came stuck inside his mouth, a jaw full of teeth buried within. And, how awful she felt, having to crawl too, through snow, again feeling pain, blisters forming on the hurt leg and more. She couldn't help, the deadly obsession, watching over the shoulder, unable to look away from danger. The man, seeing the torso crawl, still unable to speak, risen on his feet, he took on the challenge and leapt towards the side, immediately turning, slowed down. In his hand laid a pneumatic compressor, heavy, barely being able to move in against the edge of the ground, he started charging it. If it was fully charged, she'd have no chance of escape, being shot by its long fiery snare. Already crippled in the snow. Whispers coming from above and everywhere else where the constant fire tongues did not reach. 'Free us!' The snow said, through every small globe and flake that flew above the air, even those that melted in the warmth of her blood had a small echo that said it again. 'Free us!' Lorraine didn't understand any of it, nor did care. In her thought, it was clear that she was. I must be going mad, the pain, the pain. She repeated to herself, almost mirroring the voices she heard, twice in number every time, so her inner voice would hear it too. Her mouth was wide open, now crawling with one hand, the numbness was getting to her, perhaps even faster than she'd get to the edge, and leap. Breath was getting harder, the brim fire that was spewed did more than melt some of her senses, devouring the pain she felt, as she was approaching death. The torso was coming, the man behind, the weapon was not ready and just a few feet away. Crawl she did, to the other side, as the torso turned on its back and leapt from side to side. The fire was now coming towards the air when she saw a shadow that came. Above, the airship that previously left came ready to go back again, though, the torso had no eyes nor senses, knowing only to go forth at a fast pace, it failed to see the airship in its glory. The flame reached the air, almost like a spray of fire, burning the ropes that held the metal platform. With enough strength, she pushed with one hand and rolled on her side, crushing the arm even more but avoiding the crash. The platform came and crushed the skin, the bone and the fire stove, creating enough force to push even the compressor away from the man. But Lorrain was pushed too, drenched in blood and snow, whispers getting louder. 'Yes, free us now! You are worthy!' They spoke in a tongue that pulled her closer to madness. Where she felt, a heat that dragged her closer to death. Despite that the stove died, splattered inside of a crater under a metal platform, that erupted in flames, causing an even greater danger to all of them. They all died in an instant, boiled and burn alive, even the glass shattered and spread across the ground. Tears already ran, unconsciously on her cheeks and she knew she still had to go. Seeing the man standing on the other side, blocked by a wall of fire, approaching the tool left on the ground, charged to an extent. Another problem arises, for her, blinded on an eye by the intense light. Her sight was broken, as her body, pulling through the wet rags, blisters, rashes and more than she could feel through the numbed limbs. To add to that, with each step, thinking that she had a chance, more glass shards entered her skin, making her scream, going through the part of her body that weren't numbed. One glass, in particular, entered her neck, barely avoiding the thyroid vein that would've bled her to death. Strangely, the fire that would've to burn her in a cruel death, it sealed some of the wounds she had everywhere, though not without a price. She felt the man approaching through the ground. Closely to the edge of the street, where a fall would make her come closer to the water drop, a few feet away of coldness, an escape of pain, as her thoughts distracted. One sudden drop, closet towards the ground would be fatal, as the shard was still inside her neck, a flesh wound, merely penetrated, though enough force would end her, for however blood she had left. A gurgle of blood and skin was audible from behind, metal being crushed against metal, burning and full of rust. He was taunting her, still alive, well, more or less. Bloody and filled with cuts she reached the edge and thrust herself, though not before the compressor was pointed and shot. From the other side of the street, a few hundred meters away from the other side of the bridge, men and women gathered. The citizens watched in horror as the airship was burning, as someone on the other side shot with a ray of light that pierced what looked to be like women, before she fell into the lake. It was frozen for merely minutes that once again, the edges were released, the hit wasn't as hard, though the wounds were great. 'Monster! Fiend! Abomination!' People shouted, almost in a chant-like a manner, as they watched the creature walk closer and observe what was happening below. It didn't seem to notice any of the people who have gathered to see. Though none dared approach, nor wanted to go there and search below. Despite not knowing what was the creature on the other side and what exactly happened, they recognised, even from the great distance what it held in its hand. 'A compressor!' Said a man from the crowd, with a tone that was almost bent by itself, over what he said. It was almost as if he feared to say the name of the tool of torture and death. Because, even if she survive, she'd suffer immense pain from the substances thrust by the compressor into her. If she didn't drown first, that is. It lasted a few more minutes, perhaps hours, none seemed to be expressing any concern for time, other than what was happening from afar, when the creature left. It couldn't be a human, that was obvious, with such a bloated mouth, extended to no reason, not to say that it held a weapon that would've needed at least two people to carry.No one else had done it, carrying it on their own.Officers came quickly and found nothing, as snow started drifting away, coming on the side.They found nothing in the search, after shoving the civilians away from the scene.It left not a trail of itself, and even if there were any clues left, they wouldn't have stood there unburnt, or made to ashes.Nothing survived nor remained whole, as the fire destroyed even the rubble and stones from around the landing area as a whole.When they reached the point of destruction, the flame was finally let down, the snow stopped from falling from above too, at the end of a scream.Before going to the corner, the men found another set, a pair of lovers as they seemed, now two additional corpses and not quite the sight to look at, as some of them directed their attention against the wall.Those who weren't puking, at last, were sealing the zone, though the captain was quicker at thinking than the rest.Not a second passed that he didn't study, from further away, the two corpses, seemed almost welded with one another, at a point of entry, brim with black.There was a reddish liquid dripping, a fraction of it that vanished in the air.'They were killed by a compressor!Men, we need to be fast!'His shouted pierced through their perception and more, as he directed the charged, running then taking a hard turn to see, the trail of blood, they were being lead.Walking to track the inhuman thing they've seen before with nothing more than miniature compressors, round and long, like guns of old, charging them as they went.Seeing the wall stricken, a compressor abandoned before another turn.He announced what he saw, knowing that most of them were in the back and they'd be distracted otherwise.'It abandoned the weapon, it's unarmed!We can take it, just follow the blood.Fast, faster!'He said, now shouting, through cold, striking at a wall with a fist, still mid-run.A mad feeling went through his veins, seeing that the trail of blood was getting thicker, a repugnant smell coming through.Still unsure, if he and his group, that he didn't select had enough to stop such a thing of nightmares.The last turn, leading to an alley filled with grasping darkness, floating around.The blood stopped there, and what remained, at the tip leading to the alley, was taken away, sipped by the looming darkness.'It must be there.Men, ready the compressors.We will burn it out of there if we have to!'The way there and the charge, made his back hurt, a feeling that felt like he was being stabbed.Though a sharp, crooked, bent-chromatic knife with a sharp iron lead was in his hand, ready to strike at any abomination's throat in any second and more.He stepped aside, letting two others, their compressors, alit.Only the order waited, knowing, looking and observing the edges.It couldn't be anywhere else, cornered as a dog, he knew he might attack, so he shifted his body in a position to crawl and leap in case it'd try.With the body trained and his mind, what waited now was just for it to either come at them or be burnt alive.'Fire!'He yelled, with an armoured stance, ready to deflect, the bits that flew towards them, the blooming darkness burnt alive.It was a parade of fire, almost as worse as what they saw.Luckily there was no one to watch and question if the ones protecting the city were just as worse as the fiend they were hunting.Captain Rhogmag used slashing motions to cut, the dark edges, crisp, flying like frozen chrysalis towards him.They resembled mirrors with no reflection, easily cut through and falling into quickly vanishing powders.Behind him laid a trembling trainee that had no idea nor seen any of it.He stood there and watched as they advance, the fully charged miniature compressors, after so much time being kept alit, were able to reach the same capacity of a fully sized one.Though it didn't come without a price, as they closed in, making it harder to control, it burnt not only the malignant growth, but it also cut through the stone, leaving a perfectly geometric shaped, whatever was once covered and even the air was melted by the substance.Cleaned beyond released, they pushed, unknowing where to stop. Rhogmag yelled 'Enough!' But the machines in their arms were vibrating too hard, getting too hot, unknown to them that the malignancy was gone and they were cutting through the apartments complex. It was a jump and a dual slash, that the captain cut with his chromatic knife the aligned tubed that constantly lit the compressors. And the suddenly a stop. Before they could fully turn, both of them were punched in the head, dropping the weapons instead of reacting in any other sort of way. 'Are you deaf boys? I said stop!' The captain came closer, looking everywhere but there was nothing left for him to see. Not the dust, nor any remains, but it should've been. 'No, there must've been at least a sign that it was here.' He told them to look around for any mark on the ground, looking at every corner, above, trying to shove the dirt. Knowing that it wasn't a normal opponent, he'd spare no chance that it might be worse. All three came to it, on the most charged order, when he stumbled upon it, buried, barely under perfection. It was easy to find after stepping around when one of the men said. 'Here sir!' It was a hole, apparently, dug under, leading towards, what felt to be, brim heat, the depths of hell, most likely or worse. The captain's first thought. 'What do we say?' The trainee asked, holding a cross that was dangling from his neck, afraid of what might sprout out of that hole, now left unprotected and revealed for everyone to see. 'Re-attach the cut parts, then burn the hole to crisp. We'll cover it after we're done. From this day on, it will remain the way I say it, we killed it without a trace of its remains. Understood?' They had little to say, not to mention anything related to a choice, so they complied, holding on whatever promise of a future they still had. Someone might come sniffing otherwise, that was clear even to the boy. They worked fast and completely covered their tracks, as the rest of the town was busy, on the other side, checking what happened. It wasn't clear, exactly the cause of that day's events, nor did the reports that were given, the confessions and the lack of evidence to support some claims. Ten years passed, to be precise. After being buried under hundreds of other files, the even was completely forgotten by the population, so were the lives. Enforcers made sure of that, publicly shaming any other would dare speak on the street about any sort of crime. A lot changed since then, making it hard to believe that one event causes the tip of balance between total enforcement and respect of the law. But it happened, nevertheless. And, it worked in a way as it never resurfaced, whatever was there. Down the station, past it, laid another straight street that had one way only, leading to a set of mazes around the city, all of which lead up, towards a ruined house. Not fully burnt, and it was never explained why, but what once was a brothel, now it remained partially burnt and destroyed, half of it, again, utmost perfection. The marvel of their time, as the engineers who designed the first patent, it either destroys your body, burns you alive, or it leaves nothing more of you than thin air on the side. Though that didn't certainly stop them from moving on and escaping, those who weren't caught, moved towards the underground to continue the business, still flourishing, all but without one. Past the house, farther away from the borders and edges of the town, the river from which it was connected the lead to the sea. By the side of it, at an unnatural amount of walk, laid a house in a smaller town, one of fishing, mirroring yet another, its sister town, as it was called and known to be. The house had an utmost importance to one person, walking in a chair of wood, having wheels that barely span around as they should. She refused to change it, even after so many ears, scarred and broken, blinded, permanently in an eye, she kept living her life away, with the memory repressed. It was the daily routine that got her sane, waking up, going by sea, watching with an unknown fear she held, unconsciously of the sea. None question why she went there and stared at the end side of the docks. None of them truly saw, from time to time, a red tint, at certain distances, sometimes approaching, bubbles coming out. A fascination with her, not just fear, it made her stay there, watch, but go back just before it got to the shore, under the wooden bridge and to her. Lorraine tempted fate for ten long years, every single day since she arrived at that point, she managed to go back, immediately before. So much time was spent on it that it entered her blood and system, it was almost as if she was bred into it, to do such a thing. But it made no sense, whatsoever, so she went back to her routine. 'Greetings.' Lorraine now worked in a store, she sold fishing equipment as well as meat from time to time. A sweet girl, though a younger and even sweeter than her came, mirroring her routine. 'Morning Alissa!' The girl called Lorraine, despite not being her real name, she knew that something inside, a voice ran with such cold bearing in her mind. Do not tell them your real name or you shall suffer, it will drag him towards you before he'll burn you alive. Often, she stared at clients when fragments of the voices came, though not directly at them. They meant nothing at that time, just objects standing in the room, as her full attention was grabbed by unknown forces, she thought, to be, possibly the work of her god. But who is he? Who could be the person? Again, the girl asked. 'Are you feeling okay?' 'Oh, sorry, dear. I must've zoned out of it. How may I help you?' It was almost gone perfectly through a rehearsal, with a slight nudge and a change so it wouldn't be too obvious to the girl. A smart one, she is, though you are frail now Lorraine. One of the voices taunted her, making a slight hint of pride, she often stepped on that, no wonder why. They all influenced in a way, though one second she was there and the other not. 'That one!' The girl said, pointing at the glass box with a machine inside of it. A music box, perhaps a present. Look at her body, a voice said. Do you not envy her? Though it confused Lorraine even more, none of the voices made any sense. She hadn't questioned it, though, anything, how she got to be there, or why would she keep going. The girl left, another customer came. It repeated again and again, leaving, going back home, going to the docks and speaking to herself. No new faces whatsoever, just new shipment of meat that was fished, the town faded into obscurity long before she came here. And it was a miracle too, that she arrived and was saved, the broad called Lorraine. No one understood that night, a snow storm, the sea was almost frozen, as were the ships, she floated under the ice, having no air, being kept alive, only by the substance in her chest. But she was carried to that town, nevertheless by the flow, the current and the unknown. Though her mind was blanked by the impact and the vision, still not blurred, water piercing her eyelid, even more, she saw something there, that pierced her to be conscious. Something was following her, a figure, walking at a fast pace, under her underwater. An armour surrounded the figure, keeping it down, with a tube, going as further as her eyes could focus. It called to her, bubbles coming before dissipating in the cold water, though she couldn't answer. And at the same time, her body refused to make her lose consciousness after having her awareness forced astray. Though in the seconds when she did think, the figure was assaulted by something of the depths, grabbing and holding the tube, until the armoured figure fell down. It was too far and she was too tired to escape, but it was in that faint moment that she knew that she was being followed. A warmth followed her body before she was rescued, ice broken by a pick, right before it reached and before the possibility to be boiled alive. None notice, though an entire town, despite being so small gathered and made an effort to break the ice and get her. Home. Where Lorraine chose to live alone, with a false name, unable to speak to anyone about her past, so she'd not be handled and killed on sight in case anyone tried to cut loose. New few harder in those parts, though, ten years were enough for the news to come. She knew everything, how harshly they treated the population. And in a way. 'A blessing.' Lorraine spoke to the nun, it was near the town's church, which she visited, almost regularly to pray. 'A blessing to you too Alissa!' The black, in blue clothes she has reflected the personality she held hidden and stricken away from her. A nun, priestess of the god, they gave them a filthy stink and a greater chance for their success in the season to catch fish. And it was visited regularly, especially by her, being lead inside by the nun, pushing the broken wheelchair, as a blessing. 'The god shines his fins to you this day Alissa, you are truly blessed to be alive.' She'd say, the same thing, almost every single day. Though not once has she answered, despite becoming a daily occurrence. 'From where have I come from?' Though a shrug was given every time, and it was held, transmitted through the wood and splinters in her back. Only to be left there, and start another day, praying and committed, at a statue of the god. And how he looked at all of them, a stone of the sea, fashioned to be perfect in appearance, fitting to a god of the sea and more than that. A symbol that entered their hearts, filling it with sea salt, frozen at winter, breaking the ice. They often stopped their prayer, to look at her and out of all of them, who stood and the glossing stone, lavished seated, separated by spiked beads, the blessing. 'Oh, what a blessing! Blessing, a blessing! Blessing to her!' Whispers formed and it was harder, none of them knew how uncomfortable it made her feel. To be unable to know whenever or not they said that, or it was still the voices, messing up with her. Yet, she endured, same as always, before coming back, the same routine, a few people in-between. No one new, and with time, some scars healed, still some remained. New ones came, stayed a little and repaired. 'Receipt your soul.' She'd hear at one day, and see the wide opening in the sea god's mouth open. In another, no one except her would come, but the day would be busy with people from all around the town, coming to but from her and be filled for the day. What little she had of her sight, started stagnating, her body become even more frail, despite having signs shown of getting better. Every time she stood on the docks, her mind went the way, thinking what would happen if she chose to do it so. The day finally came, where she rolled her chair and didn't stop until she fell into the water and started sinking on her own. No substance in her chest to keep her alive, nothing to stop the water from constantly entering her chest and nothing to stop the pain. It was obvious now. I will never find out what happened. And when she thought of it, her vision got darker. In a way, it was because she was giving up, that her life was given, a warmth coming towards her, giving an unsettling shuffle on her frail old bones. And another gulp followed. Which will it be then? The water or what's out there? Even more, shades of darkness started coming, dancing at the corner of her eyes, taunting her with the hands, as she was going to die. Her arms were unable to move, and Lorraine. Alissa could swear, that, despite being the last moments of her life, she could finally fully see with both of her eyes, everything around and everything in sight. There was no corner, regardless how dark, that wasn't there. Too little, too late, the biggest gulp of water didn't stop anymore, as she felt something rushing through her head. A pressure that felt through the nose, followed by the warmth that was next to her. When she was reminded, that night and every memory came to her, and finally, she understood. Followed by the loss of consciousness, she heard, only but a splash above. One last thought, the last one as her body was turned without her notice or her choice by the currents, to look above. Is someone coming? Her last thought after was unknown. And the last thing she felt as the consciousness went to the depths was the numbness of her arm being taken away. She was being pulled back up, struggling to keep both of them above the water. It was night by the time she was done, forcing the water that buried itself inside the woman's lungs. Without her knowledge, as the girl laid her ears upon her chest, she heard the heart strike back, the lungs whole. Whatever happened to her body before, changed forever, even after so much water being inside, the girl managed to land push after pushing, until Lorraine woke up, suddenly to grasp for air. She spat blood and water, even an oyster that found itself there, landing directly in her hand, open to catch it before it'd fall down and shatter. 'Are you okay?' The girl, asked, Lorraine being silent. Is she new? She asked herself, disregarding the last minutes, hours and more. 'Who are you?' But she was suddenly found in a position, bent as the arms wrapped around the rest of the body. She was being affectionately hugged by this stranger with silken hair, almost as smooth as she had around her age. Lorraine hasn't felt such warmth, other than the fire and knew not how to reply. Staring at the curve below of her, the spine and trying to figure her heart. 'My back!' Lorraine yelled after a sudden realisation came to her, lifting herself on the two legs, she walked again. In a second, she made laps, around the girl sitting down, sparing at her, unknowing at what happened. 'You can walk? But you were in a wheelchair, I saw you here, standing by the docks.' Before she could turn and say anything to her, both of them had their air taken by a fraction. A sudden eruption of boiled water jumped above the air, one hundred feet away from them at least, one hundred more above. It was hot enough that it didn't last long until it evaporated above the sky. 'We need to go, now!' Lorraine almost shouted, at her as she grabbed and pulled, as hard as she could, whilst the pounding started above the water. It was coming for her, now that she could walk again, the pain in her chest diminished and there was nothing stopping her from the charge. Before they stepped out of the wooden bridge that laid between them and the rest of the town, another eruption arises, the last one, that crushed the wooden planks, and out of the water, it came. She could only see it by the tail of her eye. A forked tongue, and a chest, it held no fire but bloated with water, like an airship, held by meat bars, the man was indistinguishable, being covered in coral. 'So, that's been taunting me for so long?' It held no flames, but it spews water jets on the sides, cutting the edges of the remaining plants. If it had a mouth, normal one, it'd laugh, but it could only do the motion as it ran towards them. The girl was trembling, still held, whilst they ran away. A sudden avoidance as she dragged both herself and her companion in a jump, over a crate laying on the ground. It was by mere luck that she noted that the creature threw the bloated torso in a motion and crushed the plank, thrusting bits and pieces against them. Like shrapnel, it flew and pieced the barrel, water coming out of it, the fish long dead, the way was clear and there wasn't anyone else on the streets as it was too dark already. And no one to hear the screams either. The silence was gulped and was sunken in the small world of the seat, it followed as they both run and smashed the door that leads inside the church. Afraid, she asked, whilst doing her best to keep up. 'What is that? Why is that demon following us?' Lorraine had trouble keeping her perception fixed upon the moving thing, especially with the girl slowing her down. It even occurred leaving her behind, though it wouldn't have been so morally satisfying to say. Instead. 'You called it a demon girl. Hush now, until we're safe, I'll try explaining it after!' She nodded as they both got a moment of waiting, at the other side, a safe distance laid the creature, slowing down. The water jets weren't possible anymore as everything already dropped away, the body heavy, chained at the bottom of the feet, despite not wearing a helmet. After so many years, she recognised it as the man she once saw, just as her memory decided to return. The grasp between the two of them was finally released. 'It's okay now.' Lorraine noticed how the torso fell down and bounced against the ground, like the water snake, drying it up, as the man, unable to walk, to talk or even squeak, stood there. 'Wait girl. Don't approach it yet, let me!' But, what? 'Just stay here and wait for my return!' Her pearls eyes started at one another and the conviction she used seemed to have pierced her two pearls, going as deeper as an icepick would. The girl felt a cold touch on the back of the skull, generated by a mere stare, forcing her to stand there. And wait. As Lorraine started approaching, stretching her legs and feeling her spine once again. She had been stumbling around the whole way there, though there was a curiosity that pulled her. The closer she got to the fiend, the more obvious the features were the iron, the suit, the wildlife that resided inside of it. No helmeted, at least not in its entirety, as she observed, still on a safe distance, she managed to see that there was a fragment from which it sprouted. The remains of the metal helmet must've been disregarded when it came out of the mouth. Though, why now and why did it hesitate and do an attempt so late? A road pumped out of the place where once stood a heart. Some liquid pulsated through and managed to land onto the ground, before being exhausted after all. She knew there was still a risk, infection if it was still alive. It could be playing dead to draw her in, though she had to know. 'Don't come, stay there until I make sure. I'll signal you when I'm ready.' Again, Lorraine assured her younger friend, just to have the calm and awareness she desperately needed. As she thought. The rounds of what was pulled through the rod, it looked like a blob, revealing to be a gruesome heart. It came as a shock when it finally shoved it aside of itself, and in such a manner. No longer was this the heart of a human, obviously, it couldn't bend, though one thing was certain for her, as that was. 'It's dead.' Her mouth sank, the lips suddenly impaled by the teeth. It started coagulating with its purgatory blood, blue and pumping out of the stomach, the rod with a hole, the metal parts that once accompanied a suit started shaking. Rust fell to the sides. Skin started growing out at an alarming rate, despite one being frozen in place, the skin was more ambiguously malignant and elastic than it has ever been before. Small tumours formed and it seemed to be ready to explode, Lorraine backed away at the first sight, impaling even deeper to alleviate fear. It was too late too, as the gruesome sight conducted itself, the girl in front of Lorraine hadn't anything else but watch, the only one in the village to see. The woman getting shards through her back, throat and legs before the malformation got thrown everywhere around. It was a sight like any other, that breed mistrust. She did her own avoidance as the bigger part of the helmet, that once had the glass in the visor shattered, the metal bars handled and bent, despite being broken, it destroyed more than half of her arm, along with the barricade. The girl screamed as Lorraine was unconscious on the ground. Yet again, fate has abandoned Lorraine, to be at the mercy of a beating heart that started moving. Approaching her slowly ahead inches from her at least. The stench was flagrant enough to rival one thousand oysters that were smashed together and puked aloud, a concoction that was deeply connected with the microorganisms that resided in the heart. They push and acted like parasites, seeing her close to be dead, though she was hurt, it did not matter. Another body, malformed would be prone for the comfort. The heart of the man was once good, now it resembled that, the completed organ, ever glowing in the light. Time was limited, in the desperate attempt. The girl saw that thing slow down once it was running out of the water to propel itself again, to breath and procreate. Blood already started pumping out of both of their bodies and still no one came out to help. She knew she was alone, and despite her dizziness. 'I'm. Coming.' Her voice was just as trembling as her body, the knees deep inside, as close to the stomach as her brain to her brow. No weapon and a numbed hand, this would be the last thing she'd be doing before falling to the ground to bleed. A depletion of both water and blood, she was careful, as the heart stopped. It saw her action, just as she tried rushing in, she stopped too once she realised. A jet of blood was thrown in front of her as soon as she made a few steps. It was the lack of judgement coming from the lack of oxygen in her brain. Though, through the glance of mere luck, she avoided splashing the heart with blood, a gust that would've propelled it directly inside of the landing merely a fairly distanced pair of steps from it. Does, does it think? Her vision wasn't as good, a fairly young woman with her chord exhausted from the shout. In no way could she ponder, whenever of not the lady was still alive. No way to end the life of that miserable fragment of the purgatory abomination that died. What would happen to her if the heart got in? She asked herself. And utmost of all. What would happen to me? This was a strange moment and a strange path for her to take, never again would she get another. With a twist, an immeasurable amount of pain came, though it was too late for her to scream. She started squeezing her own arm of what was left inside of it, all above the ground, in the direction of the heart. A young body, inviting and standing, she approached and fell down in the pool of her making. The heart was invited in as it approached, splashing against and entering her. A heart attack was the reason of her death, so they say. The body got dragged away, though, yet another time Lorraine escaped. She was brought and laid on the bed, where she stood there, watching the ceiling and wondering if it was a dream. The armoured golem, the young girl, the last decade of her life. Unfortunately and more than that, what happened in her entire life was as real as she remembered. The shock of the fact and its repercussion haunted her mind, drive her away beyond the town she had abandoned, as for the girl she did not know. If it weren't for the sudden urge, the outburst of energy, she wouldn't have fled and left the scene. Though it happened once again, this time it was of her own accord. The lights that emanated reached the sky and they sang of the story of the crippled woman who had run. Away, she ran in tears, the pain coming through as for many years it had missed her. And without her knowledge, what did heal her also meant for her demise. Deep inside her back laid a black horned, twisted shard, that managed to somehow find its way inside of her, now. Time dictated that she'd turn, at least until she reached her new goal. 'I'm coming back, no matter what it takes!' It was a self-knowledge and self-implied oath, carried by a horse she stole along the way. Unclear, though alas, she found a companion that knew the way. Quite convenient, for someone to be waiting for me here, in the middle of nowhere, at a time like this. Though it was nothing more than a hood carried by a rider, wearing a grey collar, the only distinguishable thing about whoever hid under it, she sighs. 'Do you know?' 'Yes. I've been waiting for you.' And she stopped. It was already suspected for a while. 'Are you death then, and have you come to take me back?' Her voice was sharp, and she acted fast, getting into a defence stance. The night was rough, and despite being healed, she felt something odd and particular about him. It was the mystery and the untrostrorhyness about the whole thing that shook her. Though what could she do then? Surely, declining the offer would make him be more demanding, even to the point of becoming aggressive or worse. He's not one of them, I can't explain why, though he's making me feel unsettled, I'm more than sure that his thoughts aren't as ill-willed towards me as theirs are.

Sky terror

'Truly amazing, in all the senses!'The sailor sang, a song of sanity that was delayed in an instant.Though not a normal ship and not a real sailor, he still stood to ride inside the mouth of the sky breaking terror.It walked on the clouds and air itself with the crossed legs and toes alike.No shout and it hadn't any cavity, it was merely controlled by the man as he held the cords leaving directly inside of its stomach.Both the man and the terror were alike, as its head resembles a mix of his ribs and head, being bred only from himself in the cave of allurements.'Ride on my son.'As he called it his own, though it didn't come out of a woman, not one pound of flesh.I'll keep it to myself and reign the skies, as long as I keep these secrets, no one will know.He said to himself.What he didn't know is that this son of his changed and would change further, as his damned feelings and emotion would be passed down.The pale and white skin the enormous head worse turned into ash like hardness, covered with small fractures, out of which the eyes emerged.Ghan didn't notice as he was too blinded by his desire for revenge.'No!Stop dropping, we need to rise!'He yelled at his son, though he hasn't realised yet that his own ambition, of revenge, affected it in a different way.Regardless of how many eyes sprouted, all of them were blinded and it couldn't see.The widened mouth couldn't yell, even when saliva was thrown away from the boots and fell as raindrops above the sky.'No, we're so close.Don't give up on our ambition, we can still make it to the shore!'Indeed, it was in reach, at they'd have to simply walk over there, with the speed of the jog, they'd crush the houses, despite the wood and bricks used, tied together to resist a siege.Though no siege was at his level, nor would have the destructive power.And none would get the chance to see as the missile wouldn't even land close. People laid their clothes on racks, they went on their day, walking with various animals, carrying grain sacks. They were overwhelmed by the scent of autumn, marvelling at the crops being brought and overall wondering at the grand city they lived in. One of the greatest in the Eester, which would stand for centuries undisturbed. 'We're falling! No, no, no!' He shouted whilst pulling the teeth at the point of almost entirely removing them from the gums. It felt pain, it couldn't see, yet it refused to close its jaw as it knew its father was inside. Even as a terror, it felt compassion and loyalty, it fought through the mild pain of his father shoving his sharp-edged leggings in its tongue and even being left crippled. And even though no word was spoken, not being fully developed to do so, it couldn't stand the feeling of disappointing the father. 'This is it, isn't it? We're both going to die.' While glancing down he noticed the long drop as for how fast they started heading towards it. It won't be long now until I'll reach the bottom and be crushed. The head was breaking apart under the weight, down to the teeth the man held, up towards the skull. 'We need to lose weight then, we may reach for that cliff. Just.. Aagh.' Ghan finally saw what happened and was helplessly unable to help him, the only thing remaining and the only chance was for him to guide him. As a father would guide his little child, so he tried. 'There's a ledge not so far, it's hopeless for us to reach the city but at least we could reach that and not die. Keep pushing! I knew you can!' His shout wasn't filled with fear and for once he actually believed they could make it. And in an effort, to which he'd sacrifice for his father, he gave a part of himself. Two wings sprouted out of its skull, at a sacrifice that took a part of his brain and even more functions, along with a leg and a hand that would never work ever again. 'Are those?' A wolfish grin came across, though, again, they were too heavy to lift themselves high enough, they flew, they crashed. But they managed to go through the ledge, carved in stone and land, roughly. With his hand shoved tightly in the opening between two teeth, he held as hard as he could. It broke apart as they embraced the land and were thrust by the wind inside a cave. 'Hold on, we'll be crushed on that wall!' Despite not being developed enough, he expanded the wings and shoves them directly against the wall. Feathers and skin were shrivelled and shred against cold stone and yet no scream of pain could be released. It didn't matter that it sacrificed its hands and feet as they were crushed inside the tight cave, pushing against it to stop whilst releasing a sound, just a single that could be heard across the distance. And with one push, right before the muscles that were still alive inside the hands and legs, inside the wings pushed and held to a stop. The sudden motion threw the man outside, tumbling like a desert weed before he finally stopped. Mildly bruised, he looked as he was embedded with blood, quickly realising that. 'It's not mine. It's not. Mine!' It ran down from his hands and reached the ground where a bigger puddle laid, smaller in front but lead from a bigger part, resembling a small river. Two hands laid there, shaking, whilst he heard the wailing terror. The wail continued, unstopped, growing even louder as the thought of the conclusion came in his head. So much blood has gone, it couldn't be. The sailor has always held the values of a captain, one that would go down with the ship, though when the time came. He turned, in tears as a father would be. If forced to watch his son die in front of his eyes. Closer to it, he hugged, finally the jaw closed upon himself. Despite not seeing him, it eased the pain it felt. Father. It thought to itself as it felt the hands study it further. The sound calmed down to only a vibration, the lips that were moist not felt like bricks. The tears came down on every eye, including his. 'Shhh.' The cave was deep to no end as no one was around. No one, except him, would get to see, the last moments of the sky terror. On that day, directly under one of the greatest cities even built, a sky terror died. It had the ability to feel regret, though. Despite that, the feeling was repelled by his father. He knew it was his fault, as he closed his eyes unconsciously and held tighter. The wings finally came down, revealing the light. With the last of his strength, it moved aside to let more of it and make a path for escape. The man refused to leave. And in that moment, as they both held onto the last moments they'd have together, it held no regrets to the next life. Somewhere in the distance, cutting through clouds, the spirit came back. It flew and cut through them as a grim gust of wind, that looked back and saw. Its father, the last it thought it'd get the chance. Immediately it flew, spreading clouds around as if they were nothing and returned to the place of birth. An empty bottle laid there, from where it was dragged out of, the primordial substance that combined with the man to give birth to the creature. The wind had the stench that was left by the malignancy that was borne by the father in the notion. Once there, it was the lid open and from air, it turned again in the primordial ooze it once came. 'Ohh, such a disappointment.' A women voice came from as she reached the light and close the lid once it was close to being full. She recognised it immediately and reminded herself of the fool she gave the terror. The price paid too, a ship tonne of golden coins, jewels and others, now either melted or torn apart. It didn't matter if they were once won or stolen as they all reached the same point. A well-devoured system, exactly two hundred feet underlaid a bloated piece of meat with mouths but no hands to feed itself. They took care, she had the means to pay servants and caretakers that they'd give it enough melted gold and minerals and in exchange, the more primal matter would be taken from the far end of its orifice. The most secrecy that too is maintained as anyone who'd find out about it would most certainly make an attempt to burn it. 'Oh, if they knew my dear.' She said, as she watched out of a binocular leading directly above, having a multitude of mirrors and glasses for her to see the creature in its every angle. The shaped stone edges that penetrated its insides the first time it came to the place, now were so deeply shoved inside that there was no chance for it to escape. Quite a flexible creature really, it more than likely failed to penetrate any vital organ and avoided it too by placing the extra amount of fat to circle around what would be like a spear entering a chest. It learned too, as no man. No, occasionally one would fall in its mouth and scream in agony, either from being burnt alive from the heated metals in liquid form or from being slowly crushed under the various layers of mouths. No teeth, and for the better, it'd be a shame if the metals hardened around them. The perfect organism with the perfect system, one that would make them rich and in time. What was carved on the stones, the messages to guide those who'd eventually find it and them? 'A god!' The voice echoes throughout the rooms all the way down the stairs where the workers heard it. Unsurprised by now, they'd get used to it, as they'd have no opportunity other than that. No families and no one to care about them, other than her. Countess Vanessa Uriyi. Above, even higher to mirror the town, a bitter one laid. Held at her enormous mansion that challenged the god themselves above. As she returned, locking the dome, the doors, protecting the phials, she closed left the door open for a second. Just for a gust of wind, strong enough to extinguish every lit torch that leads towards the bottom. It was time for everyone working to return to their slave pits and sleep through the night. Something told her. It was going to be a cold one tonight. The mansion, if one could call it that, used to belong to her grandfather, who had it built. Through mere luck, he'd struck a gold mine a hundred so years ago and ever since then, he built a paradise. Vanessa looked through one of the hollow holes through and saw the land go as far as her eyes went. The houses were as ash like as they always were, no other colour than grey over a land luck lasting of the usefulness of nature. 'Oh, how they grew to hate me father, and you had better plans for us and them too.' It almost pained her to think, not for the people who grew accustomed to the land and its bitterness. I couldn't blame myself, nor will I, humans get used to their environment, regardless of seeing me as a tyrant or not. Ever since she was a child, she never cares about anything in particular, nor of the consequences of her actions. It disturbed it as it grew older, making her obsessed, ever since she became aware. 'Why couldn't I feel any remorse? Why can't I care?' It pushed her to torture and to unimaginable things to people and even worse. Her actions were unknown, despite how clumsy with the hiding of bodies she remained. A city was bent and one day she burnt it, though it remained. Despite her mad attempt, the houses were strong enough and did not fall. The winds pushed from below them and kept the people from being burnt alive. And even through that, they had no resent for trying to murder them. She told to herself after so many years. Father, you knew all of this would happen and you made them stay, you made me stay. A city of full of people became of ash, a mansion became a castle, half of which was burnt and wooden, from which the flame once arise. The other half became of towers and spires, atop the mine, though never would have any of the descendants of her family. Nor anyone else would've found about what hid under. She slept alone and lived alone, atop one of her towers, on a bed made of springs and torn roses embedded in blood. Not hers but of a boy she long used to pick only the ones with the sharpest stingers so he'd be hurt. Despite the pain, she smiled every time she back felt it since she knew. They boy who did that, after, suffered more than she'd ever get to know. Even if he didn't get to live such a long life as she did, perhaps in a way, it was. In her own words, for the better. One last door was closed and the key switched to press against the lock system, the cogs rolled and the chains dragged the spikes poles against the other side. It was impossible to go against it from the other side of the door. This was the last set of defence, just in case the slaves ever decided to rebel, they'd be left there for days to stare before the eventual replacement and the opening of the door. Though at the other side of the giant barred door was haunted by a ghastly knock. Is someone there? She swallowed despite her dry throat, there hadn't been anything for her to drink, other than some of the primordial substance from the bottom shelves. Though that was off limits, even for her. 'Who is it?' No response. The dumb girl inside of mine, you've dare not ask the question again instead of me. Of course, the one out there wouldn't hear, the gate was prepared for an assault, to eat the sound in case of one. She approached beside the silence of her owned thoughts and dared touch the knob. A knob on such an iron gate, the builder sure had the last laugh in making it appear as docile and pregnant as he could. All the insides too, they looked as casual as a rustic house, to deceive the attackers, that was the intent of the father. That, she hadn't dared touch on his word. Reluctantly, she reminded herself that it wasn't the time to stare blankly and open the door. A boy and a girl, most likely brothers found themselves silently staring at her. Her eyes haven't met theirs as she checked something else through the cracked opened door. It's raining outside, has it been so long? I knew I shouldn't have wasted so long down there. 'Umm. The boy spoke first, or was it a hymn? His sister accompanied him after with another one, both either too shy or intimidates by the bitten lip and straightened dark hazel eyes. 'What do you want?' It was almost as if what she said had a deeper value that what it came out as. It wasn't pointed towards them, though and she knew it too well towards who she said it. They were wet down to their feet and so was the teddy at the end of the girl's hand. It should've been an easy choice, she's done it before. Many times has she encountered beggars who tried entering her lonely abode, to either be rejected or end up dead in the catacombs below, as food for the pigs. But, these are kids. 'Cold.' They couldn't even stutter a sentence with the broken lips and shake dead skin running down their bare feet. They've been there for a while, at least since the rain started, no way could they've been so full of dirt. She thought of how much they'd spread and make her clean floors dirty, thought it wasn't her intention. Why should I think of such of things and let them shake?' Am I cruel children? If I were to let you freeze and die out there?' The flare inside of their eyes was enough of an answer for her to understand. Cinders still flew, though they wouldn't last long inside the furnace if she kept the door open. The door was closed with them outside, as she stood there with her back against it. She slept there through the night. Nothing within her power could stop the wail. Through the night, sealed within her desolate set of spires could be heard, and even into the deepest depths below. It cried as always once it was stop being fed, though they couldn't afford to do it through the night. Unless they'd have to wager their provision. 'I hear but can't help you. I can't.' She was lonely through the night. A feeling that was held by someone farther away throughout the skies. Leading to a cave in the dampest night. He stood there inside the body of his son. It was long ago when Ghan forced the jaw open to staying inside the mouth so he wouldn't freeze. No longer ago, he knew that. 'You were so gracious and living, it's all because of me now you lay dead. If I were not so blinded, if. And he slept after being so drenched in tears, shocked as the mouth was already dry. Not even that would soothe him. Not even that. It was pointless now. He had already accepted his fate, one that, in his mind, he deserved the fate his son shared. There was no way for him to climb, the rocks were too dense and slippery. No way down either and the stone was in an even worse condition, harsher and filled with thorny plants that would stretch themselves in his finger. The cave had no way out, having a dead end not so far away from the body. 'Tomorrow morning, I promise. We'll be reunited.' Gahn spoke as if his son was there near him, and the couldn't do otherwise. There was no way of knowing what happened to him. Nor that it wasn't his son anymore. With bruises and wounds, he's done it earlier but never had the courage to do so. He grabbed and ripped, with wounds that erupted, blisters on his skin. A piece, a shard, edged and sharp of one of the teeth, solid enough that it could easily chop off a good chunk of his neck. The options were limited otherwise, too afraid. So afraid of falling down, the pit below it's way too high. He said to himself as he saw a fragment of light come through the small hole he made through the tooth. If it weren't for his tired state, he'd have ended it immediately. Though, since he didn't have that, he remained silent and slept, being comforted by nothing else than that. At the sky, beyond his small cave. And ever further away from the spires and rain. It flew throughout the sky, a chariot made out of clouds. No one could be seen inside but flying by itself, with a few horses in front and nothing else. In the middle of a storm they broke through but there was no one to see them. The city was closed as far as anyone could see, as were the borders. Through the dark night, along with the remnants of the smoke by the substance that once got a form, they were pure. Perhaps the purest form that the primordial gas would get, most noble as it roamed the sky. And shattered the darkest clouds as the chariot ran by. The darkest clouds kneeled before it as humans to a king, finally to be seen. Like a chapel in a spire laid a dome-like window, directly opposite to it stand the woman to the door, unable to sleep. Though she felt nothing towards as the chariot charged and broke itself against the closed door. Not even a gap could've saved the gust that intentionally destroyed itself for that purpose alone. To be seen by her?' But why?' She looked at the knob as she asked it. 'Is this what you want?' Glances around, back and the window before seeing. The charge wasn't purposed to break it, but to lower the resistance of the lock that made it stay closed. It worked and she saw, some movement and rain come inside. Once again, she struggled. Feeling her knees moist and barely strengthened to lift themselves up, she turned to open the door and let the cold back in. Her back ached and for a good reason too. With no intention, at least not any more to spend the night that way, alone, she saw them waiting right there, in front of her. 'Come in already.' It was almost as if they were ready to wait there for an eternity of glances and be dragged at the bottom of the mud ravine in front of her house. The weather was getting worse as was the expectations she had. What would they see me as if I do this? Will they believe me to be human and not know what lays below? With a sidestep, she stopped asking herself and moved to actions. Mudd came into her house, but she'd easily find someone after to clean, though not immediately. Both tripped on the mud and the dirty and wet clothes they both had, same material as she observed. After closing the door and the gate, she closely observed them from a safe distance. The head was tilted towards the front as she watched and nodded to herself everything they've done and more than that. Bells rang outside and for a moment, her attention was misdirected towards that. 'Did you hear that brother? They're searching for us at this moment?' Immediately did her ears turn. 'What was that? Is someone in search for you and is that the reason you've come here?' She was straightening as for her approaching, cutting through and presenting herself in front of them. Both children looked surprised at the lady they've seen. Before she looked merely emotionless, looking through them outside. Now she was fright-inducing after raising her tone, taking the shape of a ferocious panther as she prepared to leap. 'Answer me or I shall throw you outside with the rest of the hooligans that'd be looking for you.' The hand raised to cover her mouth. I shouldn't get too worked up from this, perhaps I could turn this around. Studying them, she dropped the position and tried appearing less intimidating, though not after reminding herself. They are just children, nothing else, I don't need to overreact to it. After waiting on it, they've finally received the courage to do so, barely standing with the help of each other, as alone they'd only slip of the varied amount of mud, they said: 'Our parents are looking for us miss. And we thought only that you'd be so kind to let us in, after all, it was so cold.' 'And our parents are mean.' 'Yes, what my sister said, they were mean to us and wanted to beat us.' 'And this is why you've come beating down my door and disturbed my work? For this childish run from your parents? I should've let you outside to freeze, it would've fared better.' 'But we've done nothing wrong.' The boy paused, taking one of his hands off his sister to rub over his cheek. It was clear to Vanessa after the mud rubbed off his cheek that they remained red, not from the cold weather, but that he'd been slapped. 'And why should I care 'bout your misery child? Do you not see that I've got mine to bear? After all, now, along with it and my tasks I also have the burden to wash the floors, most likely by myself. And deals with those looking for you.' 'Please don't tell them, miss, I beg you, our father will beat us again if he finds us out. We. We'll take the mud but please, don't tell them we're here.' There was a scent in the air, almost as if a wet dog came through though there was none. At least, she thought of it, until barks were audible and from behind of them, first thought to be a being of mud, it shake it all over the floor. 'A dog now too? Inside of my house of spires? You'll have a lot to answer and pay for all of this! Wait.' A sudden change of expression came to her face. She wouldn't have realised it otherwise, the idea, solemn and ever changing. After coming closer, she grabbed and held the dog, look at him and then at the kids. 'I've got a better idea, you'd better follow me if you don't want to be handed over to them.' The children cringed and cranked their teeth, seeing their dog taken by the collar of mud, held as if ready to be hanged. Fur fell off around the area as it was grossly around, she held it as she rushed to the door and unlocked it in front of their eyes, revealing a gust of the wind that pushed from below. And from there, holding each other against the wind that was stronger than the one from outside, they feared. 'What is. What is there?' 'You will see, now go, the two of you will go first.' The path was open and they descended, with no light, after the first four steps they stopped. 'We can't see and.' Quickly interrupting them, she almost hurled the lamp at them and threw them on the stairs, pointing with the dog even more desperately below. They walked and gulped, their feet encompassed in the solidified dirt, afraid, though forced to overcome that. Both knew that they'd do anything other than being given to the parents, so they went down and tried not thinking. Up until a point where they came to a gate. 'Let me open it.' Like a key, around her necklace, she brought it to the lock and welcomed them inside. Even the dog feared, but at least they weren't headed even further below. 'It's okay Julian, we can.' 'Shh, child, go inside now!' With a flicker, she turned on the system, which brought the oil and ignited the torches, lighting up the room. The dome was still there, protecting from outside interference, though they've seen enough. The room was big and filled with phials, shelters with various others and books, utensils that would be helpful though had to understand. 'What will you do with us?' Both were shocked at the question, even though the girl placed the question, holding it as a grip. She knew it was a mistake, the whole running away and trusting her, though through fear they were manipulated. And through fear they stood helpless, despite being tired, and watched as she grabbed a phial and took out the insides of it. It was then shoved deeper into the dog's mouth and the insides were almost immediately pumped into a malformed amount of skin. They could see something crawled inside. She threw it on the ground. 'This will prove to be a good experiment as I never used it on anything of such manner. Just fragments of humans, never direct contact.' They watched it shake and move strangely on its own, almost as if it tried to stretch so far that its limbs would fall off. Clearly, it was in pain and they could do nothing to help. Will this animal blow? She wondered, expecting to be proven wrong and something new about it to be found. The limbs despite being bloated done far from blowing and spreading in every direction. The immediate reaction was done as they all stepped a few feet away to dodge. The nails were the first to be launched, from all four paws and in every direction, barely missing other phials and glasses at only a few centimetres away. 'Marvellous.' Her eyes widened. 'Stop and see.' And with a shiver, she flipped a switch and a bar of bones fell down and stood as an additional gate, preventing their escape. She said as the malformation started growing and bloating itself through the legs, that now resembled air tight worms. Grubs immediately took shape taking heads at each side. 'This is your doing, I want you not to forget and see.' Having in mind that regardless of what was going to be done, she retained control over, whatever form it would achieve. For a second, though, it wasn't true. Seeing it differently just as them. She feared it, seeing it grow larger by the passing second, with no precedent to the growth and change of form. In her mind, the worst scenario just happened and even if she had control it wouldn't have helped if it got just as big as the one further below. God forbid if I create another of your size and form. She saw transformations before, though all of them took time, at least a day, none happened to be so fast, to grow and grow, taking no shape. Now, the body resembled a blob, spreading in five parts, one head only had a mouth, through which it spit fragments of its own bones. Marks on them remain there. Certain that it didn't notice yet, she moved closer and grabbed one of her knives off the table. Out of all her utensils, the knife was the sharpest. 'Dorothy!' 'This is not the time kid, your dog is gone now, don't approach it unless you want to end it.' The boy was ready to get close enough to hug and take his dogs back, thinking he'd be able to pull it through. Though, despite so young, they were able to pick on that she feared it too and what it would become. No more eyes as more meat pumped through, the nose and the teeth followed, being disregarded on the floor. With a flicker, she took something, a small glass pot, filled with a teal coloured concoction, tipping the tip of the knife inside of it after rubbing the seal away. I need to be fast before it gets out of control. Vanessa tried calming herself as she slowly approached, the mass that now bloated itself, floating through the air. An immediate realisation came after. On such a size and being able to find, it could devour the skies if left unnoticed. Unable to control herself, she jumped like a bloody hyena, wielding her knife almost as if her life being in immediate danger. And with a swipe, the wind and the force that thrust her forth, immediately she cut through and threw what remained of the noble head, which stumbled on the ground. Her feet backed away, to avoid being touched as the malformed body squirmed in the air with the substance. In an attempt, it tried to regrow another head, one that resembled hers, the hair with the same colour, the eyes and the white teeth. They stared at one another as it dripped on the floor, drowning and melting in the substance she never had to use before. For a second, she thought she'd hear words, which made her heart pound even faster. The children fainted even before she had the chance. Before seeing a hand popping out of the mouth, signalling it wasn't over. 'I will stab you again, stay back! Back I say!' Vanessa yelled, seeing it not as a dumb beast of a blob, it was a clever enemy now, even more than expected. She saw in the back, one of the bloated legs suddenly got pulled back inside of the body and it still had enough to shape limbs. Before melting, it would reach, and then she saw it at the bottom, laying under it. 'Fine, taken them then. This is a failure anyway.' The switch was in sight, the creature slow enough as to match the body side immediately flipped and the bones got pulled above. A rush came through as the blood came to the temples as she reached the other side and locked the door. With the key flipped and fully locked, what was left now remained to wait. Slowly breathing, a few steps were taken back. It was now that remained the hardest and most daring challenge she'd have to face. Is it smart enough then, to devour more phials? Or the children too? With the amount dipped in the tip of the knife, it should be dead, in less than a few minutes, even if it were to eat those children. I will wait and see, as I've got nothing else to say and do. If I were to fail, though. She stood and had nothing else to do. At the other side, it flew and held to a stop, floating a few steps away, though not getting close to the children. No mind formed as there wasn't enough time to develop, the previous one being melted. It was instinct then, through the last of its abilities out of the inner heads with no mouth came, as thin as a small drop of rain, a small fragment of skin extended. It took the size and girth of a small pole, extending and reaching to a point. Before dying and melting, it separated a small drop of itself in the ear of the child, then pulled away so it wouldn't leave a mark. The instinct of self-preservation came to be, even before the creation of its own mind. The skin remembered, holding the instincts intact, and in that small blob that floated through the air, the miniature that entered the boy. Everything was stored inside whilst the original body melted on the floor and the primordial substance vanished without a trace. Vanessa opened after the countdown was over, to find nothing inside. Still holding onto the tip, she looked around. Nothing. Below for any crack through which it could've ascended deeper below, to which again, she found none. 'You must be there!' Her innards pointed towards the ceiling, there was no mark there. It must be somewhere around here, the phial from which it came from is empty. It must've escaped somehow. To her thoughts now she was her enemy as well as her friend. There was the possibility that she might've been wrong and the phial would be full without her knowing. Again, she spoke to herself as she checked the room, disregarding for a moment the two children and their deep trance. Nothing in the nostrils, not even the fragrance of the acidic concoction that started melting it as it took form. Was that me then or not? It must've shaped itself, though it had none of my blood, it shouldn't have acted. Though she stopped, the noise made by the children were more than enough. 'Wake up!' At first not even a yell. 'I said wake up!' She came back at it once again, tenfold stronger, ready to come close to desperation and paranoid. It was late, too late to be doing so, though chance spoke. 'You're not waking up and I can't be taking risks.' She stepped inside the room, carefully stepping, doing her best to fight the dizziness and the sore eyes. And out of the drawer, a pair of chains were taken out. 'This is exactly what these were intended for, quite quaint if I'd have done it by another opportunity.' As she placed the pair, they matched the size of the children, even better than what she expected. Too deeply asleep to react, she tied them to a pole, so that, if it were to wake up, they would be restricted from approaching any of her precious merchandise. 'Have good night children.' Before the gate was closed, barred, thrown by the side, ended with her sleeping in the main hall, close to the stairs, too tired to go beyond. With her eyes going close to her bloody head, she saw through the window, the sky was calm, as was her deep sleep for the night. Outside, thrown the ash, the wooden homes were washed. She had forgotten and they were too far away, though no one else from the villagers would dare attempt a search at the palace. Too afraid, and every other place was already searched and done for, not even the sewers were open and they would've never had the chance to go down there. The men and women dealt with the sorrow and made their way home. 'We'll search again, first thing in the morning.' It was a voice from the group, the tone was altered by a small fragment of metal, deeply inserted under the jaw. Quite common and seen by many as a medical too, though, more than a few of them had the attachment there. They knew they couldn't stand for much longer and let it rust under the rain. 'Those children could be dead somewhere and none of us could know. We can't just stand and give up.' Hence the reason we're taking the break. We've reached our limits. The nameless man came closer, slightly separating himself from the others from the crowd. 'How I see it. There are two paths they could've taken. Either they went on the outskirts and they're might as well gone.' 'Flynt!' A preposterous shout arises. 'Let me finish first before you lay down your remarks woman. Now, the other one is inside there.' His hand pointed directly at the palace with its dormant spires, cutting the rain and the path below. 'So, we can wait for them to be returned.' 'If.' Again, she interfered. 'If, they're there. Else. We can barge in and take them back for ourselves. Or at least we'd be able to find out if they went there or not.' A silence came, so clear that, they could hear from miles away from a pool of water made in one of the public sinks. Blocked in a way that it left enough space for drops of water to bounce off as it reached the limit. They waited then for someone to break the silence with an idea, or something. Whatever else it took for them to go on. Yet, seconds could be felt through the cold and no one raised a word. Until. 'But we've not seen her in years. Never did we dare.' 'Well, it's clear then, we either wait or bust in. Though don't expect me to be so reluctant if you call me tomorrow.' Another voice interjected, as they now surrounded the man, seeing him in a different way now. In a different light, the rain stopped then. 'How could you be so heartless?' 'Don't call me name unless you want me to bust your pompous lip of yours. I warn you now, I won't hesitate to do so and throw you against her gate.' The man stopped, and muffled the pain, as he suddenly charged his teeth against his tongue to stop himself from speaking. It wasn't that he feared, but, he found himself to be intimidated by the stature of the man. 'And you will all do better and listen, I heard the tales about her and what she's doing there. All lies that she hasn't seen anyone in years, I've got word of people that had relatives come into contact with her and her twists.' 'And you're telling us now? Out of bloom? Bollocks, you're nothing but a liar and an ingrate of a man.' 'You challenge my honour there? Who do you think you are, if anything more than a baker with no proof behind your accusation. I've got the proof and I can show it in front of you all. Can you say the same and still stand tall, baker?' He's done it yet another time, silencing anyone that would oppose his speech. Though he hadn't the control over them, he already started feeling more nimble, he could feel his grip coming against them. 'Here!' He pulled out a small letter, still sealed with the marking on it, lifting it through the air, almost lit against the moonlight, the clear sky reflecting off the seal. Everything's going how I planned it, more or less, these damn simple peons know nothing of my intentions. 'So, now, that I've got you all, look at it baker and tell it yourself. Is this not the royal seal, use by the maverick herself? Have you all not seen one before? Because I'm sure you've seen it and even more.' It almost came force into his face and awe came. They spoke and stepped away, and at the same time, gathered as in an arc in front of him to see. 'Could it be real?' 'It's not a fake, my grandparents could regos Nie and attest, they've even shown me marking of it on papers.' 'But how could we know that you've not stolen it for yer purpose or some kind?' He has a good point, for a queer fellow, though. What's more important than what he's saying, how is this proof of her acting malicious? We've heard the rumours too so don't act like you're better than us with your stance and flip of the pillow! The moustache man that'd just yelled was called John the Frutshs. He's shown himself not only as a rival but also jealous that he hadn't had the chance to lead the group to search for the children and maintain his social equity. Now, as his mind was on a rise. Easy, with him out of the way, I could most easily take this for myself, perhaps even be credited as the one and only, finder of those children. 'It's only proper for the leader to have nothing to hide and even more so to not lie. Flynt can you even.' 'Shut your pesky mouth now you ingrate, I don't care about something so petty. And if you would stop interrupting me and let me explain that I've got more. You'd be a fool, even bigger than I thought to think that I could fake all of them.' His fingers ran under and broke the seal. At this point, windows were being closed and so were doors, the pets left away from the outdoors. Only the group of people remained, standing fairly farther away from the place. Flynt read is immediate, as it was and fairly short. If it wasn't for the curiosity, John wouldn't have been shut up like the rest of them. The name was said first, what laid at the top, addressed to no one in particular as she was smarter than that. Not enough to stop those letters from being stolen, but enough nevertheless. He continued saying. But as he tried, the hot-headed immediately interrupted. 'Hah, as I thought, a fake, a fake everybody. He's forgotten to add the address.' John twisted around to look at all of them, just to found himself strangely placed closer to Flynt. And not even that, the expressions didn't give him much to work, he knew then as well as lost. He turned not to an argument but a punch. It threw his jaw across his murky mouth as he stumbled like a drunken fool in the back. The rest were silent as a flock and continued listening, as for the man laying on the ground remained unconscious. 'Served him well. Now. This will serve as a patent for the rest. I need more, the last lot has failed. Send to usual.' Flynt stopped, read the signed name, then looked at them again. The blank faces explained everything he needs to know. Before one could raise a hand, he turned his back on them and leave, thrusting the letter into the wind. At the sight a woman from the crowd jumped, immediately trying to catch, as they sat there unable to react. Damn those fools and that witch. She must've known about me taking her letters, this was different than before. Flynt shook his head. He knew well, that he tempered with the letter, then forced the seal back. Precautions were taken earlier in the morning, even before the children went missing, yet, somehow the letter changed. And now, I failed. He said to himself, as he rushed into the darkness, away from everyone else. With some help, they recuperated and each went on their ways. All, but Flynt, who stood alone, not tired but mad. A fist was clenched, unable to keep his composure, he punched the first wall he saw. Rain started yet again. The drops were more than enough to wash away the dripping blood. And at the end of the tail of his eyes, he looked and saw, the entrance to the palace was open, in awe. 'If no one will help me, then very well, I can go inside and steal all of them.' His fist went into his pocket, the blood dried. Heading into the lion's nest, unable to fathom the risk that he'd die. Through mud he went, he saw a light, it was his lucky day, as the gate wasn't locked. The door closed behind him, and he was too distracted to see, that as he turned, he saw her there sleeping. 'On the steps?' His hands unintentionally flew to cover his mouth, unable to speak. Flynt realised, the second he stepped in, something wasn't right. Even after the removed, he felt a pierce through his chest and he found himself mute. The shock hit hard, as previously he thought her as a witch, only as an insult. However, now, he was mad, approaching the standing body with a slight distaste in his mouth. I'd get my revenge and show them. But he couldn't. Acting like a scared cat, he stopped midway after seeing a twitch under. Not a foot further, he looked and saw, on the sides, no other doors than the one that should've been closed. He didn't know why there was an open door, standing there open, though what was clear. She wasn't dead. And there might be a room on the side where I could step and steal all her letters. Perhaps I could show what she did and with that, I'd get, that would be more than enough. This was left out of him, only the thoughts, as when, even attempts of whisper ended up as barely audible, muffled words. So I'm not completely mute, huh? Your powers are leaving you, witch!' Ga. A. Grg. 'I'll make sure to take all of them, then ravage your spot, for I've trifled your disgusting attempt. Before he could turn, as he smirked at her, holding the tip and ready to enter an unlit room, the next step thrust him as the head hit the iron edge of the door. A blow was dealt as he fell down the stairs, holding his head, letting out as many mad sounds he could mutter, rolling as a carpet over the seemingly endless supply of stairs. And then, he finally reached the bottom, closed and broke his head. His corpse left there, dead, only a few feet away from the children who were sleeping. The night was then silent. Vanessa was sleeping through it, having a recollection dream, her every client. And every man she helped, before. Even a few years ago. One of the first people who dared give a fair amount of money to get revenge on another man and get away, with no evidence. It was so clear, she dreamed of him through the night, remembering it even better than what was written within the files. Resting safe below, a few hundred miles deeply there along the phials. Once, on the same plane, just a few meters away, another drawer laid, more rustic than what she had. Only the necessary was saved inside her memory, as she was trained to remember just certainties and no less. He was a commoner, surprisingly he had enough money to sustain her needs for the time. An oil discovery he said, and out of all, he'd used a big part of it to cover for the murder. To his knowing, he pretended to be a devil of a saint, which worked even better for them. 'I'll give you a third of what I own, a part of my money, a part of my oil. But let him die and cover it all. Unless he dies, I won't be able to take the money for myself.' It was clear, the reason and how much a scum he was, he'd wager even his soul for the money. Even the thought would seem insane, he'd most likely backstab them after. But Vanessa wasn't alone, she was guided, in her dreams, the wails becoming words, only clear to her ears and mind. And not only did they guide, but they bore a small fragment of insight. The beast below spoke one night before the man came. Appearing in her dream, floating, the head standing at the same height as her. 'Do my bidding and listen with much care. A man will come to you and give you much and ask you for what I've got. What I've given to you out of my orifice is a blessing which you will keep using and you will be done. He will give you fragments of his hair, blood and a part of his guts.'And everything happened, as three jars were given, the harder the task, the more demanding would be for the body to take shape. A jar filled with blood, the amount would be deadly if it were taken from an infant. It had a stench and demanding to be placed away from any nostrils that had to be saved. The other had hair, with blood on the tips, strangely placed in another jar. It must've hurt, she pondered, being viciously pulled from the head. It occurred that the man, the lucky peasant in front of her might've not been the most mentally sane person she'd get to encounter. When the third one came, she almost fell into shock, enough to send convulsions through her memory, across time and reaching her body on the stairs. For a moment, she snapped out and it was still night. Somehow, out of all the memories she had and everything she witnessed, this stood out. Not a word was said, knowing that she couldn't back down, having to fully experience the memory, she had to. The jar that had, a part of the man's gut, surgically removed, clean, yet dirty. It was also sewn at each end, so no more would be spilt out of it. She knew that there was something else inside of it, shoved and sealed, it was unnaturally bulked for such a thing, especially detached out of the body. Whoever transmitted the information of what was needed to the man, told him something additional to bring. And that thing that resided below of them, which would have to satisfy hunger wasn't to be trusted. For now, though, she stood and nodded, bringing a phial, bulking with the primordial substance, forming shapes in its jar. Somehow it was anxious to be given form, especially hungering from the jars that were on the table. Her hands could barely contain and visibility she saw the nail polish off her nails melt, sag and go on their own. The thoughts were the clearest in her dreams, even more than what she saw. And wondered. This hasn't happened before, not once, not at all. Though I've no choice to make, the family depends on this. The heritage must be preserved. Vanessa remembered how pressured she felt, to make that decision, her reasoning as well not being enough. Doubts came but they were ignored, the substance got even more volatile when her thoughts manifested. When she stopped, full of doubt, the substance circled around the phial, with the help of the empty space between it and the cap, it used the space to go back and forth, then thrust against the glass. Cracks appeared, and it was dropped, landing on the table, splashing all over the three jars. The splashes, surprising both of them, trusted as they lunged and pierced through all three jars, pulling all of them closer to the centre. It resembled a pile of moulded skin then, pierced and combined with strains of hair, drinking the blood of the last jar before standing there, pulsating to grow. 'Is that all?' The man asks her with a monotone, unfazed by what he's seen or heard. She knew that there was no moment there and nodded, making way for him outside. Nothing else was said between the two of them after, as the deal was done. Then the waiting came, she would go and see, every single day, watching it grow on the table, bigger and bigger up to a point. It had mass, that was fair to say. And the only previous things she knew about how they would come to be was that they would get to resemble the ones that they were bred from. Almost like a 'Son.' She said, looking at it, across the room, in her pearl white hands a cigarette. It would go there, and be release, another pile of mass that would plunge at the bottom of the ravine, hoping that it wouldn't get splashed. The first time, it had a shell, the skin melted then reformed and didn't break once it reached the bottom. Not only did she remember but the first fall left there a mark and quite a memorable size. But what was a small hole compared to the others? The second one was bigger, now this one even more so. And it's been silent, below, over some time. No update, no further instructions, the dreams remained bleak after. This was a first, a dangerous risk, as for the first time in many years, she felt fear. Vanessa stood, day after day, most of the nights at the end of the door, watching it grow, just a mass but no shape so far. 'I wish you were more. Human. Perhaps that way I'd less fear you than I do now. Or might it be the other way around?' Her gaze, though when away, she could still feel the skin and weight bounce off the table, constantly, wanting to pop. Even then, she remembered what made her hope it would work. That one day. Someone came by the door, suddenly the knock echoed through the other room. Merely a few feet away from her stood the hall. No one scheduled to come and meet her, and the main entry was so close, she barely made it in time to lock and prevent raising suspicion. The gate opened and a ray of light came in. The silhouette of a two people was barely recognisable because her hands already covered her sight. Strongly, the light made her back away. Two people stepped in, with deformed faces. 'Who?' Before she could finish her question, inside a neck a lump formed, and the only thing she could do was spit all of it out. The two wore suits but the faces resembled the one from the depths, elongated from the bottom of the torso, wearing a top hat for the man and a wig for the woman. Suddenly she has bounced away from the memory and woke up, the light coming through the window yet again. She realised she was being called. With the morning routine taking, she forced it to go faster, eating and drinking before heading down. 'It felt so surreal.' Her vibrancy felt a strange feeling she hadn't felt, unable to determine if it was caused by the memory or something else. Though, when she was done, looking at the door, quickly, with a swipe, she saw no one around on the outside. No man nor woman, not even a child or bird would come to her. I can feel this coming to me. She thought as she headed down, being too exhausted, unable to fully stretch through the pain of sleeping on the stairs. Scratching her eyes, she failed to see that there was blood on the walls where the head bounced, over and over as deeper she descended. It felt like a stroll but she grasped a slight shock. A man laid there dead, at which the first reaction was to put her hand in her pockets and see for the key. Still there. It was a pool of blood and the twisted neck what gave it away, though she didn't come any closer. She asked. 'Is this a trick? Are you the being that erupted out of there?' For a second she waited for an answer, thinking that, remembering that, she locked everything, she must've. Has that malformation taken her shape and form, just to mess with her and then reveal how dangerous and smart it really was? Has it bypassed the locked door and laid a trap for her? This must be the explanation for it, he doesn't look like any of my slaves that now work down there. Her mind remained sharpened, as she saw, the door behind, that slightly pierced the end of the skull, was still locked. It wasn't that. 'Damn my recklessness. If it weren't for it!' She sighed, realising that the chance might've been the latter. It gave it away after some close observation of the blood left, barely inches away from her. It leads towards another painted hit mark on the wall, the another, and another one. More than likely leading above. 'You're an outsider. Or, you were. They will be looking for you, aren't they right now?' Her paranoid dropped down, though now there was another problem, having to deal with the villagers if it came for questioning. Two missing children, a dead body, the only place that. It then clicked in her head. 'You were looking for them, weren't you?' Vanessa was so close, that her breath bounced off the cold dead body, becoming hot air. Truly obvious, he wasn't such a spawn as she expected, therefore he could be ignored. 'Quite an easy response, if it will come for anyone to stumble at my door. But for you, my dear, humble man, you came here unwelcomed. I'm sorry to announce then that you must get out.' The key was already two-thirds inside the lock and the door was open at her command. They will know what to do if it came to stumbling to a body, and with the design of the stairs, as the edges were sharper and narrower, it would be even easier for the body to stumble and fall down. As it did in front of her eyes, spread, even more, drops of blood on the walls down there. It was already painted with blood, and with the time, perhaps some of the paint has gone off. Perhaps he was a blessing, she thought. Brought only to renew the fainting paint over there. Before closing it, to return, she stood there in front of the lock. Remembering what happened last night. She opened it after, both children were both sleeping then, and there was no mark on the floor. A misjudgement there and I'm nothing more, but lucky that I didn't end up dead because of my own damnable fault. It looks like they will have to wake once and for all and I've not the intention to keep the shackled. She untied and got ready to open the close dome, resuming the activities, just as those below. And from far away, the city awakened, as for her own, everyone got ready to search for the missing boy and her sister. Though between one and the other, almost directly mirroring them. It laid there, the cracked skull, almost shattered, the man woke and came closer to the edge. He thought again, still dazed by the whiplash of the stress, and what had to be done next. He hadn't had a cup of water in a while, the thought of which made him smile. 'For a sailor without a son, without a ship. Without water so sail in.' He was thirsty and in front of him, on the bottom was the entry into the land of sand, the land of thieves. Though he tried swallowing as he saw one, perhaps a chance, he backed up and started pushing, the skull of his son. With sheer will alone, he pushed and managed to get it closer towards the edge, despite being so many time bigger than him. He yelled then so high that he'd even risk being heard by those who were miles above and more in their homes. 'I'm coming back Vanessa and I swear.' With the last fragments of moisture, he had in his mouth. 'I will make you revive my son!' He continued. Pushing and pushing as it was coming through the desert, the sandstorm with its moving whirlwind. With some luck, he thought. If I'm lucky enough, we will both be taken inside and thrown directly against her castle. She will listen then, no matter what. Then he threw it over the edge, whilst the mouth opened. He followed and landed inside of it, just as the whirlwind's strike hit his end of the cave, taking him inside. His body was barely held tight by the arms and legs that stood between the inner walls. Still, above, in the foremost city of the land, people lived and none even noticed, as the whirlwind only scraped the edges of it, unnoticed. It barely even lifted itself to the level, as the city borders themselves challenged the clouds, making it change direction. Somehow, nature itself fought against those who wanted and desired to fight against those who dare challenge. But nature wasn't the only forced involved. Distracted from what was happening, Vanessa didn't notice, untying all the shackles got her full attention. Though, one of the phials trembled, just to push itself and break free from its trap. Just as the man was ready to lose the last of his strength, the wind taking them to another wing, where he would most certainly die. The gust of wind threw what remained, still weak, primordial gas towards the skull to reform itself. He released his hands and as he was ready to land with his skull against the teeth, as hard as they were before, he was stopped, the tongue, barely formed itself and wrapped around. 'You're alive!' The man said in shock. Another pair of wings sprouted, before, far, she finally notices, the shards on the floor. Before she reached them, the first pair of winds already reached the ground, as broken as they were and shattered. It burst through the whirlwind of sand, tearing it apart with the strength of the winds, as blind as it was, it kept flying. Having it all memorised, it kept flying towards the same destination, as the silhouette was seen, from far away. She laid helpless, at what happened, wondering how could it be? That it somehow escape and went there, flying and abandoning it's home again. The key almost flew and would've gone unnoticed, and for a fair reason too. Seeing one of her creation just abandon her and fly as far away as it could. And in its mouth, yet another silhouette, not that she needed that to know. A darker shade in a lighter one, the wings visible and ahead, it was closing in. 'So you're going there anyway?' She knew well what he wanted and it was clear that she failed. It was too late for an attempt to recall, after seeing it plunge to the ground and shatter. With a turn, she realised, after a shock. The phial was already shattered and he was gone. For the first time in a hundred or more years, the peace in the city was broken, as all of them heard and witnessed the crash. Every family, hard working or less, they gathered to see, the final remains of bones, feathers and fragments spread across the sidewalk and some that were thrown and penetrated the wall. He sailed his last ships, in the arms of the first man that was there to witness what happened. Either the sharp ounces of sand that were thrown or the end of the feathers, but he was blinded. Despite that his throat was parched and he didn't see, the man asked. 'Am I home?' His last breath then vanished into the wind. Now, for him, life was truly over, as it was one of his sons. The dream he had, that none of the ones watching over his body, was to sail, somewhere atop of the sea. And now, along with a gust of the wind, the spirit that chose not to return now chose a different path, to sail along his father, forever, beyond. Vanessa was crushed after seeing not even a fragment return, she had no plan for situations like this one, nor could've she expected such. 'Damn you to pieces, you scrawny man!' She lost her composure, being the only reaction she could achieve, none of the other things she had in mind would've helped her reach anything. Her goals were now clear as she returned, passing both the children who were awake, scratching the end of their eyes. 'Come on, we're going already.' But to think of such endeavour and what it meant. They think, first that one resembling me after already having a body, immediately this. They might be getting way too dangerous to contain. 'What is that?' The children stopped at the sight of a repugnant trail of blood, though the boy wasn't as scared as his sister was, signalled by the slight pale expression on his face and indifference she noted. 'Are you used to blood boy?' Suddenly the voice changed in him, by the slightest intonation to an entire feeling of concentrated determination. 'I've dealt with it before, cleaning that is.' It was the first thing, sane that came out of the children, though suspicious. Too suspicious. She knew too well what it meant, one night spent there, perhaps they could've been affected. 'What about you girl? Have you?' But she backed before her's brother's back and said not another word after. 'Follow me then, come on, hurry up!' It was a command stronger than any other she had given in the previous nights to her other servants, especially after she had witnessed what she did. Have I dreamed what I saw, the outside wind trying to get my heart? Or. She had stopped in the same spot before. A recoil came after, at which both of the kids stopped and looked at her for a second, back to the stainless gate and the blood. 'Right, you two have seen more than your fair share!' And if I remember correctly, they've seen more than enough past the door, which means, if the word would get around I could have a riot. Peasants. 'Very well, follow me and don't stall.' Past her underground tower and her main hall, they went straight towards a door, not as barred but as high. The dinner room and the menagerie went through as quick as their name surrounded the scent of food. 'Not now, you're not to be fed, yet.' I cannot starve them either, people will start to suspect, perhaps a certain concoction may distort their memories of wipe them entirely, yes. It came several times, in her deepest part of her mind, the thought of erasing everything they've ever had, the thoughts of her home and even the smallest patch of dirt. But then again, they'd notice if I went too far, returning ten times broken than what they are now. The room they now entered, as both of them were pushed inside was at least a dozen times larger than their home. Not a moment, in which they stood inside her varied assortment of rugs and curtains, picked from various places of the world had they wondered, how? How could it be that she has all of this?Wondered the girl.Is she as evil and vile as everyone claims her to be?Surely someone who has so many trinkets and valuables in a place such as this couldn't be evil.'Brother, psst!'She didn't seem to care for the two children, despite how carelessly she appeared to be whilst dealing with the situation last night.Neither how calm and rational they appeared to be.Her brother appeared normal, though inside there was no voice, his thoughts now empty and he merely responded with a dull.'What is it?'Not the most silent of approached though he did not manage to get her attention.It was clear, even though it was a big place, with plenty of rooms, enough to keep the entire town inside, it was ever hollow inside.No one around, leaving more than enough time for her to search and them to follow.'Do you fancy her?'Usually, he'd blush when asked if there was a girl he thought to fancy, especially when it came towards someone of a bigger difference than him, though now.Now he did not.A first for all it seemed.Perhaps the eeriness of the sanctum, the inside fountains and gardens that freely grew in the wind they came.The door was bitter, though she was moved by it too.'Have I missed for so long?'She asked loudly, though the children, both of which, to their surprise, felt astonished by what they saw.The growth of lumber and of dirt, patched of grass on the wall, all kept there by the three roots and branches that acted like convenient nets.It was one of her previously such forgotten experiments.It took a few seconds, as the children were distracted by a small ranch of fireflies that lived nearby the root channel, to notice.A mark of such stature that only she could see it, from the height and angle, the full image, so they say.It was here where I tried to breed one of them.The memory filled the room with mist, the children were not mere, but adults, and more of them standing at a presentation of the sorts.There, where once was a plentiful lane, was a table, left with nothing on it but a jar, big and flagrant in a sense.More than enough was place inside, though a mistake that was further fixed in the future that once was.The past.'There or Rollinghster.As I promised, is it not what it appears to be?'It's well, more than enough for the price, ain't that right men?'The laughter of pigs and cronies was still, to this date and her memory, fill with the belches and scent of the orchard.A mould of meat, strangely place and covered in green.She had forgotten that it wasn't entirely as she had thought to be.'Why is that so puke-like boss?Is it supposed to be so?'Oh, quit your blabbering, it was all me.I thought that it'd be fine to add some seasoning, after all, ya' know, since he's about to take his last meal of the day, all before he dies and all?'What?'The outrage was more than enough, it was ready to pop.'You weren't supposed to do that you fool! I've told you what ingredient to bring to me and nothing more!'Relax woman, I'm more than sure this won't be ruined, heck, it could even be better, as I said.Just watch it men and see.'And so it rose, the bubble, first blister of skin, at such a height that the small patch of grass reached the ceiling and spread across.Suddenly they all backed away, ever afraid, to not be touched or injured by what it laid.The scent was horrid, puke and the dead, the grass diminished as it spread.More blisters covered the meat, as a small human tried coming out.A first pop, almost thrown like an artillery blast, almost like a newborn child in appearance, still connected to the unshrunk trunk.A torso with barely any features, still attached, bashed its head and crushed it on the floor, skin filled with blisters and crying, asking in an unknown, unspoken language.The imagery was too much for them to handle as one fainted, grabbed by another.Immediately, some associates ran away from their boss, afraid of the repugnancy they felt, leaving him alone.'Why is this happening?'He asked alarmed, though he did not dare touch her anymore, it was pure fear as he saw how unmoved she remained.It was almost as if she could control and perhaps even prevent it from happening, yet she refused.'I have told you many of times lord Rollinghster, dare not add another, now witness and learn from what you've done.' Another popped, then another, laid the bodies stacked one upon the other. Blisters melted and connected all of their bodies, just to stay. Thought it all changed as she left him to run away. 'Dear oh dear, what shall I do with you now? What must I do to prevent any of your kind from repeating the same thing you've come through, again and again.' A plant that I did not notice? Connected with the tendrils that were already there. The rest was the spreading and how it become, part of the ecosystem of the lane that they were now in. It was at a lesser level when she first came upon the sight of it. Not as headstrong, as spread, as bright, and as evolved. Where there once tiny veins on the wall, roots came to be, where the children played with fireflies? 'Back away children, now!' She yelled alarmed, from the recollection of her memory, only then she reminded herself that there was no way from them to come inside. 'Show me your hands now!' As they came, she noted and watch, every single patch of the hand, making sure they had none of what laid there. Every inch and ever small crevice on the hand was checked, with careful use of her silk gloves, whilst making sure they'd not get closer to her skin. One touch with it would be more than enough, as she did not want to witness what happened the other night once again. Other than a few scratches, old and already sealed, and some amalgamations of dead skin, everything appeared to be in order, no less than what was expected from them. 'We're taking another route, go back now children.' 'But why?' 'No, but, go back now!' She exclaimed, daringly using an intimidation technique with no care that they were children. With a slap, she pushed them out of the room, just to make sure she looked at everything, the corners and what once was a room. Beyond that door, I dare not enter, though they will have the time to thank me later. There laid the other glance, as she looked and saw, where the children played and what they believed to be a nest of fireflies, glowing near the roots. Though unnoticeable by the untrained eye, she saw right through, the small system of long wires, white and rubbery, appearing to be melting with each second yet unmoved or unchanged by it. So, even after so many years, it managed to develop itself, the basic instinct of a hunter, pulling its pray just to tear it apart. What wasn't as clear to other was that it took the characteristics of the Dionaea muscipula, known commonly as the Venus flytrap, only but at a more advanced stage, a cleverer approach that could've worked. 'It did not. Though I've no idea if any of you that failed to escape that day are here, I'm terribly sorry but I'm now inclined to disappear. And unfortunately for you, I've not forgotten how poorly you dared tread me.' Alas, she closed the door, sealed by a lock, with the key thrown into the outdoors. The window barred and the wing never to be seen again by the eyes of anyone, which played to her a bitter song, a memory lost now, for the best of the land. 'And you two, you've stood here for some time. I do hope you heard nothing, or else I'd feel inclined. "No ma'am. I and my brother stood here and waited, doing nothing wrong." Shh.' She pointed at her to shut her trap, and immediately she stopped. The boy said nothing but stand. Not in the mood for it I presume, perhaps there's something in that small head of his after all. It was a call, she pointed to return. Already some time was lost and she had yet to realise. If I had forgotten about that, it could mean that I have failed other experiments here. And even further away, people in the town started to realise, there was more to the world than what they thought. For the story was remember, soon to be said from every single point that could be counted from there. Some accounts said that they've seen, despite the oldest awakening of it, they saw the winged beast come and fly, touch the sky. And abomination. 'A monster, I tell you. I dare not speak ill of else, though I may be smitten and die if I were to say otherwise.' The crone was haggard and she smelled, a bad omen, she used to tell. Never did she belong in the biggest of towns, though even the tallest and brightest were corrupted and had the slightest of disgust. On a crate, she stood, near a crowd that listened to her and the mockery she had said before. No less than the worst of depths she had come from, only to deceive the eyes and yell in disgust. 'I had seen and can approve, come here my son and take me down.' A big oaf of a man came, his chin was sharp with the complexion of a brick, both head strong and bitter, though he's shown no sign of mental weakness or anything else of the sort. His gaze looked cold, ignoring even the most prominent stare of wonder of astray, looking at him and her, as he helped his mother lay down. 'I can attest to what my mother said. I see doubts in all of your hearts.' He made his way through the crowd as they all backed away, his body blocking the view from those in the back, whilst the ones in front were sudden to reach their brows and hold in place. Go ahead my son, as the crone said to herself. This is the moment you've waited for, your entire life. 'And where is the mayor of this town? The one who swore to defend you all, to prevent and help on such occasions? He's nowhere, that's where!' 'Yeah. Yeah. Yes!' The voiced echoed, a sudden glance in the crowd and it was almost as if their spirits were born by it, by his voice and desire. He aspired to be a leader and they were the bread his mother so desperately wanted to be fed. Now, he stood and looked, pointed. 'There. Have you seen the obvious already? It came from there!' His voice, this time was met with a sudden silence. None dared, so far, as any other, nor any other time to ill speak of the citadel. It still reigned in their nightmares and with fear. 'Look upon her and her past, what she's done now and then, what she'll do will become the end of us all if we do not put an end to her reign!' The sudden conviction came back, as none of them could help but cheer, all until one. The single man who had some sense. 'But what can we do against her? We're but simple people, ever since...' The peasants's voice was disabled for a moment. Confronted by the stature he had, his voice was cut short. Even though he felt as if he was in front of a mountain, he suddenly feels his shoulder shudder, a hand coming down and firmly pressing itself against. There was no pain despite the difference in stature between the men, yet. 'I remember what she did, and what she said. Haven't we all? How she said she'd reduce our lovely city to dust? Or how she will incinerate us all? Do not take me for a full though I spit on her empty threat and what she has to say. She's nothing more than a liar, that I can promise you all. Nothing she's ever said came to an end, though now, her rejections are coming to us.' At this point, even those who were distracted now had their attention straightened at him. His mother spoke nothing, as the conviction managed to get her still, even as she somewhat did not expect such a thing to come out of her son. If you are my son, though I have never heard you speak of anything with such a tone and power, the strength in your voice couldn't be now matched by anyone other. Oh, how she knew and wanted to talk, the thought desperately tried crawling out, through scratches hidden, behind her endless tresses of hair, though obscure so no one would see as well. Not a word, that would interrupt him and break the appeal, there was a time for everything, though this wasn't the one. 'She sees us as her personal heap of trash and does nothing else but treat us as she fits. Do we deserve such a thing?' 'No.' Came out in a choir. Her mother looked at them, though still said nothing, carefully noticing so she's got to time herself with them. 'Will we stand and see fit that she keeps doing such to us? I asked you all if we deserve to suffer at the hands of a spoiled young brat as herself? Do we?' 'No!' It came again, yet his mother's lips failed to move. The crone backed away slowly and managed to snick. She knew that there was something else she was able to do, even to a more helpful way than standing there. As he had notice, by the tail of the eye, she was gone, nowhere to be found. Go, mother, you know where they'll follow me. And what he said next. 'We go and ask the so called esteemed mayor of our town, grab everything you can. And utmost all, do not forget, no matter the man, woman or child, we are stronger than what she has to offer. Her army is long gone and other than the abominations for which her people are so delightfully ignorant about matching nothing of ours. Do we deserve then to be kept in darkness?"No!"Do we deserve to be spoiled and treated like children?"No!"The voices got louder, as with a slight of the foot, he easily crushed the box his mother once stood upon and continued. A strong gaze towards the tower of boxes, in which the mayor has built his mockery of the citadel, at which he now pointed. 'Are we going to keep acting like children and mock her instead of taking a stand?'No!No!We will not!Never!"The voices, the forces were finally rallied as they started grabbing tools and weapons off the ground. They looked around and loomed before spreading to get others, torches lit and shouts bound to be thrown around. In front, he stood and laid upon the infantry, with nothing but the conviction and the will to lead them towards to kingdom that laid, so far away, yet close at leaps across the sky. The first battle they'd take at was at the mayor who finally took notice, shaking in his boots, watching how more and more gathered. A bright like, red and pink had awoken him from his sleep, as it was too apparent in his grey, dark green town. It used to be the jewel of the seas across the seas and even beyond. Though now, it's lost even the slightest hints of vibrant colours, of conviction and fate. It was plighted, though men and women alike remained delusional of the grand all times. None dared speak of the she-devil, yet when one dared say, they all followed. And when he confronted the one who stood atop the rubble, the flame finally burst as they faced. No word, they stared. The fear in his eyes was clear though at the same time. 'I've no intention to have you killed the mayor, come down now so we may speak the terms.' "You dare speak to me of terms? Of which rights?"The right of the people as you may see for yourself. We've all grown tired and sick of standing here, basking in what the town used to be like, being spat upon by a ruler grown bitter. The same way you've become if I am not wrong. "There was a gap between them, in which there was no air, nor would the flame get to, if he decided to jump. He'd feel not the pain or plight of the cleansing head, but the hardness of the ground, the death at the beat of the heart. His assistant stood just across the table, afraid to come closer to the light. Though he still whispered, as slithering as he needed to be, ready to snick away if he had the opportunity to. 'We must go now, who knows what that brute would do to us, my dear mayor.' "Shh, I'm not ready to give it up yet. 'The title would've been gone the moment he laid a step outside, along with everything he had, his position and control over the people, his servants. Though, of which have already left, only a hand of slithering ones that staid only to watch and look for an opportunity to pillage for their own benefits. Still, the promise of fire was way too strong for him to deny, especially with those more willing to do so. He complied. From his tower of chip dirt and parts, he finally decided to come down, alone with none of the pillagers he hired before. There was a long way down, through the long path of stairs, the many endeavours and memories he had there. 'I've built everything, every room and floor I'm passing.' He spoke to himself, as no one of those who had sworn to serve him listened to what he had to say. Though none of it was him alone, as in the previous time he served under others, above others who ruled over others too, that eventually gave orders to build and build. Extending to a time so forgotten that no one knows or remembers who gave the order originally to build the city and his so-called architectural mockery, that which he called even grander than hers. A rival that wasn't even aware of his existence at all. 'Damn that nobody. Though. 'He'd not realised, that, the extra move he had gotten managed to clear his mind, to devise a desperate plan. Perhaps I will even be able to turn this on my own and be clear, they will all see me for who I am. A leader. A leader who now stood afraid on the other side of the door, knowing and seeing the shadow of the towering man extending through the crevice under the door. The light was strong and he knew that there wasn't any way to escape, even there. He held the only key to the treasure room, which no one else but him knew about. Not a moment after the third knock on the door, he opened it in fear that it'd break and he'd drown at the base of the flame. 'I present myself, to my people!' A crowd stood there, by the time he reached the bottom, more than a quarter of the city was present in the square, all waiting and looking at their mayor. 'A rat peeking out of the sewer.' 'Shh children.' Only whispers, though not that far from the truth. He came out to look at the cat who waited for him to come. 'Alas, you've finally come. Now, we may speak of man to man.' As he took another step. The difference in height was slightly unnerving, as he couldn't swallow, a trait which had kept him from handling delicate situations for years. This is new, I hadn't expected him to come, though I've no intention. 'None whatsoever to take your place or take you down. I've come here only to ask for your support, to support your people.' The rain started as torches flew even brighter, ignited by the water that was drowned in the air which came from the sky. None of them was wet as it avoided contact with the skin, pulled only by the flames, instead. 'I.' He grasped his neck, forcefully making it swallow the saliva that had been accumulating in his mouth. 'I accept!' And he bowed his head, daring not say any more than that. Time has let him shy, after laying so much in solidarity of his mockery of a tower. He had become now the mockery of his people too. Some laughed, the children especially of the younger range, others pointed, whispers and the rumours came to life. Fat, gluttonous pig, how could have they ignored such a slob that stood there in his tall sewer, with his rat servants, as pale as he was. His gaze and voice reduced to nothing until the man spoke. 'That's enough!' It ended fast, peculiarly, they ate from his hands just like that. The control he had on them, especially since they didn't even realise it was more than unexplainable or unnoticeable, it was close to being directly controlled through their minds. Such vigour, the arousal of thoughts, how he dared defend even that disgusting slob. 'He is our mayor, our appointed leader. We've not come here to lower ourselves to become like her, we've come here to be granted support and that is what we'll get. So I ask you, mayor of this town, your family ruled here for generations and the times has come for you to take a stand. Will you come and join us then?' 'Me? Join you?' 'You've heard it right. Look at your people, all of which have come, all those who now have been awakened to come. Even small peeps could be seen from inside, as those to whom he referred as pillagers, cutthroats and pitiful servants, came down too, pulled, even in their bitterness and untruthfulness by him. Lights were shining brighter, forks and swords, bits of armour that were left as trinkets left by their long passed ancestors, it was a pseudo-army preparing for war. A leader was there, which rallied the troops, and still. They came here, for me. I will! I will!' He said it again, this time ready to come, he stepped out, which no one thought he'd do, coming outside to see everyone and join the call, hearing the cheers. Even though he thought, wrongfully that those were for him, he gladly accepted, even the blunt pan, appearing as if it was an old war hammer in disguise, the colander to cover his head, ready for war. He joined their little game with no care for what they were embarking on. Back past them, even other than his gaze as he took lead and started marching through the road. She had no idea, nor did the people who were still acting upon and talking about the disappearance of their mate. The taverns were full and work was still in progress, the buildings had been in the process of rebuilding ever since the great fire.

Hold

He was a tyrant, the last of the four wise leaders to be seen outside of the citadel. Seen by the people not only as a tyrant but possibly the last one that they'd ever get after the death of the last fair king. It was that gloriously catastrophic day that the citadel was assaulted, the walls attacked, rugs burnt and stolen, the gets shattered and the rebellion began. 'Down with the false king!' 'Let him pay, let him suffer the fate, of the others!' 'Murder and bring him down!' 'Let him drown in the blood of the people below of him!' The voices called as the assault went and even now it remained engrained in the minds of the people there and the youngling who'd hear the stories through second ears. Exaggeration could always come and be breed by those who did not care nor desire anyone else to know the real truth behind the events. So they say, on the day of the assault, they spit acid out of their mouths, to drown and murder the yet king that has done so much for their humanity. Blamed as he was. 'He took my body and my arms.' 'He took my every human part.' And replaced, bits of everyone in his kingdom, taking without a clear purpose or answer to their questions. The reality that laid in front of him was unknown, yet he remained, the fairest king of them all. Above the assaulted gate, laid a sign that said, in the language, old, contrasted with the new. I will forever lay a fair rule over the land of the mankind. Written and carved at the command of he himself, chosen between. Even then, when everyone else abandoned, he locked himself, alone in his citadel of black gold. No radiance of the sun, the metal sagged and became something more else, darker with his presence, yet they say he remained fair to all those who were under his rule. So much of it was enforced, that he became, along with the three previous ones god-like seen being, of which existence was denied of being true. Though the people who were there knew. The leader, especially him, breaking his golden armament and covered face, became quickly the hero of the tale, leading them, despite coming from unknown. A folk-like tale boy, that came to rule them away from strife and starvation. He held the ram as well, and pushed with the might he had, breaking the statues that laid on each side. The maid of glory as tall as the blind goat, both humanoid statues broke with each blow. Cracks made them weaker, up until the point they fell apart, not anymore made of gold. No longer did they hold the gate still, and it shattered, the royal wood pampered. So many of them united, the entire city came through and barraged everything in sight, the castle's inside remaining unrecognisable after the first second's fight. He had time to bitterly remember, as he stared from the top of his balcony, having the view of the kingdom he rules. 'In a time like this, how could I not compare myself with the old king?' It was a question in poor taste, as he knew that his servants would not dare respond truthfully, without a doubt. 'No, sir. We would not dare.' 'So you'd make me appear like a fool in front of the other servants then?' It came as no surprise as he remained, ever since his youth a provocateur. The so-called servant who used to be fellow rebelled now remained broken, laid with jaws lowered and older by the lack of grin, the pale expression and eyes to match their sin. Betrayal that is, for, what they swore in the rebellion, that they'd never truly bow down to a false leader, only to move from one to another. 'I'm terribly sorry, I did not mean to..' 'Them, do I or do I not appear the like the old king? Answer me man.' 'You. You do, my harbinger.' No sign of further objection was known, from him or the others, though they knew well enough that, on the other side of the tainted chamber, the guards eavesdropped and waited for them to be excused, only to send the servants to the torture room. 'Oh how much I've decayed.' He said, looking down at everyone else, a thousand times bitterly than how the king looked when he alone entered his room. It was something that he alone, the leader who brought all the clans, houses and outside helpers together to break in. To come face to face and challenge the king, in his own throne room at a waltz of grim death which would bring him nothing more than renown. The hero that had brought the ruler of famine and death down. Nothing but a young man with a rusty blade, cut in half, cracked down with no guard. Despite having a peculiarly shaped door, that'd be able to withstand one thousand replaced rams, the door was not locked. 'He waited for me.' It ran through his head again, though this time, coming out as nothing but a whisper. 'Harbinger.' But before the servant could finish, he dismissed them all without any given reason. 'Out, all of you, I must be left alone.' They nodded and left, none of which made any attempt. None foolish at that, to think they could get past the armour he had. 'I couldn't have had this.' The power that permeated the dim light out of the once used as a gage glove, made out of the metal from which the citadel was built from shuddered. 'But it's more than this.' And so it was true, it was more than the armour, the citadel and the town of which he ruled upon, he had won dominion in even more cities and town, smaller and bigger, despite spending most of the time there. In a throne room, surrounded by maps, straightened on the walls, embed in the floor, even the top had, from every angle, every side of the world. So that he had everything in sight, some given life in front of his eyes. Accompanied by tools of war, tables of which furthers plans of conquest would be made, supplies shifted and further plans discussed. Out of everyone, he had accomplished the most. The most. 'The most.' Only to be shadowed, that, as the king, who, he know realised how much he welcomed defeat, became a prisoner of the chamber he was one in. 'The most trapped of them all.' There was no one else in his place, to give up such freedom, the one of youth and the brave, only to be replaced by anger and hatred for everyone else. He hadn't known then, that he'd become what he despised, just like others, coming as a shock, when he told everyone how he fought the king who waited. And spoke. 'I waited for you to come, boy, as.. Now.' The words were as lost as the sea of words from which everything he said sprouted, gone with his passing, never having to give any other explanation to anyone else who asked. What was spoken between the two of them remained, locked in a chamber that wasn't locked, held by people who dared assault their leader, only to face the consequences after? And not even now, it wasn't enough. 'You will take my place after I am dead, boy, don't forget what I've told you so far.' 'Very well.' And then he agreed, to them, even as the eavesdropping seemed to have failed, they've finally heard a thump, and another, followed by another. It was the breaking sound that resonated until there was nothing to be found. When they finally entered, they saw him stare, the youth wearing the king's raiment, as heavy and too big for his size as it was, in the distance and below. Down there they had realised that, in the last moment of the fight, with glances and small pools of blood laying everywhere around, the final resting place of the king laid nowhere to be seen. Broken and shattered into dust particles before he'd even get the chance to reach the ground. A fate even more evenly than what he deserved, unfair that he'd not suffer or lay broken in front of the boy, which held his sword, now old, needing of repair. Every night that came, he stared, to those who watched above at their false ruler he seemed a tyrant, looking for bits of the old king. Other believed that the king possessed him from their conversation and the only reason for his staring was to taunt the spirit of youth that was lost in the ripest of age. Truth be told, he was the only one who knew the answer, past the stronghold he had, further into the land, past the distant reach of his rule and beyond every sea and small formation of dirt and plea. Laid one of the kingdoms away from his rule, that declares a war a long time ago, if it didn't mean being crushed, for, as many armies, as he had, there laid a stronger power than the one of the king. The islands that were out of his conquest remained the homes, masters of weather and of the old, their craft remained, looking and predicting, so that they never lost a war. Old cronies spoke of their activities, yet none believed at first. Though, even farther than where the tyred laid, and closer to the weather plane, there he laid in the cut trunk of a tree, sleeping as one without a care. A dream achieved on the backbone of a thousand tiny dreamers in their dying little beds, that could create a kingdom so strong, that, in the middle of all barriers and every line of defence, laid a town, secluded from the rest of the world. And yet he did not know. None of them, knew, in their houses made of imported wood, though in centuries and generations, none of which questioned why the trees did not match their homes. 'Why can't we go past this forest? Or this sea? Why can't any of us get past from any point we need to go in order to be free?' Some asked, to only be denied, until they tried and failed, returning back to their activities so sweetly ignorant to the suffering of the world. It angered even the tyrant, who waited so desperately for something to come. After all, compared to the other kings, he lasted the most, which bewitched and bewildered him to the greatest rage. It was a must. Though what did he want to gain from it? Scholars asked, inside one of the layers, separated by islands that'd either float through sea or the air, with chains of with strong reins. One, in particular, rivalled the clouds, where a library laid there, everyone working to the minute to achieve clarity of what he needed. 'Take no break I say. Keep going. You, stop slacking. And you, no more break for this night. Listen up, all of you, we might be numbered if we don't make any progress now, if he finds out that, whatever he's looking for it right under our noses, he'd turn his undivided attention directly at us and take us to the ground, all slain.' Even as he said it, she could feel the breaths of all her students fail to bring heat back. A cold grasp surrounded all of them tired as they were, no sleep to count, and nowhere near to be laid into a break. 'I'm sorry Jacquilline. May I have a moment?' A brown robe, with two additional on the sides, the old man approached her, bearing a seal in his hand, seemingly belonging to the previous king, dead. It was a rare sight, at which he made sure he'd not be seen by other young students who'd like nothing else but to glance and whisper on another. 'Very well. Follow me.' She nodded to the ones who guarded the entries, she'd be gone for at least the time of the sunrise came, perhaps even more, through the concave garden of books, the raising trees of dirt, she guided him. Both passed many students, more of them, replacements of those who had already passed out of exhaustion. 'Our supplies are getting thinner by the second as you may have noticed.' 'I noticed that Jacq, but.' 'No but.' Jacquilline said as she slammed the door in one of her verdant towers. 'No but, you finally decided to come back after so many years and you came with bad news.' 'How'd you figure?' It was a nod that pointed at his unbuckled belt, where normally a seal would be found, holding the various hidden keys and small usable shards. She knew before time, though, even if it wasn't for the lack of his attention that something was brewing, even more than the hurricane outside. The drapery could barely hold as the window was open, tree flying and taken towards the sky, even something farther beyond, indescribable and roaming it in its freedom. 'I wish I had the time, to watch everything happening out there, though I've not the time nor the desire to match the tyrant's act. So say it already.' 'Very well. I've heard a rumour, thought you've clearly had too, that there's an assault on the way.' 'A big one?' 'Biggest. Perhaps one that could lead to a war if it doesn't go our way.' 'Our way?' 'Were you not informed? Every single plane is getting summoned to a meeting to discuss what it is to be done about it. If it just so happens that this place is on his way, the chains would be the first to be attacked, and you know too well what would happen."I know.You needn't remind or point out the consequences, it's of bad omen anyway to mention it."Though one of the young apprentices could and might as well hear as he eavesdropped against the sturdy door.Curiosity was a tool that he well combined, that and the fact that he managed to snick away from his task.Only parts of the conversation were audible to him, parts that he did not understand, some that made no sense whatsoever.'So what are we to say to the summoning?You're to be called there as an ambassador of the isles unless you know of someone better and fitter."You're not going."Oh I know, I broke my vowels in this very room, don't you remember?"The sound of a basket hitting the floor was ever clear to him, turning around from the door.'Shh.They'll hear.'Both approached his fellow apprentices, roughly the same age as him, both freely and most pleasantly abandoned their tasks in order to come and find their friend, peeping at the door, listening some more, even as they joined.'Come and listen.Hurry.'The invitation was clear, to kids appearing as nothing wrong.Hopefully, they weren't followed, I've already been caught one too many time already, not to mention what would happen if she were the one to do the deed.On the other side, clear.'You don't seem troubled my fair maiden."Cut it off, I'm thinking."What's there to think about?You need to go to the meeting and figure out what's to do or sent someone else who could do the job for you.Either way, there's not much time, even now we stand in danger."Again with us, Jack.This is something I have to deal with, not us, you've got your own people's problems on your hands now so act like it.I can't believe I'm getting involved in a mess such as this."There is no choice, the suitors of weathers have already informed most of the regions and they have accepted the call.All of the are there, waiting for you to come, and the last of those who've already agreed."Wait a minute.'It clicked only then to her.'When was the message sent to everyone?The rough time?"To think of it?A few days ago, at most, why?'Jacq immediately stormed out of the room, knocking the children away whilst walking past without a notice.Behind he followed, paying no attention to them as well.They've heard and rushed on the other side, think they'd not be caught, yet bigger problems were about to arise.'What happened?Tell me this instance?"The message hasn't arrived, you've said it yourself, it must've been interfered and caught off by someone on the way?"By who then?No one could take it by the land, nothing has even managed to stay walk on the ground ever since the great pull."By what, to be more precise.I've no doubt that, whoever interfered must've had outside help."I could've been lost on the way."When has such a message ever happen to not arrive, coming from higher up?"It was a second that she paused, right before the door that stood tall in front of the main library, where the students, as she already judges, were to be dismissed.'Someone took it."You don't suppose?"If it came through here, I would've been.'She paused again, to throw glances at each corner, making sure, at the same time that there was a reasonable distance between them and the wall.The reinforced door and fair bricks made it sure that there was no sound clearly audible between the rooms.Yet no chance was taken.'I would've been announced.It hasn't come, so, either someone from out there took it, someone from that room did, or."They haven't sent it at all."Though I've no doubt that the chance is close to being impossible, they'd not dare."Morning lady Jacquilline."Morning to you too Melissa.'She couldn't be the one, I've watched her over ever since she was a child, unable to read or hold a book, even after years she remained with problems, no.'No Jack.It's not her, in case you were wondering."We've got nothing but speculation anyway.This could wait, you know that you must be there at the meeting."Or else what?We've been the first to listen to them and their prophecies of the wind, how else do you think we survived?"Very well then.'Her voice affirmed, right before she opened the door which echoed across the floor. And even further than that, past the land of the wind which came closer to him. Still unaware of a stump, finally awoken by an old man. He looked at him most bizarrely and said. 'Lad, you've slept enough and I take offence for your instruction.' The eyebrows, despite being lowered, look at him and said. 'Whatever you say, old man, I was about to leave anyway.' 'Scrawny kid, if I catch you here a second time I'll have you whipped.' The man said it with a conviction that leads the boy thinking he would, without a doubt do so. As peaceful as his land of high blue greenish was, and as the pale wind from other directions, clean as it may, came, the people remained the same. Bitter, yet unaware, staying at the farther part of the world, perhaps even the safest place. Damn that old man, running my second sleep. I should've known better than to sleep there, especially now in the season. 'Matthias! Matthias!' A voice called twice to him, finally, as he was found, whoever looked for him ran across the other part of the field, though he paid no attention. It was a dress of such contrast that it would've brought the attention of any willing suitor to the ground, and even more, if it were to be caught without a guard. Still no attention, feeling as groggy from the lack of sleep, he couldn't help but ignore, knowing that she'd come and say his name again. 'Matthias! Stop for a moment, please.' 'Why can't she leave me alone?' The thought was enchanted by the small trinket he squeezed inside the pocket. An adventurer at heart, followed by a fair maiden. So-called to him one last time before he stopped and turned to see her slip and fall on the dirty muddy. 'You never learn, do you?' The golden arches that constituted her hair were now repelled in dirty brown despair, already have each of her virtuous lanes entered a muddy pudd, all because of him, he did not answer. Barely now, she noticed that it had rained, and such a mistake, for her felt immeasurable. 'Damn you, why can't you answer me like a normal human being?' 'I would've if you'd have approached me more decently, perhaps even more if you weren't constantly stalking me.' His back turned, though again, the annoyance overturned his heels. 'Stop shouting my name, 'specially not in its entirety.' Matthias Lambert, now called. 'Lamb, come on, do you prefer that? Will this get your attention, finally?' 'Why do you bother me so? All the time, you're doing it, just to remind me of your stupid dream.' 'It's not a dream, I swear, I have the proof right here.' 'It's been months since she's been stalking me, ever since we met and spoke, I did not hear anything else. The thought remained the same over the course of the previous months. For, ever chance she'd get, not only would she greet but also recall and talk to him about her dream. It was no ruse and not a phoney call, a delusion to him, but to her, a prophecy said. Night after night. 'Like a tremor, I've dreamed of it yet again, though now it changed a little. And it's no coincidence that I've found this.' She took out of her pocket, now with a slight hint of dirt, a metal wing, small with feathers sprinkled with edges of gold. A symbol of the old king. 'Put that back, before anyone sees it!' The lamb almost shocked her out of her spine, as the first time shown a burst of emotion ever since they've met. 'You know about it?' 'Of course, I know, my pa.' After staring at the small object, still in her hands, Lambert decided to speak, it was as hard as it was, though perhaps the girl was right. Perhaps I would get to follow her, at least to the place from where she found the wing. Before he could say anything, his lip receded. None of them knows and I can certainly not make the mistake of revealing who I am. 'I dreamed I would find it and follow you. The world outside, I saw it in my dreams, the same way I saw both of us, out there.' 'Listen here, I'm not going back.' 'Back?' She asked, now aware of the slip, to which he thought of her not to be as dull as she seemed. If she suspects, then I'll be dead, they'll all know of the act. 'Back to where you found it, the wing that is. You saw it in your dream, haven't you?' 'Yes, but.' 'Why would I turn back to the place, let alone outside? That's as mad as it comes.' 'Please.' She held the wing against her chest with the same glance of sadness she saw through him, his eyes beckoning aware. 'Just, pleasure my curiosity with this, and follow me. You listen to me for a second, without dismissing me again. I need to, I need to be sure that I'm not going crazy, there's no need for you to go through and follow the path to the outside world with me if you don't want to take the risks, but please. The spot from where I found this.' She stretched her arm and let the small wing shine against the sun. It was that moment when Lambert saw the bags under her eyes, paleness of face, rather a ghoulis appearance for a girl of her age. 'Take it and follow me. If you do me this favour and give me the rest, I swear that I will never walk in your path again.' This was no dullness about her, one that Lam would've observed on the faces of anyone else who hasn't experienced the harsh outer world. Nor did she see the same in him, especially after seeing him in person, for the first time since she had the recurring dream in her childhood. Though she left not sign of the obsession, she stood still. Whatever happened, he swore to them that he wouldn't step outside again. A normal life, huh? A small reminder from a memory long passed. 'Very well, take me there.' He returned the gestured and shook in the wind, a smile, finally on the groggy tired face. Whatever happened, from her point of view, she knew, whenever he'd decide or not, it wasn't important, as she would find out if she went mad or not. 'This way.' On a clear day, they ran, out of the eyes of the farmer and others passing by. 'The youth.' They said, two travellers from the other side of the hill, misconception yet slightly aware of who he was. 'It's not far, just around there.' The limited land made it appear like she was leading him to nowhere, as nothing laid around. 'I see nothing, why can't you tell me where we're going?' 'Because this is not how it happened in my dream.' 'Again, with your dream.. 'It's the only reason I made you agree to come with me, right?' Right past the ongoing festival that they'd miss, the lanterns were lit with a slight hint of hummus and mind, another celebration of the harvest went by. The effigy was burning in the middle though there was no smoke coming out. None seemed to care, as both cut through. That was the main reason why he appeared to be the only one awkwardly staring at it. No smoke ever came out of the fires and not a second passed without him being disturbed by it. Everything was too perfect, everything but them, drowsy and grim dusted, running through a deceivngly entertained crowd. 'Just through here.' For a second, Lamber did not see, mostly of the crowd of people passing in front and near him, with their colourful greyish blue and green clothes, a masquerade of masks made out of the docile animals that laid around. Rabbits he saw, cats and man dogs, no pigs and no other fiends present at the seemingly pleasant rally. Yet no pleasantries were taken off the course, as it was one of the annual festivals of harvest, tradition demanding of a dance. Seconds late, if they were slower and his attention dimmer, they would've both been caught in the place, perhaps int the middle of the festival, both embraced together without knowledge of a waltz. An old shed, they entered, both alone, seen by others. 'Pleasantries of the young.' Whilst paying no attention to the fact they were wearing no masks. In the words of another, 'Pay no attention to them, my dear, they have plenty of time to act like animals in there, as much as they want.' All was seen as normal, even common, for such things, even more, common during the festival. Immediately the lock was on and no one could see. 'Why did you bring me here?' 'This isn't what it appears to be.' 'I'm sure of it.' 'Stop being so stubborn and look behind of you.' Her finger was already slipped and pointed at the wall. Empty, other than the chair that balanced against, two portraits of the respectively, previous owners of the place, and nothing else other than that. Yet he stared, intently for seconds. Lambert didn't expect to see anything, especially with the annoying rattling of the festival outside, the pounding of the ground too. Whatever it was, and whatever she was me to see, if it means finally being left alone. Before that, he finally saw it, directly making a contact between the eyes and the crack in the wall. So minuscule yet big as he got closer. The angle from which it was carved made it impossible to notice unless carefully observed. 'See?' She asked. A difficult task, let alone done twice. By her now him, it was no mistake. 'For how long have you searched this place?' 'You've got no clue. Now go on, insert the wing I gave it to you!' 'You mean?' 'Yes, do it, this is what I've been waiting for, what I've been dreaming for so many years. Do it now!' It was an explosion of excitement she felt, as he decided to go on with what they agreed. Though it seemed not to be what it appeared, Lambert inserted, though stopped mid-way. 'You know? I never asked for your name. It's strange that I've never done it, though you know mine.' 'Can't it wait? Do you have any idea for how long I've been waiting for this?' 'I heard you the last twenty time, but this is the least I'd like to hear from you if we are going to spend our trip together.' It brightened her, a light even stronger than the effigy with no smoke. Though she had more sparks to lit the room, hearing what she wanted to hear from the start. 'You've decided to come.' 'Shh, like I said, only if you give me your name and on the condition that we're going back. Psst. I don't know why I decided to come with you in the first place, but.' 'No more time to change it now.' 'It's Ferrie.' 'Ferrie, that's. Ehm, the seal.' He turned and inserted it between the cracks in the wall of planks, shaped, now systematically, as he was unaware. It was stuck there, no motion, a fill in the small portion that was missing from a normal wall. Lambert wasn't expecting this to happen, though he was nothing more but fairly disappointed. A waste of time. 'See? No point of raising your hopes.' A light emitted from his beyond, just as Ferrie was ready to disapprove. The lock turned on its own and the wall with both the paintings and surrounding around it was pulled by the sides and dragged inside. He caught the seal in time despite being shocked by what he saw. 'Wow.' Both remained mouth opened at the sight of the cavernous delight, all leading to a small covered figured, too big to be described. And not a moment did it pass that she hadn't forgotten, that, they entered through a small cottage, that came into a hill, which had a cavernous bottomless space deep within. 'Ladies first.' His voiced trembled as he heard the echo. Both too distracted and didn't notice, until it happened, that, after they entered, the walls closed on their own, leaving them locked, with the figure there, all on their own. 'Damn it, we're locked.' 'Just like in my.' 'You've got to stop with that, I understood that you had that dream over and over, though.' 'Look.' Distraction after distraction, another interruption, their line of reasons had no action nor was it aware. The cloth that stood above the figure suddenly flew away, with the help of air, leaving nothing but a black mass, moving on its own, yet standing in place. 'How could there be the wind in here? Perhaps below?' 'I believe there's something more important than that. That thing moving over there.' 'We should've brought a light.' 'Perhaps if you didn't drag me over so harshly I could've taken one.' 'If, if, if and if, let's just see what it is. What else's to do, since there's no way out?' 'We could swim through there.' Crystalline water, coming from the depths. Even at such a distance, the reflection was beautifully clear. It was almost as if, that in the diffuse light, her paleness had disappeared, rendering her anew. 'I can't swim, unfortunately, which leaves us both to.' He pointed as the formation, moving now at a much faster rate, slowly receding inwards upon itself as they approached. Ferrie grabbed his hand in a slight sign of fear. Lambert nodded, after a glance. Both of them could easily see that there were hints of fright in both of their eyes, amplified by their approach and nothing else other. 'We're in this now.' 'Together.' 'Together.' Lambert responded, having more control over his own emotions and the thought of what was about to happen. It receded and kept doing so, revealing itself, into the light that shined directly on the top of it, even more, afraid than them. Slowly it moved away from the top, revealing at first a shine. The moment they reached the front of it was when they found about what it really was, shining through, reflecting given the glimpse of light, as the sluggish dark being came down the depths. It was reveal, the statue of the feathered man, kneeling in front of them, waiting with only a feather missing from his hundred of thousands attached to even bigger ones. 'Amazing.' It was a spectacular display, even as they felt the relief knowing that the slug came back the sea, a creature of the depicts that only momentarily claim the statue in order to clean it. Nothing more. 'Will it come back?' 'I'm not sure, but look another spot.' 'I guess I know what you're about to say, isn't it, rightfully take from yours?' 'Do it already and let's see. The excitement is killing me even more.' His hand shook, left alone to approach the statue, a giant in its better meaning, standing tall to watch over him, with the watchful gaze and the slightly haze it brought. Lambert felt diminished by the statue it held, as he had never seen such a construct, merely observed as he was in the range of the spot. It was no mere statue. But I must be still now, no going back after all. Plunged inside, the feathered key of the king entered and the dust was spread across, even the dirtiest mud that was there laid no more after being released. The eyes of the statues lit, pushing both of them back as he suddenly changed position, from kneeling to a stance, he stood tall and watched for a second, then changed position. The hand made a crackling noise, making it clear that it wasn't oiled in a long time, the joints struck by the change of position as he pointed towards the above. Stone cracked under, making him reached near Ferrie. It busted the stone getting lifted through by a cylindrical system of stairs, leading towards the top of the ceiling where it broke through, stone falling and the equivalent of mud. The noise it made rivalled even of those who were at the festival at the time. A shock grabbed the festival to a halt, as they all stared in confusion at the sudden depravity of the hill. Never have they seen such a thing in their community, as small as their world was. Even those who weren't celebrating, near passing, or those from far away who saw the giant silhouette of the winged man, the wings spread across the sky, the back muscles, represented in harsh metal, joints and cracks, dents but no rust. They both entered, knowing that, after they did, that would be the moment when truly there'd be no turning back. Shy, the stairs felt dry as no one has stepped on them for at least hundreds of years. 'Come on Ferrie, before everyone gets a hold of what we're doing.' Suspicion was obvious to come at a moment, as they remained the only two who weren't present at the festival, locked in a cottage where suddenly they disappeared. And those who control this normal life of theirs are soon to find out what we've done. It was a mistake, perhaps, he thought. On the other hand, not entirely, the dull life never pleased him, despite being normal, never could he be happy. Yet he remained at the will of his parents, which now made him sick. It was an entry that came through the foot, where the door was opened, revealing a ladder, leading through the inside of the man. 'You don't think it can actually?' 'You're the prophet, right? OR have you been dreaming this for so long that you started having doubts?' They stopped. Lamber and her, have only now realised that they were still holding hands, a second time, even though he'd been alone for a while. It somehow came passively, though both only noticed them. 'Sorry. La.. Perhaps I should go first.' She looked at her scornful dress, realising them, what he meant. 'That's for the better.' Now, was the paleness fully removed, at the point of excitement, the promise of adventure and the lustfulness of her brows, filled with a red that was given birth, almost from an egg. They climbed, ready and heard, it closed below them, on its own. The ladder lead them only to the pelvis, revealing the full extent and the enormous rooms inside the winged construct. 'It's a lot bigger inside than what it appeared there.' 'I know.' He said, looking around, the light illuminating through a pale orange, a cabin, a few rooms, the inside looked like a comfort zone, having everything needed. Including sustenance too, stocked food on the side, though there was no way to know, for how long any of it stood inside. With both distracted, they hadn't realised, through the velvet carpets, curtains and shiny delights, outside the whole community, even those unaware gathered, forming crowds around it, despite that no one dared approached. Some just stared at it, others towards where he was pointing. 'The horizon!' They looked at it as some sort of omen, a symbol, despite not knowing why it happened. 'It's a sign, it's a sign. Our days of harvest are coming to an end I say. Can you not see from where it came out? The hill!' One voice stood atop of everyone else's with a stronger conviction of a distorted truth. None of them had any idea why it happened, yet they dared chant and pray. It couldn't have come at a better time, as the new year of the harvest was about to end, a new one anew, though distilled by a bad omen popping from a hill where the bosoms of the hill would've become filled with grey petals accompanied by showers of bright coloured flowers. Years had it been that way, they chanted and looked at it, though, to be sure that their eyes wouldn't be deceived. 'Look at them. The Earnest family. You've been here for generations and still, praying and giving your respects to the effigy. You tell us, have there ever been a time like this?' The flagrancy of the voice spread, even more, dirtying the land by the mere conflict it held. For far too long has the land been pure, at which, the first sign started tainting it with the meaning that, the weather masters have fought the same amount of time to keep them away from it. They've not deserved it, neither did the land. Yet green turned into a dullish orange, flowers tainted by the yellow stink clouds, floating around them like pairs of animals now unseen. Even they had disappeared out of the sound, it wouldn't be long now until they found out. 'It never happened, not in my, or the previous generations, you see.' He had spoken, as more and more turned their attention to the loudest voice in the crowd, sitting with his feet atop of the crate, hearing the machine turned again. The wings spread into position and despite not being in the head, they could both see what it saw, how they gathered, lit torches, the biggest mistake. The land tainted spread across the torches, and stop, closer to the sky, clouds of brim gusts of dark smoke arise. At first, they dropped them on the ground, being afraid, of the dark spirits. 'They're coming from us, look at the effigy.' 'No. No. No!' Panic was driven into their hearts. Lambert saw and announced his companion that they'd have to go. 'Fast, we need to go now. If we stay any longer, they'll get onto us.' And, despite not noticed, through the small crevice and holes, she slowly spoke. 'Lambert. Don't make a move.' They weren't alone anymore, through the tightened space they were in, as he turned to see what she was talking about, still fiddling with the various pulls and buttons, the straightened irons that held aside even bigger items, it was it. 'Why is it here?' It was grabbed to a halt and seemed to be staring at both of them, despite the lack of clear eyes, he knew it was doing so. The machine activated without his notice, and ready to collide with the air, now there was no chance for it to go back. It remained for them to know. 'What's going on?' 'The spirits of the harvest are sending us a message, we will all succumb to death, just look at it coming there.' The massive wings started flapping in front of their eyes, spreading the gust of smoke, forming black clouds, sending fire in all parts of the region. The decay of wood became apparent as they saw, the gate of the cottage fell apart at the first glance. 'Those two.' Another yelled, remembering what happened there. They looked into confusion, going to check inside the house. It was then that they noticed that they were missing, even clear of where the small, falling apart secret doors lead. 'It's because of those two, that the lord of the harvest was bothered! Get them, hurry!' They cramped on each other and became, from the cheering crowd they once were, into animals, rabid and filled with rage. It plagued their mind, with the land, being so tightly connected with it, it was most obvious what would happen next. "They're coming with us, we're going to have to take off and take this thing with us." Fine, just don't make sudden motions, they're friendly as long as you don't make sudden movements and harsh noises. Though there'd be no choice. Not for them, nor for the villagers who were sent inside the cave, hearing nothing but the insanity of a crone who just, no longer than a noon ago, was a normal woman. Depravity took the cave apart, stone and dirt falling into the water. The sudden pulled off a lever caused the winged construct to leap into the air, breaking the entire hill, as concave as it was, cracking like an egg, falling apart whilst burying everyone who laid under. Lives were lost, just to serve as seeds, as trees started growing at the most unholy unaccentuated speed. The ground was bitter and broken, as the wings flapped, they distorted the clean air and filled it with the same dents, polluting it with the motion created. No one had dared challenge the sky either, until then, not even by the slightest hint of a kite. Eyes widened, on the map of air, as stone and replicas of homes lifted, risen then fell. The air stank of destruction and the fluctuation between the round table it was on and the floating above was too unstable to be ignored. "This cannot be." One of the elder's voice could be heard, going through every hall in the palace. He knew exactly or suspected what happened. It must be that dirty tyrant, his hand must be sunken within this! "The dirty hand of that rat, but how could it be?" A storm was starting to form, at a larger scale than any of which he had ever seen before. "Damn it!" It was too late that they arrived, that they have finally noticed too. Despite not being the entire council present there, they gathered around to see, shocked. The image and every single side of the gigantic table were being swallowed by a dark storm, a vortex of dark clouds, blue smoke coming from behind it. Slowly, in front of their eyes, they saw the future and what was going to happen, cities swallowed and destroyed, drowned into endless storms, crushed under rubble from the lightning bolts encompasses by smaller vortexes on the side. All coming to that one point, which they have so desperately tried to protect, now the balance of the land was gone, destroyed under their noses. And then it came, the eye of the storm as the whole entirety of the world came to an end, to the point of extinction they've now foreseen. Their eyes were now as bleak, lightly taken from their pupils, only to see the darkness and despair, of their sealed fate. "What should we do? What can we tell them?" The voice of doubt was now given life to the council after seeing what they've seen, feeling what they've felt, true despair. "We were never wrong." That never happened before, but could we be wrong after? After all, we've never seen something as such a level of destruction. "Enough!" Scared as he was, the leader of the council slammed his hands against the table without thinking at last. "Ethriel!" The voice shouted but the pain already came into effect. The skin around his hand became blistered and pale because of the contact with the storm. Even at the scale of a table, the effects it had, came into full contrast. Voice of fear then followed, all started backing away, slowly from the table, as Ethriel fell down. "It hurt him, the storm hurt him." But how could it be? How? How? The voices battered, even more, unable to defend or try to defend themselves from what was about to come. "Take me to the chamber, we need to warn them!" No second was lost, despite having some of his light lost and both hands hindered, bandaged by a fellow member whose hand came down and cut out a piece of his own robe. He helped and lead him through stairs as it was agreed. The room closed as he said. "Tell no one of this until everyone comes at the table. I want all of them to know what we're dealing with." Lord! A voice just came, bearing a message in his arms, the timing couldn't have been worse as Ethriel recognised the seal it bore. It was the tyrant's work and it couldn't wait anymore. Fighting through the pain he felt, he grabbed by one of the ends and unwrapped it. A terrible tremor wrapped the parchment as it fell on the ground. 'Hurry up, it was just as expected, we need all of them in the council room. "But." Now!' His voice raged across the entirety of the hold, which echoed at the most distant storms. And still, even though outside, everyone from the distant planes, through middle most ground storms and flying machines, through the continent and far from it, even farther. He stood and waited, looking straight where he thought they were. The air was polluted with the grim smokes, causing sores and various diseases for those who couldn't afford the medicine his people sold. It was a sign of his, which made them believe that he had corrupted the land from afar, despite him not knowing yet. A knock on a door away. 'It arrived.' 'Good.' The shortcoming was followed by a leave without a noticed. He had waited for far too long, looking at his map, though he made sure to challenge them to war. Another glimpse. 'They've been warned now, don't you think my dear?' She remained silent. 'What about you? Did you hear what the man who just came in said?' Though met with the same silence as well. Both mother and daughter remained content, from being forced to live with someone of which face they'd never get to see again. And to bother them more, he showed off the sign of being troubled of their silence or what it held. 'Monster! You've become a monster!' Her voice was once sweet, even when she was mad at him, for what he had become. 'I refuse to talk to you ever again!' Though it remained, over the course of years, a promise that was broken at every sign of malicious intent, every bad decision he made. She couldn't help it, just as well as she couldn't handle being his spouse. 'And now my dear, the decision is yours. Which side should we invade first? Hmm?' The pale greyish red held a reflection of her, holding her young daughter, sleeping in her hands, though she wanted to role in it, nor could she stand it anymore, being looked at by him. It repulsed her, knowing she couldn't do. 'But bear it mind, that if you don't comply, my dear, she will suffer worse.' At the end of his back, he showed his hand-curved carriable gun. It was small, though the blast would be more than enough to blast even the toughest of metallic infused locks if shot at the closed range. 'Which bring us to her.' 'Stop! I.' She paused to cover her daughter's ears, making sure she gave him enough time to put the gun back inside. They were limited, quite rare, at the point of there being only twelve ever created in the primitive world they now had to live in. And atop of that, he made sure to make the most of it. Every threat he made on her left a mark, going deeper and deeper in both her physical and physical health. Not only were there marks on her neck where she had scratched, though anywhere where he wasn't present, the outbursts couldn't be an outcast. Her daughter got to feel the full extent, which left her even more marked than her. In the end, though, she was left silent after he was done with making his point. Her hand pointed to a random location, at which he yelled and announced the generals. 'Yes, sir!' Though, in the moments of silence, where, he stood. Even he had some moments, where he gave her the peace and quiet as she held their sleeping daughter. And one thing bothered her, no matter how much she tried in moments like that, to avoid looking away, she tried, desperately looking through the red visor and see. And not once had she managed to look through and find out what he truly saw, how he looked at them and what he really think of them. When it wasn't obvious, he still made no move nor protest. What does he think of us then? With his hands, so firmly standing atop and holding the table? Does he still love me, what about his daughter? He would've never answered it anyway, never did the thought occur of asking him in person, as the moments of peace were limited. And there it was, war soon to become upon all. Nowhere was safe, as the news started spreading on an unfathomable scale. They have all heard of it, small town and what not, even the most caverns where the small imps stood tall, soon to be disturbed. Down to the animals in the fleeting autumn verdant forests that were walking as war away as they could. It was exactly the type of chaos he wanted them to feel, the uncomfortableness of war, the despair, the fear and even more than that. The reserves were already starting to fade away, the weather dying, the crops flying by the winds. More storms and more flood were to come, even as the land was about to be swallowed by the biggest storms of all. 'Which leads us here, my fellow.' The voice stopped, standing in his high chair, the pipe in his hand emanating a glowing smoke, burning with the fiery cinder that did more bad to his hands than his mood. She entered then, abruptly, after the longest, though fastest way she could've gone. It was decided before Jacquilline went on the flight, that she'd leave his old friend to deal with the problem. On good insight too. She noted the elders, even fewer than before, now a dying breed. Small blisters on a glance, then she quickly looked at everyone around. Seeing how every representant from each of their own respective town has come there to hear, though she had already known by the time she was greeted by the servants of the lords. War. It echoed even as she closed the door, both in her mind and their memories. At last, it began. 'You may sit down Jacquilline.' The elder said, greeted by nothing but silence. She did not ask either about what happened to hide hands, not being any of her concerns anyway. It was worse than the initial prediction, even as she expected before entering the small room, whispers everywhere, a room full of every single range of emotion. From fear to anger, to fright, to despair, to love and happiness, for some really enjoyed and welcomed it, as well, as their encouragement made those who felt the opposite, worse. Chaos reflected though none of them had any idea. A small sapiens came closer to Ethriel and gave him a small note he did not dare read out loud. Not that it mattered, some noted, others slower, at which there were cases where some didn't even notice at all. But, what else could it be? 'The war of course!' Just look at them, at times like these. 'Though he was right, not in the way he meant to say, coming from someone as him, leader of a smaller village. He had to act like a judge, like a leader, like a ripper and more, he had to take multiple roles. Silence!' The outburst was only a start. His power was felt, for the first time in years, the rumours became something more. Before he stood up, his hands reached the handles of his chair, transferring a small tremor from every single side of the room, they felt. It wasn't as strong as one, but it was more than enough to get their attention. A small breath of his, accompanied by the other three that remained in their adjacent chairs made the room they stood in much cooler. Breaths were visible and everyone remained more uncomfortable than they were before. Though thing was about to become much worse. 'You may have heard already that we're heading to a war that's about to include every single one of your people. And. And.' Though his lip was cold, affected by the source itself, he paused it, leaving the temperature to go back. The breathing had to be stopped in order for it to take full effect, it was more than enough nevertheless. His heart didn't let him say it, revealing the inevitable. Deeper inside, even as from both sides his shoulder was touched, he had a pride stronger than everything else. 'We're going to war, and we will not let that tyrant get the best of us! Listen to me, all of you and remember what to tell the world when you return to them. We have seen the future and. And. The storms are on our side, we will not falter under the tyrant!' It was an echo that suddenly subdued every emotion he had let run loose across the room.

Tale of the hunter, oathbreaker and the fiend

'And then your god so dirty and blunter, he punished you whilst under his mantle.' They looked at him, pointed and laughed. 'But what have I done?' The voice came out with sincerity. But no one listened, only himself. I've done nothing wrong. What have I done then to deserve this?' Ha ha ha ha Look at the poor old fool. Though he was young, its undermining hid beyond the constant barrage of attacks towards him. The sore man who deserved it all. He saw the hands come out of him and pull all of his organs out. No pain was felt but they were held in place, away from his grip and their original place. 'Give them back. Stop it.' He pleads but the hands that held his organs, each for one but two for the stomach, held them too far away from his reach. It felt like chains, iron holding his organs away. 'Give them back already, I've learnt my lesson.' Eutreyiad didn't listen to what they said, despite attacking him like that, it most solemnly angered them to a point. 'Get out of our home.' And a gust of wind threw him away, the witches laughed in a choir that was stopped only by the slamming of the door. Falling on his back from the place that disappeared, he remained looking at the sky. But it wasn't enough, the vision was distorted by the hands and the organs that were held in the air. One hand, the one that wasn't left near his torso, it tried reaching, as if to grab. He pretended that the sun was his heart. To no avail, I'll never get there. Tears were shed to no end, as knowing the hands couldn't be hurt nor could he pretend forever. Pitying myself forever, is what I'm supposed to do? Eutreyiad had nowhere to do, at least nowhere where anyone would accept him the way he now looked. Even as the rain started, burning through leaves, he felt his organ, even his heart's beats get hurt by the drops. A scratch was left but there wasn't anyone around, not even the animals as they felt the rain before it even came to be. 'Just let me protect them, you at least owe me that, please.' Despite being ignored, he focused and ran without stopping. To a blank cave that he paid no attention to, he kept his refuge there. Still, not even the bears would approach him as they were afraid by the extra set of hands that kept them high. With the back against the wall, even they've bent to prevent his reach. The pockets were empty and there was nothing to eat. I'm so hungry. A thought arises after seeing his stomach turn in front of his eyes. 'Are you going to ignore me this whole way? And how come you haven't taken my eyes, my skin, my nose and everything else?' Confused, he thought. Perhaps I could try reasoning with it? No, it won't. 'But at least give me one back?' For a moment he thought. One that came closer, his heart still beating and feeling as it got closer to him. In his reach, so close. But it pulled back just as he was ready to reclaim it. A sad look at his pale face. At least the rain is over. Eutreyiad thought before moving on. The bears didn't want him either as their moans could be heard, protecting the youngling that were scared the most. He felt repelled by the family of bears that didn't desire his company anymore. If not even the animals, who else would take me? More was passed and even the roads, where people passed and thought of a monster. No word was said between then when a two old people came, they sprouted into a run without looking back. The shouts could be heard by anyone in sight travelling to him, then back. 'The monster, the monster!' Or so they shouted. No one else came there anymore after he waited. One at least perhaps could see through the monstrosity I've become, that's all I need. Not even a prayer could help him, nor would come. Even from the distance, as he stood on a wall of empty bricks that he ruined, the heaviness and the extended arms revealed to anyone who would look from far away. 'Are those hands holding them?' He waited and waited until they've come. Authorities from beyond. Quickly on their feet and horses, they dashed through the dirt leaving nothing but a sandstorm behind. Four of them were enough, well protected, each carrying a sharp dagger on their lap. They only had to tap by the belt as none dare to speak. Eutreyiad tried comforting himself, thinking. They must be here to escort me, that is, no bitterness was said by them. Perhaps. 'You're here to take me. Away from the monster.' It all made sense, to him at least. He wasn't the monster they yelled at but another. And seeing how he didn't run, they must've called for his help to arrive. Whispers came and they nodded, hear heard none of, though. 'Is this thing mad then too? What should we do?' 'Just do its game and if you see it become hostile, slash its hand and those things.' No close did they approach, as the organs were accompanied by a smell, not to mention flies and insects feeding on them. The man followed as they surrounded him, thinking they'd help. At a slow pace but he didn't feel tired nor hurt. A hunchback and dirty feet with no shoes, hands that held him straight. Yet his hands wore no marking, nor anything to tie them, it was almost as if they were too afraid themselves of what would've happened if they came closer. For a good reason too. They stood there for a while, in the open. He remembered what it was said to him, as it looked as it was going to be a long trip, to its own right too. 'And they will not rot whatever you do. With you will they stay forever or at least until you do. Learn what it feels like, the one that you've deprived yourself off. Until then, your body, just as your arms, they will not rot, they won't fall off. They won't be destroyed, nor drowned. A part of you will they be until it happens to understand.' A glance at his hands, the one he was born with, and he was even deeper in his thought. What did they mean by that? Why are their voices so strong but my feeling so ill? The feeling was still there, that's what made him confuse, or at least he thought. Something else was driving him to bounce between being sad and normal. Or his version of normal. He even saw them as friends, then wondering what they were doing. Even as they entered the town and saw the crowd spewing. His expression changed as he heard insults being thrown. Rotten fruits followed but none hit his hands nor what they held. They shifted around and avoided any hit that would've hurt them a lot. New feelings came across and a new conflict too, he cried but felt confused. He tried covering his eyes but wasn't left to. Am I really a monster? In their eyes, he saw reflections of grim hate and malice. All of them. Well, except, he didn't manage to see, though one of the guards that were sent to get him. The only one that didn't share the rest of their opinions. He turned his gaze and looked at him, after seeing so many people trying to hurt him for no other reason than what he looked like, he felt compassion. Something that not even he could explain, despite asking himself. Why do I keep seeing myself in his place? Even a change of gaze, that avoided their meeting, didn't stop. He tried comforting himself, though the worse choice of thought happened. He's going to die anyway, so it's not my problem. But that didn't do anything else but make it worse. It was repeated again in his mind. He's going to die anyway, so it's not my problem. After turning around and seeing how the head was now bobbed down, covered in the remains of fruits, he turned back to see and hear. 'Hand the beast. Murder it. Burn the wicket to crisp ashes. Make it suffer. Let thy lord vengeance come down upon the fiend. I'm but a simple guard, in need of defending them, though there's nothing to defend. He remembered how they've met and how none were attacked. It was important, now that he wasn't confused anymore about what he thought he heard. No longer it, how others said. He trusted us and we have failed him. 'A citizen, be he born into a foreign land or even closer, despite what he looks like and how much he's scorn. You have to protect regardless of your border, the innocent come first.No matter the cost.So is the percusor's teaching and so shall we.'The teaching and the oath were clear in his mind, all but one exception.He broke a part of it, even more, something unheard.They wouldn't understand, none would, not even the captain, despite pleading my case.Was his oath stronger than the will of the people and would he let the creature die?Is mine so?Should I ponder no more?Immediately at the end of a small whip, he turned the horse and broke their march.Horses belched and on two of their feet arise, scared after a distinct sound.Not the most conventional of the guards was he, but that scared the crowd, that were immediately spread to avoid.The gauging shriek of one of them that befell under the feet of them.They marched in every direction and some fell off their backs.Unable to stop him, the grabbed the stretched back of Eutreyiad and threw him on the same horse.Of course, the hands avoided his every motion.Gates started going down as the shouts, still, barely distilled by the commotion.'Lower the gates.Don't let Barook escape!'Some tried but none would approach, the tall guard in shining armour, carrying a giant of a man with many hands that held his organs, still wondering how it was that the beast was still alive.They shouted in a choice, seeing both of them in their attire.'They are the devil spawns, that's where the knight belongs!'Said the preacher after being denied the chance of delivering the burning of his lord's vengeance.'Hold on tight lad, we're going to pass it before it's too late.'Barook, how Eutreyiad's saviour assured that he'd be safe, for as long as he held his hand, at least two of them around his waist.The grip was tight and he could see people fall on their knees and praying.'Our lord has spoken.Do something you petty guards.'The king's guards, that's what they were called and for a reason, despite acting rashly and on a drunken stooped.All but one.Barook jumped with his horse, both entered by a leap that threw them on the other side, landing safely on the bridge.Just as they were getting ready to follow, they've failed to do so.The helmet plough right off, he didn't need it anymore after being slightly pierced by the gate's sharp like knives.Through the ends of his moustache, he saw them curse and spit, though none reached.But along all the blasphemer's songs and yells, one stood out.The captain of the guards.'You will pay for this Barook, mark my words.The king will hear about it.'The grin he once had changed into one of bitterness, knowing that he'd have to face his wrath once.He didn't respond and galloped on, his horse turned and with the man still holding onto his waist.It's been a while since he's not done it, even with the help of the voice covering it.The armour was cold but he felt none either.'Where are you going knight man?'The sudden voice almost made him fall, he's forgotten all about it.Right, the man.With a slap and a slam of the reins, he made his horse stop.Barook looked back, beyond the scaly hands and pondered that none would be able to follow.The wind should cover the remaining ones, but what now?The crossroads he encountered, now releasing what he's done, there was no way back.A king's punishment would be ten times worse than what his saved one would've suffered, whenever it came to being hanged ten times or burn the same amount wasn't up to him.'Could I leave now?My back is getting sore?'Sorry, I got distracted, yes you may.'It surprised me how he acted despite his appearance.The two hands, despite appearing being frailer than the rest of them still helped each other go down.He came down as an infant, one more grotesque.Though, he somehow managed to look past that and see them hanging, only as keepers of his.A recollection came to mind, as a constant task that was implied of the royal guards.Normally they'd overanalyze anyone that would approach the kings, movement and actions, how they were and what they were like.Though not in the stopper and under the influence.How old was he?Despite the grotesque appearance, he stood down and played with dung beetles and dirty flowers.Almost like a child, giggling to himself.The oathbreaker, now what he'd be known as, stood there watching and wondering at it. No, I must. Just as he was ready to go on ahead, he was stopped as the hand reached his shoulder. The gaze, both of theirs met and he asked the armoured man politely. 'Where 're you going tin man? Will you not take me with you?' The eyes, ever so translucent in the light, held the reflection inside of a flare that had its home in there. 'I've got to go now. Look, it's not safe for you to be near me.' He sighs. 'But I've nowhere to go, at least not since the curse at least.' Then he frowned. 'Curse?' 'Yes, I've been cursed for some reason and don't know why. I miss my parents too. Would you be so kind to bring me to them?' An aura of awe flew around the man like creature, one that was filled with mystery, almost mesmerising in a way. Despite what he looked like, and the possible problems he'd bring if a journey along the two of them formed. There was still the spirit of chivalry in the knight, one that he couldn't deny. Since he'd probably be hunted just as well as he was, why not? Barook jumped off the horse, his shoulder released. With one hand that slammed against his chest, the plate of valour and honour, he threw the dust that could've passed on and stood on him. With the other, he repeated the gesture, fairly above the next then knelt and said. 'I promise you that we will find your parents and undo the curse?' They were face to face and the oil was thrown inside of the fire. A burst of emotion came to be as the expression on Eutreyiad's face changed. Eutreyiad was ready to jump and hug the knight but he was gently pushed away. 'That's enough, I've already sworn to you, don't over do it.' 'Understood.' Remaining perplexed is just one of the ways that could describe his state. He was overjoyed, and the hands too joined his constant jump in the air and flail. Is this really a curse? 'Hmph. I presume time will tell.' The whisper fell along with the wind, slightly unheard and not entirely understood. 'Hop on, we've got a long way to go.' 'Immediately sir.' His hands were up to the forehead, the rest shifting the organs in place, just as he jumped on the horse again. The path was clear for them as the ride didn't seem to stop. A journey whilst only the two of them, a long one that he had in mind. Growing accustomed to him holding his waist, he started slowly becoming more trustful of his new companion. Though that did not change the fact that others not. No town in sight could be visited as the villagers would scream and pass torches and pitchforks to one another. Nor did any meadow nor place in the open, after approaching it, the sight and stench would attract rabid animals and even worse. Luckily for him, Barook had not smell, to begin with. They remained together for a long time, coming across every path, jumping gaps and cliffs, even openings. At night they'd stand in front of the fire and get warm, protected from the night. Barook already sent his horse to bed and managed to get a few rabbits, that he accidentally, on his word. 'Stumbled upon. Don't worry about them, they more than likely died of natural causes, no more than that.' And he received half of the smile. Both remained dismayed from what previously happened, the village incident, how he was found. Even the dove he tried helping but he found himself only bitten down. No recollection in his mind about where his parents were, coming to think about it. 'How old are you then?' A peculiar question and even so because of the timing it came to. 'I'm ten years old, why?' 'Ten?' He repeated to himself, twice in his head, just to be sure, then he asked again for confirmation. 'Are you really ten?' Again was asked as he approached, watching, carefully the slight twist of eyes, the fornicated nose and the spasms of the muscles. 'Yes.' He's not lying, but how could it be? Perhaps, it's just what he truly believes? They ate but it still crippled his mind and no stew of the rabbit nor warmth of the fire would help him pass onto the important task at hand. He needed to know. 'So, how is it you've got cursed?' 'Well.' The recollection started and it was slightly taken out of proportions, what to be expected out of such of one. 'I was taken by my parents into the forest and they've lost me. I screamed but there were nowhere to be found, that's when the pretty lady came."Pretty lady lad?"Ye', the pretty lady dressed in black. She said she'd get me to my parents as long as I behaved."And, was she the one that made you look that way?"Well. A pause came to be, embers started coming out of the fire at the begging coming from the wind. 'Well?' She brought me to her house in the woods. Also, it was a tree. "I don't think I follow lad." She lived in a giant tree with gates, it was enormous inside. And there were others there too, I think I saw hundreds of old ladies dressed like her, all standing there and speaking to each other. "About what?" About me. "For what reason?" Brook inquired, having to know the reasoning behind them, his perception telling him that It'd be about the curse. Despite not knowing him nor his name, the time to hear the story was freely given by Brook. Especially since there was the oath. Still, a child? It dwelled in his mind, surely a child wouldn't grow. As the only problem why the appearance wasn't only the hands themselves and the ripped out organs. But there was no hole in the chest, nor did the features seem to belong to a child so young. 'Are you listening?' A frown appeared on his face, rubbing against the fat features of the face that seemed to be sprouting hair all over and blackheads over the nose. 'Yes, I was merely distracted by something flying over?' "What?" The creature, he looked around as if to see, gloating at some fireflies that were floating in the air, shining away with their dim light. The attention was immediately shifted as he seemed to have forgotten what happened, his story derailed. So, this is really a child, in the body of a beast. Barook said to himself, still throwing sticks in the fire. 'You were talking about something regarding the witches, were you not?' Pulled away, he continued, attention set still on the companions of his. 'Yes, I was brought to them and they were smiling.' All the time, whilst lecturing about what happens, Barook stood and looked about a gaze from the darkest depth of the woods. Still silent, he didn't want to alert his companion, but fist clenched around the hilt. One ear on his story and another straightened against the emptiness. He listened. They started lecturing and yelling at me. Those mean old. Old. Hags. "Watch the language." Surprising even himself, he immediately apologised after, without knowing that he managed to shock both of them in doing so. Eutreyiad was frightened by the power of the voice he heard, that strong raspy adult voice. Even more so, amplified by the woods. 'You're almost as mean as those old. Ladies there.' 'I'm sorry lad, I didn't mean so. It's just that well, it's stressful to deal with adult.. Lad, look at me.' All those hands, still floating shifted away as Barook's got closer to lift the chin up. 'Listen, lad, I promised to help in finding your parents, have I not? We will do so, don't worry. This is all I needed to know, it's okay if you don't want to continue.' "No, I can. I can. They yelled at me and cursed me when I asked for my parents and they said only that I'll never get to see them ever again. I saw it in their eyes, my parents. They were beating on to escape and I couldn't help them. I was afraid.' Eutreyiad's face was lowered as silence arisen in the wood. They waited, seeing the embers raise too and finally succumb to the wind. Both slept through the night, one with a sword slightly unseated whilst the other slept like a child. A long night too, one filled with dreams of sorrow and dismay, for one of them at least. For the younger one, dreams that remained as pure and innocent, an illusion that remained unbroken. A sudden noise that was brought to the morning light reminded them to wake up. The tall guard, unsheating the blade that reflected even the weakest of sunrays glanced around in a steady position. He observed nothing in the woods. Nothing but his companion laying on the ground with the hands arisen despite the consciousness not being there. A rabbit came out, frightened and nothing more. He sighs, swallowing what seemed to be a heavy burden inside of his neck. Supporting himself against a tall tree he looked upon his companion, still wondering. 'Sigh.' I don't even know his name and barely heard his story, yet he trusts me. He trusts me indeed. And so peacefully he sleeps, undisturbed by the light nor by the sound the forest made. Thought there was another problem, as if it wasn't enough. How would this child-beast take it when I find and end the miserable witches' lives? Would that be enough or will I become his doom? To be cursed to live a life without parents, without a body of his own? And what about me after? I am now an oathbreaker, one that I've sworn to defend? And they won't know the truth, neither will the king, that they've broken theirs first. He spat upon the ground, a rancid one filled by his greasy teeth. With a bend of the knees and twitch of the muscles, he restrained himself from the emotions, seeing how the lad was getting ready to wake up. 'Slept well?' The lad nodded. Is this part of the curse then? It occurred to him that it felt strange, have no opinion of disgust or repulsion against the hands that held his vital organs outside. Either I've grown accustomed or that it was. He thought while stomping what remained of the slightly lit wood. 'Let's go then.' They walked for a while, glancing from time to time around, still not knowing where they were going. 'Where are we heading?' But there was no answer at first. So he asked again, to which he heard. 'We're going to a friend, perhaps he could help.' 'But my parents?' He might be able to help us find them. A ray of hope and uncertainty came as they were heading towards the hunter. Word came slow into the parts and he remained certain. He will not hear about my sudden leave nor will he know about my bounty. And that hunter, or so they used to say. He'd track anyone for any amount they'd pay. Be friend or foe or even less. The hunter may hunt you down and press. His dire blade inside your neck. But he knew better than trust that, old trickery to make a fool out of himself. But even if it came for him to a betrayal, he'd know surely where to strike. And even more, as the thought came. For an oath, a new one, perhaps the noblest one he's sworn to. To help a child in need, a rescue mission in-between. The living heart of forest from far. Beating and pulsating inside. The witches watching from their living member and seeing them walk. 'They want to slay us, did you not hear?' His thought, from his face, are so clear? 'Leave that fool but try, we can feed his rotting corpse to our pets after.' But what if by the slightest chance that happens and he gets to our place? He will kill us all then. Another raspier voice came from the dark, accompanied by a grin toothless smirk which said. 'Do not worry sisters, he may try for as long as it takes, making no difference anyway. She pointed her bony finger towards them as they watched in silence. The hunter, from which they will most certainly try, to get our tracks. Nevertheless, they will all die, perhaps now it will be the best of time to get rid of him at all. 'And the coven glanced after at her, to share the grin. They watched them get to the hut withing the forest. Especially when the oathbreaker, identity is now known to them, as they shared the vision Eutreyiad had in front of him. The door was slammed and the hunger was there, sharpening his arrows over a grindstone. Awe on his face but he didn't look surprised, after getting accustomed to it. He'd heard and seen through the holes inside the hut, knowing immediately who it was. Noticing the complexion on the face, he wasn't alone. 'Barook, what is it you wish of me?' 'Don't give me that look ye slack. I need your help with something.' A large bag of coins was thrown across the room, landing perfectly on the table where his gaze was set on. The last saving he'd get after leaving the service and so far he'd not spend anything on it. I won't need it anymore after I'm done, perhaps it may even appease this greedy hunter after we're done. 'Here, count it, there should be enough to pay for at least eight of your jobs.' He didn't need to count but to weight it alone. Heavy, enough was known after seeing that slight bounce off the table as it reached the land. 'A pretty well amount of money I'd wager. But what is it you want that'd be worth this much?' It was a fast move that rivalled the gaze of the hunter, across the table. Both hands firmly shoved and followed by a thick smile, one that would turn the witches as they glanced through the same cracks inside the hut. 'We're going to hunt witches.' Though unsure how he'd react, acceptance came anyway and the terms were settled. The money for the entire coven, sure it wasn't new and witches were known to be dangerous at times. But, the hunter was even more so, packing his various amulets made out of bones and sea-hearts, eyes and clasp knives. His tainted arrows with infected blood, a ripped out the blade with a razor sharp. But there is still a problem. 'Our third companion might not be what you might expect?' 'Is this not a royal mission then, perhaps a personal task?' Suspicion was about to come unasked for, as it was. The flare in the eyes changed, and a wolfish grin too. 'Don't worry, I think you'll get along just well.' It was a shock as the muscles bent, immediately as they both exited. With the quickness he's always displayed of, the crossbow immediately loaded itself and aimed for a monster. Followed only by the instinct and with the organs of sight, he knew where the aim, as he saw the slow jiggling hand that held the heart. As a hunter for many years, he's been a reason to recognise, at the level of muscle memory to aim for revealed vital parts, as they were a lot softer than hitting carapaces of through layers of skin. Many of times, he had built traps that would destroy and reveal a part, despite not being the case, it was too late. Too late for the oathbreaker next to him to reach in time, it was released at the boy who stood there, playing with rocks. With their breaths visible, it was almost as if the time dimmed down at the last moments of the child had. And the last moments the witches would get to see through the boy's eyes as a glance caught the glimpse of the sun's ray reflected on the edge of a polished iron arrow's head. They both screamed, one of anger and the other one as he fell into a stance of battle. Though it got close, the boy stood low, barely realising what was happening. It flew. And only grazed onto one of the fingers as they shifted around, though no scream. The man jumped to the boy and stood in front of the hunter. 'Damn you man, this is the companion I was talking about, he's our friend.' The confusion came to the hunter as he saw the tall knight turn to such a fiend to help it ease. 'Are you all right?' For a second, he thought the arrow reached and chopped one of the fingers, the one that held the heart. Though no wound nor mark was left there. I could've sworn I saw a wound there, the arrow must've certainly reached. After the rocks were left at the bottom of the small hole he dug, he turned to see the man with the painted marks on his face. 'Is he coming with us?' 'Yes, he's the friend that's going to help us, you can.' A glance was exchanged though they hadn't met their eyes after it was being avoided. 'You can trust him, I hope.' 'This is certainly irregular and not an official mission.' 'What made you think that?' 'Was it the two feet tall boy with hands sprouting out of his body and holding his vitals?' 'Is that what made it so obvious?' 'Don't give me that look D'Arthois! I don't know what you're intending to do with him but we need to be on our toes on all time.' 'Don't tell me you're scared of a little boy playing with his rocks?' 'Are you?' 'Don't you dare! I swear on my honour that this will be the last time I help you. Not to mention that I wanted to help you on my own volition.' And a fat stack of gold atop of that. 'The wind was already in a howl, as the weather seemed to be getting worse and worse by the whimsies second that came. A reflection followed of their souls, above, conjured by the witches' coven. 'Yes, see them bicker and delay, this may be the very fate that eats all who dare have a word with us.' 'Is that so sister? Then tell the rest of us what have you in mind, not to mention what you'd dare and what you've tried.' 'Oh quiet you old cranes and let her speak already. We've got more than enough as it is for further delays.' Said the crone, killing even the single most useless fuss in their dome. Galagga. 'First of your name.' The crystal ball spoke, turning in on itself. From a globe so bitterly made of jade came to be a different assortment of shapes that moved and spoke. Their desperate tones. 'Your voice is a command. And I dare not deny. Tell me what I must. So my metal bars may never rust.' The shape said, still shackled by what previously held the globe, bounding it to their will. Such bitterness and anger on someone that used to be lustful and young. Galagga used to be human once, a maiden in her own with a different name. Her memory did not deny, even as her bitterness grew darker, upon seeing a reflection upon the shape, the true form of herself. It angered Galagga atop all. 'Stop that, don't mess with me you petty sphere, or I may break you and shackle you to one hundred twenty other chains. And you wenches, stop laughing, or shall you share the same fate as they.' Angered as she was, there was something that made her remember. A cruel joke, life dared play on her because of her cruelty, the memories that never died, their stand, tall and proud, never letting her even dare forget. Everything she had, up to the oil paintings and fresco that was made in her image, so many to count, all in different styles and shapes, in every angle she even dared dream. Not only did artists come, but poets too spoke of her beauty, accompanied by admirers of renown, even the poor, the old, the young, the in-between. Other than the two other malformed sacks of potatoes that called themselves witches, she knew better. 'I came from somewhere, mark me on my word. You wench had nothing, have nothing, nor will you even dream to achieve.' 'Is it so, why you act like a mad lady when you see your reflection?' 'How did.' 'Hush, little angel, we know, the globe betrayed you and the secrets of yours. We've seen it all, from row to bow.' The entire journey was displayed, and in one place, above their concern, from the distraction, the weather tamed. 'See for yourself. Look at it, you filthy witch!' It was indeed her past and how she grew up to have it all, the horse of the childhood too, named so she'd never forget. 'Courage, haha, as I thought. An even filthier name than yours.' The image changed and it revealed, after the death, someone dared. It was a burst of anger, unsurprisingly that made her burst out of the constant shame she displayed. Someone dared. 'They. They dug up my horse and took the body. Who dares do that to me, the leader of covenant?' She asked, her eyes making even the globe cover, in its original position, shaking and grabbing by the chains, with a pup like eyes, never to change. Though, in contrast, her eyes were of hellfire, bursting through, a version of hell, a miniature set of little human being bursting and boiling inside. They hit against the glass that was her eyes and hurt. She closed it right away and said. 'Look at what you've made me do, woman. It's all because of you!' Galagga pointed at the dark unless she calmed down, she couldn't see past the men in her shroud. 'Follow me and we will make them suffer.' Her voice was followed, though they couldn't stop from bitterly laughing at their fellow witch, making their eyes pop out as a mockery of her diseased gaze. 'Let's see where this leads then.' 'I've told you before that it's a great thing, you see. We will never be bored as long as we show her previous life, everything that she has lost.' 'But what about the horse?' 'We'll see. Unless someone dug that old rotten sack for something else.' The laughs were disturbing, to say the least, even to the wildlife, the ones that heard it, moving along, as they were scared. 'Stop whispering and quit barking, we've got plenty on the way.' 'Yes, ma'am!' They said, as they embarked, it was the stubborn part of a cut tree that once refused to be cut. Now it became a flying stump, enough space for three witches to come inside and fly, leaving their distant cry coming out of vertigo. The lack of control and what how they were previously told so, that they'd not get to use. 'Damn this, just take us to where the ball says. Or you will. Will.' 'Just slow down, I don't think I can.' Their voices were cut, the whirlwind was more than enough to stop all of them from speaking, preventing any attempt of retreat. Three stuck witches were now, at the mercy of a stump.No one dared say the word stop, as it would've grabbed the stump to a hold, as peculiar as it would seem to any human watching the sky for a floating tree.

A kind experiment

It was a man who stared at the skies, quickly evolving into the clouds, the night with its stars, then the sun.The process he went through never ended, repeated time and time, until one grim night.What brought to this occurrence was that, Jullivert, as the name was laid by the mother, lived a systematic life, though irrational and mad in another's point of view.His walls were scribbled by himself, only dates and numbers, words that didn't mean anything in particular.And to those who came to visit, and use to call friends, he abandoned such people, spending more and more time to see.'Oh, the sky.'He used to recall, previous night and nights before.'You fall on me with your precious light and I do nothing but stay and count your clouds, everything behind and more.'In a way, to him, a man that lived his life alone, the sky managed to be his home.His friends and his family.What laid beyond of it, he'd consider dream atop the skies, and somewhere in the deep space.As he'd say.'There, you, bright point.You're my dream now and then and forever in my mind I shall bear you.'His belief managed to lead him to believe that every single man, woman, child or animal's dreams were there.Though one day he watched, his room empty with only one bed, a window laid in front of him, blended with led.'It disappeared!'He duly noted, hearing the voice in his head repeat after him and his every note.The shock made him stay, and he saw.All the stars shifted places, suddenly in front of his eyes.'Is this really happening?'He asked, assuming the worst.'Is there someone there, someone who could've taken my star?'With his hands and a flip, his eyes were shuffled which lead him back to see a star standing in the place where it, one has gone.'You're there, it's like you haven't left me?'"Oh, but I would never do such of thing.'A voice made itself known, his back turned to see the intruder.It was a ball of malnourished witness that floated and spoke.Jullivert was silent, unable to speak, he saw a small rat that travelled along the floor.His mind was distracted as the mouse approached, the ball still silent, awaiting a response.Under the shadow, as the mouse approached, and to Jullivert's shock, the small rodent was pulled inside in the white ball of apparent transparent skin.And out of the back, a giant tail sprouted and hit the floor within seconds.It was another layer that his jaw dropped, at which, thinking of the resemblance he picked on. 'Are you my dream? Or my nightmare within?' The flailing was fairly disturbing as it was long enough to cause some trouble in the house, hitting the wall, unintentionally and letting some of the paint drops reach the floor upon its touch. The white at the end of the tail becoming a pink-grey. 'We are your dreams Jullivert!' He said my name, Jullivert thought. It must certainly be it, my dream now. But, something didn't add up for him, after watching and taking notes. 'Why are you here and? What happened to the rat?' 'Enough questions, let's us go!' It then said with a monotone, demanding, almost commanding, no resemblance to the voice of a human, though close enough. Jullivert knew that he was getting himself drawn to it, hearing himself in the transparent chambers that formed inside the floating star. 'Where?' He asked, daringly. Both repelled, and curious, he still thought of it as something dangerous. If it did that to a mouse, and as it turned, at the end of the tail, he saw his own scribbles then. Dreams or not, I will not touch them unless I desire to end the same way as they have. 'Do you doubt us?' It asked, as the end of it touched the door and out of the back, it came out as a carapace. The knob was being moved as it spoke, the colour though remained the same. The speed kind of distracted him, as a mere contact and it would all end. 'About what?' He was confused for a second, then he realised what was going on. After all, it's part of my dreams, surely it couldn't be bothering me. It knows everything is in my mind, a reflection of my thoughts, at least this is what people say the dreams are. 'I'm sorry, I should've have felt so afraid, I know you wouldn't hurt me!' In the middle of the night and under a stream from above, the clouds turned upon the stars, almost like a blanket covering them up. Raindrops came and started inflating it, thought the man was immediately left wet. Bigger and bigger, or such it grew, with each drop at least a centimetre or two. Not only that, also the texture, Jullivert could now see, small moving forms inside, still not scared. As he went through the night, unable to feel cold, perhaps, the main reason was that the cold air, and almost into a cone, everything was pulled inside. 'This is a dream, isn't it?' 'No.' 'But, how could this be then?' 'You saw us there and when it happened.' 'You mean the star shift?' The form in front of his eyes grabbed to a halt, and even the tail did the same, in its behind. The rain stopped too, the growing to an effect, the man such, was afraid. It felt as if he was threatened and ready to die, become one with it or even worse, unable to die. He wanted to run, but his two feet were too feeble to listen to any command. His knees though, most easily met the ground, there wasn't any question what was next for himself. He begged and plead for his life, staring at the blank spot where he thought he'd meet his eyes. Though it was met by silence, the ball said after, breaking it for the last time. He'd never get to experience such a thing ever again. As the tail swiped and killed him in a flash, growing even less than an inch bigger. The world was about to be devoured, yet none of it mattered. It took a while and appeared only as seconds, but the man wakes up, awakened by the voice. 'Wake up, you're not dead little man.' The voice said with an effect, it was almost as if. 'I'm not dead.' His eyes opened as he said it and in front of his eyes laid the sky, as light as it could be. 'But, the stars, in the sky, in full daylight? I can see all of them there!' He pointed before he diverted his sight to see, a hill with trees, all of which, the same giant tail laid, alive and well. Hundreds of exemplars along with him, they were all brought within, as it was said by the star. 'You're in my world now, but do not worry, even if you saw our glory along the stars. And even if it cost your world for it, you needn't worry, for everyone will be brought in hopes you wouldn't be alone.' 'But you're my dream, how could you dictate what to do? I want to be freed now!' But the man bit his lip after. The star said. 'Do you not recall when you've given it up? Right before you got pulled inside?' The memory didn't leave, but he said no word. He touched a tail, which made him into a pool of white, dissipating into the dark. In a second he was transported and thrown against stone, another tail, from which he sprouted from laid in front of him. 'What is this?' He asked, at which the voice said clearly so he'd pass. 'What was that?' It was almost as if it didn't know what happened. The tails felt like an extension of himself. No longer did he need to touch them, as they started listening to his mind instead of the touch. Twisting tendrils would stretch outward out of their quadrant and make him appear, yet further away. It was an old town, though no one there. 'You're the inhibitors of you, aren't you?' Sometime, long ago, someone used to live in the town. From where else did they manage to get those silly hats and clothes, other than the previous citizens of the town? He roamed around the town and looked, marvelling at the sudden burst of colour, out of cloth, washed straight from the colours of a rainbow, undoubtedly taken away from the sky itself without a notice. These ones were different, able to move around, though none touched. Surprisingly to him, they acted even more decent than what his idea of normal human being would've been. 'Oh, good evening.' As one raised a hat up to him, with a whiplash of air, after throwing it in the same way. Plenty of them around, at the market, each having a stand, fruits from every side. Jullivert spoke to himself silently, as he was surprised too by it. The fruits, with such freshness, couldn't have been brought there any other possible way, other than how he was brought. It juggled in front of him as if to buy, though he emptied his pockets in front, he was dry. There was nothing more than dust in there, there hasn't been a while. 'On the house you say?' And he received a blueberry of majestic purple, plump and rounded, eight times the size of the normal ones he'd get. 'This is amazing.' Whilst, almost choking, he was captivated and pulled in, the bittersweet eeriness that he once felt diminished right away, now to only be caught by glimpses and his desire to see more of it. And more of them. The dressed and the small shows they'd play in front of him, now Jullivert was more than a spectator in there, he became the main act of the story. 'Thank you. Thank you!' Jullivert bowed, his feet rowed around the busy streets, with so many of them, which created the illusion of lanes of a witness, a sea of white grass, through which he cut through. All of them, in a circle, avoided the touch and let him go through and enjoy himself, as he remained in the centre of attention. He passed eventually until he reached, the other side of the town, that was once out of reach. It was much more different than what he encountered, as even those around him seemed to have avoided it for reasons not known to him. They built it. 'So why are they avoiding to enter?' His thoughts were no longer inside, as he slipped on the site, various architecture blocks and sides were taken and placed together so they'd fit. Parts of such nature, old and crafted that they'd belong to an even older civilisation than the one that used to live in the town, crowns and sceptres and even thrones, all became part of the wall. Jullivert refreshed his hands and shook them as he was prepared, excited to enter. Beyond the point, the whole side bloomed into a light, lamps being lit one by one in front of him, even though there was dark, in more than one sense on the part of the town he was in. Above the building, there was the night sky filled with. He remembered the reason and why his thoughts were grabbed to a stop. Suddenly it made sense why there was nothing, and even more why this was so placed together. Jullivert found, just a few steps above, at the top of a tower that came closer to the sky, at the very end of it, closes to the beyond, laid his home. It was quite late too and he wanted to return home. Seeing as no one followed, and knowing that atop of it all, there might be a chance that his bed was brought to, in the journey, he started walking towards his goal.

Love garden

'Good morning students.' The class responded immediately after in complete unison. 'Good morning miss Prie!' Some dust already got thrown by the side as the need arise, a desperate call, as she reminded herself. Out loud so they'd hear, the corpses near her, thinking they're alive. 'You're all dead, aren't you?' It was a grief and sadness that pushed her to remember, the once beautiful and young features they had turned into dust as she despaired. They were dead because of me, and no one else. It was a miracle that she could keep her consciousness together, even if she was as lucky as she remained, taking in consideration what happened. A mine, not long before she stepped into. Now forced to walk with a peg leg made out of the body of one of her previous class children. It was even worse when she phased out. 'This is something new.' She said, to be immediately replied by. 'Good morning miss Prie. I'm sorry if I was late, though I had a lousy job remembering what you've said. What was that again?' And to spare. 'But how?' The leg appeared to be there, just to check. With an immeasurable amount of intensity, she forced herself to move her toes. The teeth cringed below in a rust, moving on their own as if they were the fingers she so desperately tried to move. 'This makes no sense whatsoever child, how?' The other side wasn't well, a bad time indeed, the country sent her there. 'War!' The men yelled above, the mortar firing whilst she was lost in a crater below. The muttering and barking of a mutt were most audible as she thought. 'A dog in my classroom, how could this be? Who broke the rules class? Was it, you? Maybe you?' Or was it, me? My memory seemed to have declined. It was a fall of water from above, the crater laid near a river where the hole overlaid. It fell away from her presence but in time water would arise, she'd drown if not escape, but out there she'd die. 'How am I to climb?' She asked, and the class answered. 'Climb what miss Pree?' It was duly noted that they did not know. She raised an eyebrow and looked before. At the end of the class laid a wall with pictures, drawings made by children left there for their teacher to see. Out of all of them, one, in particular, stood out, it had the image of an ongoing war, moving on its own. An animation, she thought, common. It would've been a nice addition to the curriculum for her to teach, though, she wasn't an art teacher. Nor were any of the children in the class willing. A blast came from above, and out of the sky, blood started raining. She saw a man get ripped in glances as he hit the ground, spread, no chances. As she came closer, she saw a small medallion that used to be in his hand. 'Was this your child?' She asked the torso, ribs visibly broken and in parts, rubbing his cheeks before comforting him. 'Do not worry for your child, for he will be safe.' And in her classroom, another child came. 'What's your name little boy?' Her eyes widened as she approached, the child shaking, coming for an embrace. Griefing it seemed as he said. 'My mother said my father won't come home.' It saddened miss Pree to know that such a thing would occur. She felt for the wife, knowing that the man died, never to be coming back. Though she was happy, oh alas, another child came into my class. 'Worry not, for you shall stay with me, in this class, never to feel alone or hurt, ever again.' It made the child smile, as she thought, she did something good, something better, she helped the child right to the letter. Though. 'Name, your name I've got to write down. Else you might not make it in this class, no, not at all.' So, she said. She blinked again, looking at the body, searching around. Whilst one of her hands went inside of the lower part to search, twisting around the ribs that broke and even the slightest touch, until she found it. A shrapnel. A shrapnel, she thought. She stared at it for a moment. Then she stared at him for a moment. 'Pnel. Pnell. Pnelopee. Penelope. Yes, your name is Penelope, the little girl. Again, I'm sorry for your loss, but you may take a seat. Do not worry about.' And the girl went in her place, the name written but no face. A blankness, emptiness that laid atop the body as Pree's brain couldn't fathom the changes of features. Yet, despite the horrible appearance, she didn't care. Nor did the other children, as I thought them well, she said. No prejudice despite the malformation of the little girl, they were the best class she could hope for. After passing, further into the crater, there was no hope, there were bodies everywhere, overwhelming to see. She shouted and ran away unable to look. Too many, too many for my class, I can't stop I need to run. Women and men alike, even children for the fight, all laid dead inside the crate, though it was not here where they died. But where they were dumped to rot. It was rare for Pree to plainly ignore a child, especially so fitting for her class. Standing alone in her corner, darkly hidden from the light. They were monsters, no children fit for my class. 'You are to learn not to be little monsters.' She said the class noted, the emptiness bent to the sides. An obsession was clear, even to herself, so desperately as she wanted to come closer and stare into the picture taken and see. What is this war and why is it calling for me?' Paradise!' Was yelled, at the top of her lungs. She needed a break, unable to move on. Before that, regardless of how hard she tried, she failed every single time sickly in despair. No matter her effort, attempts, in vain, it made her feel bad and destain. Why have I become forsaken, of all? Why is that I'm alone and gone? No matter where she looked, she was alone, no one to help her, no one to know what she felt like. The pits were empty and she yelled. 'Yell at me, say something, tell me, I need to know.' Why am I so alone? Of the sudden, I felt something that I've never felt, wicked in despair. I have never looked at it that way. Her hands looked crumbled from being tired, she could only rest on a bed of corpses from which she stood, curled into a ball, holding her baby. He was crying in the class. Though she couldn't see it anymore, being too tired for that and everything else that happened that day. Night was already succumbing in the sky as she wrote in her journal: 'Yours truly, another day I have not died.' After that, Prie snapped and fell asleep. Her dreams comforting for at least the night. There, she waited, in a line. Much more different than the class of her dreams, even more so that she saw only adults, no children, no in-between. The ground was dull as was everything around, which made it even more unbearable, having to wait through every minute and second of the dream. She'd get to do so every night from there on after, having to forever go through the same treatment, of stopping, moving along, stopping again, two feet further, time after time. No one would talk, and nor would she either. She felt like a child, unable to talk, speak or communicate even in the most intricate hand signs if she wasn't asked first. The endless line seemed to be going forever and forever long, first, she saw the silhouettes that slowly grew thinner and thinner until she could only see a line. Once, as she recalled, looked back and got the same in return, a darker line that waited for her to keep going and stop slacking in the line. Who were they? She asked herself. A man was right on her back, and she recognised him as the one she previously encountered. His son is in my class, she said. There was no destain and nothing more to it, as the thoughts were riddled with confusion. So was the will of a dream, if life for her meant to be lived at the verge of a war, starvation, thirst and gore. The man said nothing but she wanted to announce how she took his son in her classroom and how well he adapted. The necklace was at the neck, close as she could see. After a few seconds of being stuck there, staring at the man with his blank expression, she wondered, how come, he didn't do anything, no emotion visible, nothing. But the line stopped at her and a sudden shift of the eyes came. Those ghoulish eyes and the skin wrinkled came to her, an eye popping out and hanging down to what was a collar, previously being a necklace of the child. The body started twisting inwards, pulled into a hole, slowly and she didn't know why. That happened to all of them, in the back, the line once thin started becoming shallower by the second, yet no word was said. Nothing to her at least. Prie needed to be sane. I have to understand, why is it happening so. Though she turned, thinking everything was real, her body moving on its own accord, just to reveal, after a step was already done forward, that, they came back to normal after the line resumed. Prie resumed, keeping it in mind, what would happen if she failed to keep going. Even more, what would happen if the person in front of her refused to move? Awaken, her heart almost blew out of her chest. She threw out eyes and a part of a skull of someone's eternal passing, revealing what fell from the sky. A giant metal shell covered in metal, round and solid, penetrating the beyond. The impact broke the land and in front of her eyes, she saw some smoke rising from it but no bang. No one from around her seemed to have noticed. 'Well, that's just rude, isn't it?' None of them seemed to even want to respond. Prie went alone, closer to the shell, after a glance and a touch, it almost burnt her hand. It was out of proportions how something this hot could've landed there and now, at such a time. Big and round, with a propeller behind, just asking to be touched some more. The behaviour, imitating a dog made her refused to touch. The thought, even the simplest addition to pain made her attempt to cry. A good lesson, though, she spoke to her children. 'Pain isn't something you'd like to experience, especially such as this. See there blister children?' The class nodded, some having been raised to get closer and expand their sight on the dark blisters of skin under the skin. A few layers were taken in already, melted muscle too. Not only did the feeling long left, but now she lost some vital functions on moving her hand. 'It's not that bad, worry not, I will do my best to talk to this class and handle thing as well as I can! But. 'But, there was another man, he laid there under the fallen sky-bullet, as hot at it was, he kept blinking and staring at her. Priece froze, it was a long time since she met a man, alive, especially in the condition that the legs and more than half of the body were missing under the shell. There was a nervous cough done by both of the parties, past the glares. No one seemed to have said anything, but her inside the head. Was he the man in the line, waiting? Priece tried to look but saw no necklace. There was still the option to talk. Avoidance first. She started walking and noticing the eyes follow and the body not shaken a bit. Even the head stood still as they waited for one another to say anything. She stopped. 'Water.' The man said, in the raspiest voice she ever heard. She checked herself and nodded, there was no water pounce, but a puddle not from afar. After that, with no other word, she went to get water, finding the puddle, every dirty by condition. No pounce, so she did the next logical thing, bending down and taking as much as she could in her mouth. Dirt filled with the remains of ants, more water and a giant malformed bug. It was flowing through the sides of her mouth as she was ready to gargle it away, though not before remembering. The giant shell that laid waiting for her to come back. Back to the man who stood there, feet away from one another, broken as his spine. The neck was porached and he wanted nothing more than the final need to die. A leap after another, she opened her mouth after and released all she had into the surprised mouth. The man started choking, having a varied amount of common worm filled mudd inside of his mouth. It was too late to spit it out as the jaw blocked itself from reopening, making it clear that there was only one way for that to go. He refused to swallow it entirely as his part of body wiggled. Already was it awkward as Priece stood inches away from him, staring blankly, with a strange intent? It was much worse than a simple observation, as she cringed. Unable to do anything else, the man swallowed it, then he opened his mouth to grasp air, desperately in his attempt. 'Oh joy, you've done it. You've done it so.!' She yelled in her dance and glance, all around the bomb, never has she been such a joy. My friend has accepted my water and now we're bonded. Isn't that right? We're not friend forever. 'It wasn't clear what stopped her joy, but it came with an actuality that shook her for seconds. An old man, in all the meaning of the word, and with the bomb covering more than the rest of his body, she couldn't tell how old indeed he was. Though, never had she an adult friend, never indeed. She hasn't realised until that point and when she did, she couldn't stop looking at the features. Getting even more awkwardly close, to feel the vibrations of the fright. It was seconded, that took until she managed to time her breaths so she'd steal what he exhales out of the nose. Despire helping him, she couldn't tell why he didn't speak anymore, so a backup, just some steps, made her see the whole image. Though it backfired, indeed, the man seeing the small baby, face to face as they were both turned upside down, heads in the ground, at the same level it seemed. A baby in the battleground and used as part of her leg? The thought of it scared him even more than being killed there, that he'd live on, as a part of her. Who know what this loony is missing next or what she'd take. But the vision got blurry, the crushed organs sigh, the man stood there ready to die. Looking at the horizon he saw a line of light, it was the artillery line, the war wasn't over, nor would the horrors of it even be done. Far away from the crater laid a patch of land. It saw not the horror of the war, as they never experienced any, there a group of people stood and went on with their lives. For them, a girl with two of her friends, came down the lake, another small and simple day. She waved to them, to join, one had a notebook, the other a scowled face. 'Come on Jhonny, before it gets too cold for us to go.' 'Right on it!' It was the type of excitement that hasn't seen hardship, not too strong, nor too heavy, just a little, way too shabby. They came down the small pond, it was ever clean, that begged for them. The girl jumped first, to be skinny dipping followed by her friend, floating by the side. But Jhonny stood there, to sketch them, clearly happy to be around. 'Aren't you going to join us?' Alice asked, she grinned and stared as her body was underwater, ready to be seen. 'I'm.' He was the first to notice, a small object slowly flying, far away from them, at which he pointed towards, dropping his sketchbook in the water, splashed waking both of them up. They've had no idea, but a flare, an explosion from far away, sent a dashing gust of wind and rubble, throwing Jhonny in the pond unwillingly. 'What's happening? Are we being invaded?' It was both a question and a warning, as Alice went and grabbed her clothes, the water having demolished the impact she felt, rather than the two of them. As well as it happened, they failed to realise. The pond they were in was a bloody red demise. A quick turn and they saw that a piece of sharpnel got thrown away and penetrated the skull, leaving him sinking below, pulled away, then gone. Alice screams in peril and started crying, getting closer to Jhonny and out of the bloody water. She fell in his arms, they were both distraught. The pain just hit him too as the sharpnel wasn't just a piece. If there once was a feeling in his left arm, now it was gone, it was a sharpnel inside, a malformed skin with an eye that was blinking at him, pulsating and coming deeper in him. He had no word to say to her, though he wanted to warn her off. Another jaw broke as he saw that a sharpnel was coming out of her eye. The next two people died as the fragments got spread away. It seemed to be an infection, short lived, but far away. The sound of the explosion was pleasant as even Priece has heard it from the distance she was. More dirt and water came into her home, the creater and the class. 'And a new student children. You may know him, or not, but worry not if he's a little older now, we've all went through that, adults that is.' Some eyes rolled, right through the small crowd. They looked at her in front and from afar, all paying their respects to what she said and would've done the same, regardless of what she said. The image grew taller across the wall opposite of her and thrice as distracting as it was before. No longer could she look the other way and claim that she did not see. Nor could she form coherent sentences with it expanding on the world, the view forcing itself against her own awareness. Soon she stood silent, in front of a class, behind of which stood an entire wall, where the man stood as he did before. They couldn't see it, no one dared look back, nor did they try. It felt even more disturbing that she spent the rest of the day staring at him, then back to sleep again, though not after tiring herself up. Another night was coming, the man stuck, she fell asleep into her own well-made bed for corpses, same as every night, it came back to her system, the night, dreams and sight. Though this was different, especially since it was a most tiresome day. She felt weird going to sleep, that was new to her. Where she went next, a place that she didn't recognise, perhaps even one that would be located at the end of a line. It was a set of patched tied together, giant marks that they were sewed. Priece walk on dirt, then mud, she went on sand, through water, and ice cold. It was a gradient to her liking, and to her liking remained. It was a dream coming true, the places she has never seen before, the ones that she did not get a chance to experience and go through. A cut part of a cafe, through which the table was cut in half, leading to a fraction of a street, which had a disembowelled car. Empty, she thought of driving it, though too much was cut out of it for her to come through with it. The wheels and balance seemed to work, though in no logical world would the car sit the way it did. Prie stopped to examine and touch it, concluding that it wasn't a statue or illusion, it stood above on its own rights. Everything there did the same, breaking the laws of gravity, even seagulls were cut in half above of her, frozen mid-flight, making her seem as if she was in a scene. She looked far away and saw. 'You're the man I encountered before!' And there it was, half of the bomb cut off, though too far that she'd not even get the chance to get to the point. It would take a varied amount of effort, walking through so many patches, of dirt. The sand was hot, the ice was cold, it gave her mixed feeling through the body, shock after shock, of weather, of rain. First, she was wet from it, then dry, a short break at a standing stool, a butchery with disgust. Luckily it was cut just right, as she kept away from a fairly amount of gore, an animal of a kind, she couldn't stand seeing an animal get hurt, no matter the race or size. She cared for them, especially in her class, how couldn't she not, after so much time has passed? Though it was more steps that made her realise, she left marks one very patch she went through, revealing her every step and side. If someone were to follow me, they'd find me with ease. And Prie couldn't help but think. Why do I keep going? Through a broken house, a basement that laid above, a cool room that had no holes, only to find herself staring and conversing with a doll of her size, which said. 'You must go on young lady.' Her young voice said. It was patronising to hear the voice of a child speak in the manner, but she wasn't in her classroom, so she'd have no authority in the matter. She snared and limped further, ignoring the path behind. The patches seemed to become shallower, the further she went on. Dirtier ones, and harder to walk, her legs were numb, as were her arms. The baby below started screaming and crying as if it was a mistake all along to go further that way and even beyond of that. Though she knew that she need to see to the man, carrying a canister of water she picked on from a table. It came right its time, as she kept walking ahead, almost too convenient of a placing, even for her. To avoid being linear, and seeing how it was no maze, she stopped going forward and walked to the side. No longer was Prie guided by fate and was lead on a slope, slowing rising above, the patches becoming harder to traverse, though it gave her some self-worth. A sunny place, then one dark, the middle of a cave, a crowd of people cut in halves, taken from another place altogether, some sliced together to form new people, only for the scene, as the patches moulded together into a dance of scenery. The last step was there, where she stopped in the middle of the crowd. It was a spot like no other, not one she'd find herself into, one way or another. Space suddenly folded in front of her eyes, she saw as the people get as thin as paper sheets, limiting her space of walk. Now, without her approval, it was turned around, almost like a machine, forcing her to go forward, no other detours. She tried turning around, but space and patches were folded one more, making a wall of paper sheets, as tall as she could look above. There wasn't any doubt either, that with enough of them stacked against each other, she'd get no chance to pass through. There was only the path clear, calling for her to come near and never return. Everywhere around her, space would only bend and fold to nothing more than what it was. A flat surface full of mass. Appealing yet surprising, the feeling of being around filled her as she surfed through the path. It was the sudden gust of school she felt that made her stumble on the way. Prie didn't remember drinking that day, or any for the matter. The last time she had attempted such a thing, her memory dictated that something else occurred, a gust of dust coming out instead of the water she had desperately needed. And it would've been the most question, a Baridinion De Le Noruie, and old by the bottle. Or at least it was exquisite, judging by the rites of a war, the standards being so low, that it was either any drink at all or dehydration. Though no, not since the coming of the water, the rains brought enough to relieve her. There was something else in the mix, other than what she knew and expected. A feeling so lonely is forgotten that it came with a shock. It was an addiction to that feeling of being smashed, mentally impaired, even in her dream-like state and attempt to go into the class, that was affected too, as long as the furthest pair. Of eyes, of legs, bits of bones all welded into the ground and ceiling, the picture frame expanded, the class being entirely covered with the picture of war. There was no way out for her. Prie could see the combatants and walk over them with all her might, though none would feel anything since they were not there, at least no in her mind. For once, yet another encounter and the night was still young, she wanted to join the war and in a fight, even with the state, she was in. I will not even dare, dismiss my class. Prie thought, not at all surprised by the clearness and strength of her thought. The body wobbling around was more than a clue of what she felt like, so why need anything else? Nothing else had previously satisfied her, so Prie decided then, in the midst of the moment. Perhaps I don't need to be here at all, nor would I deny, the needs that I've got for something else. The classroom suddenly opened, as the image of war retracted. Behind her stood the door open after cutting through the board, leaving but enough space for entry. Where she stood there, her back turned against her class. She had no idea if they looked at her, nor could she care. For the first time in a long while, it was all about her, and no one else. The first step, despite her thought of being ever pleasant, remained the same, just as the first step she took when firstly coming into the house. A nostalgia that remained unmet yet felt by fragments in her coat. Quite appealing as she found herself in the middle of the rain at night. No door behind, as well as the classroom that had disappeared. Prie bit her lips, opened her umbrella and looked ahead. She was greeted by a man wearing a reddish, dark suit, and a vastly bright orange flower, punctured by a golden eye. It was alluring to think of it and see, how much it made her feel like a stranger to him. 'Who are you?' 'May I take your coat, madam?' He asked with a grin, his eye widening a bit. They were a few steps, already inside the house, and a guilty oak surrounded them both. Something unpleasant was about to happen, and she could feel through the holes in the house. Plenty of them laid around, asking her what was needed and what was gone. Like a transmission well received, the voiced kept pressuring her until, with a swoop, she placed her hand inside her pocket only to find a portion of a big heart. The transaction scared her for a moment, as she was about to throw it away, only to be caught by the man, furnishing his lavished suit with his other hand. 'I'm terrible sorry madame, though you may not drop any blood. I've recently washed everything myself with both of my hands. You may come in now, wait no more than a second. You'll get to see that someone's waiting for you inside the house.' She made sure she signaled that there'd be no pleasure from doing that action, of the sorts. There was no time for her to glance or enter any trance. This was it, the moment that changed, that came in a long time without her knowing. For the first time in the war something has changed and no longer would her thoughts be scrambled. The face of the man was unknown to her, something that she hasn't seen. Nor did she expect to go and see, furniture, red and brown, covered in fur of all sorts. It felt like a palace, the other side of the house where she entered in the next room, with a stove so big that it could fit yet another human in there, not that it'd be needed. Though the golden locks above of it and the handles made it look like the entrance to hell. It got her attention not only quicker than everything else, but also it made her think of something else. 'Ehm.' A slightly dimmed cough, mostly audible from the start, though a reaction only came later as she turned and saw. It was an old lady sitting in a chair, a normal one, nothing fancy. For a second there, nothing clicked, she had stopped bothering herself with the voices from the wood, the ever burning entrance to hell, she wanted to speak with the mademoiselle. 'Did you ask for me?' 'May I speak to you, young lady?' 'Oh, you may.' She signed for her to sit, as there was a chair accompanied by a glass table in the front. Before standing down, at last, she saw it again, through a reflection. Against the table, it fluttered, the image of war still going on, soldiers getting shot through glass cups, the candle slowly melting at the midst of mortar. Prieë looked the other way. She started impaling her own leg with her overgrown nails, trying to look the other way so she'd not appear nervous. Though the constant shaking made it obvious, even to her. Refusing at every passing moment to look her in the eyes. It was an awkward pause, another thing she hadn't expected to encounter, not that it was needed for her, as it was broken. The solemn silence misspoken. 'I was in your class, you know.' It came in like a breeze, as Prieë's eyes avoided to gaze upon the glass of war. After a full motion, she stared at the frail old features. 'May I pour you some tea madame?' Prieë looked upon, what she could only think as a butler in the mansion, only to notice that the eye was gone. The reflection now beating on the chug he was carrying the tea on. 'And for you too mademoiselle?' His accent was thick enough to cut through the ranks like a razor, the gaze he left was mourning for the loss, as well as burning them alive, as it was the middle of the war. She could see that it was a burning day, in a desert, though she was still sleeping. So was the man under the bomb. Though Prieë did not wake up. It must've been. 'Ehm, for you too, mademoiselle?' The butler refrained himself from showing any emotion at all. Perhaps it was the yellow tint, though she was inclined, responding with a single nod, as the butler poured the endless corpses through a pile. It was through the pouring tea that she had the perspective of her sleeping. Ghastly, she thought, an outworldly experience, as she was too far from her body, nor could she hear herself talk, snore of sleep. Or even if. Even if she was still alive. The shock, despite its apparent strike, was yet to take full effect against her. More of it was to come and she knew too well she couldn't say, as she asked. 'Why exactly am I here? Is there a reason for it?' The butler was already done, though she did not immediately take the cup. Politely he backed away, leaving it on the table and in direct contact if she was to turn and gaze. 'Straight to the business, eh? Well, Prieë, you've always been one for action rather than talk, weren't you?' The old lady had a certain flair of something to her as she sipped, little finger lift, minding her manners. Though could she be right? Prieë asked herself again. The old lady, one of her students? Surely this could be a mistake, though the thought of it started breeding and wanting more. She needed to understand, especially since the war started, there was no period of true rest, a break from the constant confusion that haunted her from the previous years. Before she said anything, Prieë interfered. 'How come you said you were in my class? I mean, if you beg my pardon and answer my little curiosity.' 'I somehow knew you'd ask this Prieë, and. You may have noticed it too dear, oh how young you are. It may be hard for you to hear what I'm about to say. Especially since you may not be able to stay here as much as you can.' The bad news was a new, just waiting to be told. She scratched her forehead in return, ready to deliver the dire news, that just had to be heard. Someone had to tell them, after all, and that one remained her. The one that welcomed Prieë in her home, only for a short time, after. 'Your death Prieë. It was a dreaded event, though I believe you may have been aware for a while.' Prieë dropped her cup of tea as she heard the words clutter. Her eyes went towards the reflections in the glass and in what remained of the head. A strange thing, as there was no memory of her even picking up the cup. It was a shock after all, and one incredibly bad, worse as it was, impossible to take. 'I can't be dead. The war, my class, you and.' 'I'm terribly sorry I had to deliver that to you, my dear, though there was no another choice. You see, we're in the same situation as it is.' 'Hah.' It was a grin dark smile and a gagged laugh. Not at all the expected reaction from a woman finding out she was dead, even more, possible mad. 'I presume you've got a reason for your laughter at such a dire moment? Perhaps you're not realising yet, but the bad is just about to come. An even more staggering one.' 'You're telling me we're both dead and something could be worse?' 'Yes my dear, and as I said, that's not the last of it. You've got a burden placed on yourself, so you may as well just sit down and listen.' The butler waited for in-between, knowing that it wouldn't be needed anymore for him to pick up what was left down. He knew his time was coming, so he nodded back to her lady, playing his little violin in the corner, as she spoke. 'We're all dead and restless for a reason. It's all because of you.' She pointed accusatorily. 'You see my dear, when you left our house, that terrible day, called for war, never to return to our small town, you've placed a burden on both yourself and all of us. One that needs to end.' 'I still don't understand, how could.' 'You're not listening to girl, though you may have been our beloved teacher then, you still failed to see beyond that dark fantasy. You've died in the war and got stuck in a purgatory of your own made hell. And.' She paused to looked at the window. It was, barely now, that Prie looked and saw the pale trees, hanging one another outside, no ground, just stacked on one another. This was her purgatory to face with the sole company of her butler, and the wood was for the fiery pit next to her, golden as it remained. 'You must free me Prie, you must do so for all of us stuck in their own hellish places. Only so will you be free.' The cosy fire started fading, and cold entered the room. 'But. What will happen to me once you're all gone? Why? Won't I be left alone in my purgatory?' Her hands slammed and almost broke the table. 'Who's going to save me if I save you all?' 'This is your duty, and you can't be selfish about it. You'd doom us all otherwise.' 'And I won't be? Why? Why must I do this? I've never asked for anyone of you to care about me, let alone be shackled like that. I.' 'You need to be responsible for once, or have you forgotten what's it like? Do this.' 'For us!' The butler said, slowly revealing his face. It was yet another one of the kids, Prie blushed at the sight and thought of the embarrassment of not recognising him prior. 'So you too.' 'Indeed.' 'William, you don't need to.' 'Wait, madame.' His waist was lifted and face lit, the voices that ran through the various holes suddenly stopped too and listened as his voice came through. 'I believe we may have already met my marseille. This is why there is a slight favour I may be in need of asking of you.' 'Wait a minute, you're not actually a butler, are you?' 'Not exactly. As you may have heard and as I was indebted to in this place, you see.' He opened his coat revealing a vault in his chest. With a quick flicker, he turned and opened it to reveal a fortune of golden eyes, all stuffed inside his chest. 'You always like collecting them, didn't you?' It was rare for anyone to glance and see Prie's bright face and the smile that came with it. 'You remembered.' He said, as he offered a few of them, as many as it would fit in the small hand of her, just so she'd feel the nostalgia. I knew them. Prie thought, as close to a sane as she did. Every single one of them, their lives and their families. Suddenly in her mind, the classroom she was once in, with all the children screaming, behaving, misbehaving, being as animated as children could be. There was never a perfect order in her classroom, though she did not want, nor ask for such a thing. William was there, in the third row. Oh, and how much he changed, she blushed at the sight and thought of the young man, how he'd get to be when he got older. And what he enjoy, at closing hours, his parents waited for him to come, explorers as they said. And from everywhere they went, they brought something exquisite to him to see and hold. Mementoes filled his bag, and Priece swore that other than that, he had a crush on a girl sitting next to him. And even so. 'How could you?' 'That was my father mademoiselle. William the first. I am the second in the line.' 'A second one? How could it be that such a feature would turn out so perfectly fit on another face, not to mention the obvious?' A grief came to her. 'You've died young too, haven't you?' 'Even more, the reason for us to be released Priece. For my son, for my husband, waiting for us on the other side. Please reconsider dear and do remember, we can't force you to do anything.' Priece looked at both of them on the side and for a second then, she considered her decision, what it would've done. They both lived and died together, had a son. Do they deserve to remain like this forever? And what of me? 'Very well!' Perhaps it was the small conviction of her own salvation that made her accept their proposal. If it was true after all, and they'd all be safe, there'd be no reason for her to be punished, especially for something that she didn't deserve. 'So you're going to do this?' The old lady smiled, already accompanied by her son, who took a blanket to warm her around. 'But isn't there a fire?' 'It won't be any more my dear, this is why I must apologise now for what's about to happen.' 'May I tell her, mother?' 'Very well.' The man grew a tighter grip on the handle and removed one of the golden grills that were holding the fire at bay. It appeared as if the flames were getting ready to devour his hand at the slightest touch, even as he released, the gust of brim fire and smoke, almost ate him alive. He backed away from the pain, and from the gust came, almost as a wicked trance, a cannon ball firing and bursting through the table, breaking even through the thickest layers of the house. It was mere meters that prevented the disembowelment of her hand, the blindness of the eye. The cannon subsided back, and it was the fear in her eyes that she could not deny. 'What was that? You haven't told me about that.' 'I'm terribly sorry my dear, though it seems our time is running short.' She pointed at it, the burning oak, replaced by trees, corrupted and misguided by the shaped form. 'This is it, make the choice!' Her voices echoed as the branches approached, stretching from the other side of the room, demanding everything of her. It was now that Priece pulled back a foot and started to run towards the flame, there was no other path she could take. She turned and look at both before closing both of her eyes, only to be met by a bright light, a yellow eye lid and a blast. Awoken, she saw that near her there was an artillery shot, barely missing her face inches and shoved deeply into the rock side. From it a liquid was dripping on her shoulder, which made her sprout the most unholy of bickering as she was startled by it. 'Blasted thing. Damn you.!' She said again, backing away to look above. Planes. At a time like this? Priece saw them blast across the sky, bombarded and striking back, from the looks of it, they were new. Lights reflected from them and bouncing back. 'We can't stay here anymore child, we need to go. Wait!' Before she'd get the chance to turn, in her direction, the vision of her old comrade appeared, or so she thought. Despite sharing nothing but glances and water, she came to the bomb, seeing him awake, the land was about to be broken, as was her friend. 'We have to take you out of there before it's too late. Otherwise, we might both be goners for the sake of it.' The expression was one of gloom, the man still had a few pounds over him and already crushed half of his body. Even if she managed to free me, this insane woman, she's can't possibly believe. 'Do. Don't!' The voice said, water barely managed to keep him alive, though his lips and throat were still dry. The chances just weren't stacked for them, together to survive. Priece saw the sad look on his face as the place seemed to be shaking, ready to collapse. Atop of that, there was still the impending water that would more than likely drown the place once the real bombardment started. Hence why she didn't look behind, crying of what she'd always remember. My dear friend. From which she took, the small pendant that was held, as a promise. It was a struggle but the intention was clear, despite not knowing her, he wanted Prie to get and deliver the small metal piece. An inscription behind ready Mary, though the pendant itself was locked, and no amount of force or trickery would get through the small lock system that held it at bay. Even further secured, inside of her pocket, safe from anyone who'd even attempt to take it away from her. The artillery was in full avast, the trumpets run. No longer was the battlefield passive, just as well as she could no longer hide in her hole and be fine. Either the course of war straightened and came back, or a new enemy emerges, that could've been the only explanations Prie could think of. Any other wouldn't suffice, or at least not enough to get her past the rocks and dirt as she tried, endlessly going over and over. There was no time for dreaming. Damn these walls of dirt, they've made me sloppy and weak. And you too child, whoever made you join me in this war must've been a mad man. It was a struggle to the top, though, as she gripped on a cluster of dirt and rocks, they all fell towards the bottom, revealing something to grab on. 'A tank, here?' Both of her hands, similar to tendrils, grabbed and held onto it, trembling at the sight and thought it might shoot. Though she was reluctant, it was clear that whoever drove it into the dirt, ended into the dirt. 'Lucky.' A foot jumped and a formation, one that passed by, merely a few feet away from her position, all of them running for a strike. It must've been the dirt that concealed her, or perhaps the difference between them. No more breaks, a boot on the shaft and she popped out, finally on the ground. Perhaps if there were fewer soldiers and not a war, Prie wanted for the longest time, she needed to see what the world had become. Now she got what she wanted, the war, fully blown again, she stood on the ground, pretending to be a corpse. A perfect defence mechanism. This should keep me safe until this clears out, it did work out the last time, hasn't it? But her mind was silent. No children, no classroom, yet. In times like this, that would've been most welcomed and needed, though now. It was time to endure. The shots and close landmarks from the sky, that almost blew out her hearing, not to mention that she sat down on the ground, waiting to either be found or hit. Was the hole really that bad, or should I go back to it? Though she was answered without even expecting it. Two arms grabbed and suddenly threw her in the air, as the pupils expanded, and her lungs begged for air. A pair of voices said something after she was grabbed and holding on again. They said something of the sort. 'Those two will be more than enough for what we need. Now move on!' 'Y'sir!'

Silkroad

A windmill ran from side to side, despite having its wings broken because of the time and harsh weather. It wasn't like any other, the jewel of the town. Written by lord Biteersteihn himself at the day it was built and released for the public eye. Though, now, what remains of it is just as unknown. The house near it lays on a distant road, at least thousands of days underground, the crater that decimated everything but the mill remains. Even time refused to smile and give it a rest, as countless avalanches of rock and dirt fell throughout the years, failure after failure and still none succeeded. Long it waited for the wind to stop, for the rock, the cliff on which it stood upon to crack and let it snap below. And it did. After the long wait, the remaining formations of rock and dirt finally gave up despite their effort, releasing what they had, and leaving the jewel in the hands of the abyss. The abyss started as the jewel plunged, the wings spinning a thousand time faster than before, being thrust into the farther point it'd achieve. It flew in a straight life, avoiding the various sharp shapes that would've pierced it otherwise. As it seemed, a small part of the rock and dirt was moulded withing, making it one, unable to shatter like the rest and managing to keep it whole. Inside of it, despite the lack of eyes from the outside world, a car stood there, eating its food, looking at other animals running rampant in the man-made shed. Such a peculiar nature, that they'd not notice, even more so is how they survived the passing of the time. The grains stood there in a part, as did the bones of each passing generation. Each and everyone marked with smouldering blood. The cat too wondered with the lack of its eyes, though it still managed to see, until it died. A piece of rock flew through the window, left open by the wind, it pierced the cat, as it revealed to the other animals, the horror that lurked outside. Instincts started flowing, the shouts of animal-induced rage began. Boars were gurgling blood as they stuffed themselves into one another, it was a war-induced rage that managed to stand on its own. Bottles of wine that would've been millions shattered as they flew in the air, slowly, inside the mill, gravity started taking place. It was an utmost capricious feeling for them, as they flew in the air, so they thought, the six feet infectious rats, the birds with no wings, even the furless cocusuin. The boars took the opportunity for an assault, bouncing themselves against the walls to get the momentum, only to be slowed again, stacked hays standing there in their way. Sharp like needles they pierced the skin and burrowed themselves inside the board, leaving nothing but a golden appearance to the beast of war. Repelled by a single light, the one coming from above, the mill was somewhat still close to the surface, falling ever so slow. The golden boar, enchanted by the light, appeared ten times more menacing than before, and eight-times fatter, to which accord, it was grabbed down, the only animal standing there on the flat floor. After so many unhindered wild instincts and a brief break, the roar it released shook the whole plane into submission, at which everything fell into its place. A victory thought of it, as all the animals laid there dead. True bloodbath, one that would satisfy its rebirth, as the golden locks acquired were now bloodied and coagulated into sharp needles ones that pierced with ease. Still, it wouldn't help, as a little animal wouldn't be able to stop the disaster, of a dirtied jewel. Held to a stop. Chains were launched from a structure that laid underground. More and more chains were thrown, against the ground, as when they attempted to hit the mill itself, they failed and deflected at the mere sound of metal bouncing off a hardened structure. The mill appeared to have not even a denture on it, nor a scratch. Either way, it was bombarded, strikes and small cannon balls fired, gusts of fire being spread, even smoke fruits from an unknown land. All tried and attempted, each weapon being propelled or launched against the tower, though none survived enough to break, or even damaged as it laid. The small boar, in the middle still stood and heard the sounds coming from outside, even chewing a malformed fruit that was thrown, as it exploded in its mouth. Still, other than a few fruits, it giggled in its boarish tongue, one that held no remorse, nothing of any sort at all. A few teeth lost, broken on the ground were nothing, but for the boar, they were much, as it immediately recognised what to do, taking all of them back in its mouth so it'd get to chew, preparing for another battle, as it rushed to the door. A spike boar charged but got thrown back as no matter the force and power it had, the door was remained just as hard as the rest of the structure. Though the spikes remained, none of the charging formations coming from outside, coming through the chain, on utmost balance so they'd not fall. It must've been a batallion on them, each mounted on their own metallic welded boots, not throwing another glance as they jumped. Spit and baffling fear ran rampart as they yelled. 'Revenge, revenge my brothers, make them pay.' Whoever they thought waiting for them on the other side lingered there. Their metal helmets and small mace and axes readied, as they assaulted the gates. With the help, of the now, dark-induced light, corrupted by the depths of the place, the windmill was no windmill anymore, it was a structure of war, appeared to be made of a grey metal, a dark tower with decapitating spinning blades. No one dare climb, not even on the side, as they thought of the mere contact would make the tower spin around and make them gone. The voice said it the best, commanding all of them based on what they saw. Menacingly, it appeared as if the tower made an earthquake under itself, making some men flee for their lives. 'By me own gollocks, what in the hell is with the tower?We can't penetrate it, regardless of what we do.It's too strong.'One of them said, the loudest minority on the crowd.Another one of the same statures, though not by his armour at least, came closer and push him over the edge, only to sharpen his sword against the scream's razor end.'Bloody coward!'He yelled, rallying the ones who were preparing to run the same as the previous one.'Now go back to the assault, I want ye all to plunder unless you want to be thrown in the underground with him.'They gave no second thought and felt the voice of command, the power he had through.A scar already claimed his only good eye, as the Maverick tried to desperately grab before the fall.Though he felt nothing, not the pain, nor the despair, he went on with what he had to do, make them push ahead and burst through the door.Rams started coming, flaming with glances of hearing, tiny smoke clouds rising from the deep.They came and surrounded, the seemingly burning tower, crossbows of fiery darts already started on the assault.Despite many failed attempt, one managed to land, though the same opened window that was once there, ready to be there.Wood for the fire, as well, ash and bone, the perfect combination for a fire remedy for the boar.Now desperate to escape, it started to assault too, from one side the rams pounced, from inside the boar.One final strike sealed all their fates.The cracks ran down from all sides starting from the gate.It boiled down to seconds at least as they watched and tried to reach back to the chains.Jumps in seconds came, yet they all failed to reach in time.Now all the chains were much further above than their level of reach.The platform along the mill shattered, the wings being shoved inside the stone, to stay there for the time being, as the rest was gone.Broken, parts, hay, stone, wood and what not, everything that once constituted the windmill fell with the people it held, the pig as well.

Agamemnon

The same platform ran over and over the rusty floor and the closed, sealed doors.No light source, only the one coming from the chest.A couple time would've been enough if it weren't for the laps done on a daily motion.At least a billion of the laps were done by Agamemnon on his restless watch.And it became, by now the usual.One vessel was kept on the platform and there was a clear view of who was there.It sickened Agamemnon, to be forced to walk near and glance at the user of the vessel in statis.Though he did it, regardless of how he felt, the programming prevented him from harming or doing something that would've jeopardised the whole program.After the lap, a flash came on his welded shield, the screen was lit.The machine that pushed the lower part, as the wheels struck at one another were already dry as they were. A small lamp was carried by Nestor, which he used to set them working again, still staring at the light. It was a small short-circuit, apparently at the vessel of the man. Agamemnon suddenly enlarged as his glossing covered with pumps neck lifted the head for him to see above if something was wrong with the circuits or not. Something was clearly wrong, as this was unexpected, in his system, he recalled. There is no one such as him programmed to be awakened, sort of speak. The arms attached held a piece of organic skin, propelled by a spear arch, pushing the meat further in the air, moving the little stubby finger as well as it could handle them. After so many years, the skin sagged, the metal got closed to rusting. It was long ago since Agamemnon had to do something substantial, other than patrolling and sending signals to the main computer, which already happened automatically. After a few seconds, it got stuck. 'Filthy skin meat!' A blur came towards his words as the core prevented him from insulting. A resentment for them laid in Agamemnon, despite the fact that it was programmed, controlled and made for their comfort. Oh, how the human raced was doomed, frozen solid in a defect system, the last remnants sent away, to end up in the care of someone unable to help or save them. They were doomed, the system was doomed to fail from the start. Either an error or just a miscalculation, that, if anyone was to be launched or taken away from any of the resting vessels, their bodies would die. That's the reason he tried reaching the controls above, to prevent the body from falling and decaying on the floor, where it would rot and step in Agamemnon's way. Agamemnon knew. 'Filthy skin meat!' He said again, only to be prevented from speaking once again, in a rush to it, he used the other arm, slightly better and started ripping the meat apart on the arm that was stuck. It took no more than a second to be fully skinned away, in which he contemplated, what. 'What would happen, little man?' Agamemnon twisted his strange body, designed to resemble the Earthly micro-animal, changed though so it would fit to served, having the function to twist in every direction with his long body and retract when needed to be carried in hand. Closer to the vessel, it could see clearly that there was no air coming from his nose. Having been constantly reminded, even through a small reflection, the chanting of the first humans who created him. 'Of Agamemnon, Agamemnon, enemy of god. You came out of a brilliant mistake, something I did not.' He resented that, why would he be programmed to be sentient. Aware too, that memories were programmed to bounce and haunt him over certain triggers and data that came with the small metal floating boxes, inside his head. In a fit of rage, that he was made to, he suddenly ran both his hands, the one that got unstuck and the unsettled one, breaking the vessel, which started releasing the air pressure inside. Having realised his mistake, there was no coming back. 'You're getting out.' And he retracted. Backed down and pretend to be unaware. He hasn't seen another human in a while, nor did he knew how he would react, especially after seeing something taller and more intimidating than the length of an average second rate human. His eyes stopped glittering in the dark. There was a corner, in front of the vessel until, even though the light lifters would last for an eternity due to their design and the presence of everlasting stars. There were still corners, programmed to be dark. It was deemed that, it wasn't possible for human being to last without feeling fear, anxiety, despair, the need to be hidden away, to not be looked at and to hide. So, corners were placed at certain places, where the light would not touch. Enough material was used in them that even a body with such a mass as Agamemnon would fit into such a dark place as that. Not without a figure in the dark, a shade that lasted there, though that was deemed not a problem, having that, after such a sleep, of estimated. Perhaps millennia, impossible to record after various sleep cycles, that he'd wake up with an eyesight immediately without a trace of the repercussions. The vessel started pulsating, vibrating and bouncing the metal to the sides. Despite the fact that it had heavily attached appendages and wires, it still appeared to act like a ticking bomb. More pressure from the sides, the rust and oblique coloured shell fell from side to side before collapsing to the ground. The whole structural integrity seemed to be collapsing over itself, after not being used for such a period of time, other than the life support. At which Agamemnon wondered, processed, as one of the boxes inside of the metal skull of his, moved in a parallel motion, activated by the observation and various attempts to logically predict what was going to happen next. Is he going to even get the chance to live? Or will his body be burnt and destroyed, along this damned ship? The box stopped, another taking its place momentarily. Censored, then it went at it again. The vessel finally released and broke the transparent shell into pieces on the floor. Soon to be dissolved, the man, in his suit, the original one he wore before being placed in his vessel, fell to the ground. A dirty suit, he wore, Agamemnon analysed the materials used, even by the age and standards, it was clear that it was no craftsmanship's doing. Not at all. 'Little man.' Agamemnon whispered, still in darkness, in front of an unconscious man. Was he alive, then? Or was he? No, the body went into convulsion, twitching and rolling to the sides, the man suddenly lifted himself up then fell back to the ground, releasing a shout that echoes into the enclosed area, despite having a portion of it distorted in the dark ones. Agamemnon nodded silently, as there was no metal around his promiscuous neck to make a clinging sound. The boxes were silent as they rolled inside. He watched as the man cried. It was long overdue, as the tears spilt in every crevice that was located, in every small crack that laid on the floor. Firmly, the hands were shoved in the face after waking himself in an alien place, unknown to him watching. Let us test his them, said Agamemnon from a box to another. Very well, shall we then send a signal in reverse? The other box replied as a brilliant idea came to mind. The best way to deal with confusion and sadness would be driving him through fear. Seeing how the man was waking up to his senses, though it wouldn't be enough. The signal was already on the way. And it would only affect the hall they were inside. In any second that would come, the whole light system would be forced in motion, as he knew well. Long ago, a memory was accessed, along with the research of fear and the creation of dark spots. There was more than that, as it was written in the file. Another function that had to take in account something. During the design of one of the functions in motion, it was deemed that some of the test subjects that experienced fear and other unworthy feelings, they've grown accustomed to the spots. Alone, seeing others walk without taking notice. Giving it an eeriness and a creeping sensation that only added to the discomfort of those who walked the halls. All, but one day during the initial tests, when one of the professors, Jessefinn Nuhburg came out with it. It was a brilliant mistake, as all of them were, that, during the initial calculations, there was a small malfunction that quickly undid all her data for exactly one day. Beyond her repairs, despite being the calmest of professors and scientist alike that ran the tests, and utmost all, to the surprise of her colleges, she burst in rage, the screen turning black. Quoting her directly in her passing: I felt ravished, as we were already forced into many extra hours of work, already having reached my human body's limits and managed only to scrape the bottom of it. Malicious, if I were to describe it in a word, as I stood there, staring at the screen for minutes to come, seeing my own dark reflection stare back. I walked outside the room, to the advice of my colleagues, and then, around the corner, I stopped and look, a glistening flare of an eye. It felt as if I was staring once again at myself, a reflection in the dark. Apparently, it wasn't just my station that went dark that day, also. Not only other stations but the small light coming from above flickering, the last piece of the puzzle. And obviously, the place from which my idea came. Oh, how marvellous, I thought of myself, as, for those who didn't know, my assignment was to find a way to come up with an idea on how to deal with those who've grown too accustomed to the dark. And on that note, Agamemnon smiled, seeing the man on the bottom on the floor, raise his eye level, though there was nothing he could see. Still adjusting, the signal arrived. The light comes from above faded away into the total darkness, leaving nothing but cones of light floating. It was then, so many years ago, that the shock, of halls full of people being blinded, forced to see nothing else but the people cowering in fear, trying to not be seen. It was Agamemnon now, revealed, knowing that the man couldn't see anything but the light cone. Agamemnon stood there in silence, appearing nothing but a small ugly puppet like object to them man, hanging on the sides. Quickly, he curled into a defensive curl and waited, pondering on what to do. Are you a foe? He tried speaking, but only gurgles came out of his mouth, followed by nothing else of any sort in any particular. There wasn't any other way he could know if it was a working minded machine, though it resembled something that could move. A pair of legs and a pair of hands were on the side, though even with the burst of light he couldn't see if it was attached to the object. He garbled again, trying to say something, anything that could work. It was at this point that Agamemnon, noticing the man, through his visor, that, perhaps. Perhaps his mind deflated, though his body did not. He wasted no more time and came closer, dragging the extras from behind. It was another signal already sent, that it almost drove the man into a heart attack, which Agamemnon said, in a mocking way. 'Agamemnon says, how may I be of service?' On Agamemnon's face, despite the previous shocking appearance, now laid a dull expressionless grin, without nothing popping out, watching the man back down. Oh, how I will torment you, as my painful existence will be shared. You will have to do for now until I figure out how to wake up the other sleeping ones. His boxes were malfunctioning for so long, that the censoring one avoided this one. It didn't work, perhaps it even accepted that there wasn't any other way there. Agamemnon said. 'Agamemnon says, may you kindly disable the function of the repeat?' Agamemnon says. Agamemnon says. Agamemnon says! 'Agamemnon repeated it over and over, driving the man into a corner, observing him act like a stray dog, inhuman, gargling, unable to hold all the excess of saliva popping out of his face. There was nothing he could grab to defend himself from the eerie feeling now given by the machine. It was the voice of an old man, then younger, then monotone, it fluctuated with each try, but only when it said what seemed to be its name. Everything else, other than the name kept the same tone, as it went on and on. If I mess enough with the small dull creature, I may break it unwillingly. Perhaps that would end up being the best test, to learn if he is conscious or not, other than the primal instinct he's been showing so far. It took more than a few minutes, at which Agamemnon stood and watched the man straighten himself up, on his two feet. More composure came to be, as he saw the small bulging head do nothing but stare at him. Closing his eyes, bending the muscles around his throat, he took a deep breath, as the air, everywhere around the location was fresh. He blinked then, and another. 'Friend?' He said, most coherently, out of the constant mumbling he said so far. It had a different kind of eeriness and annoyance carried towards Agamemnon since he ignored the implied mockery before. At least he can talk, so he can learn. Supported on the fragmented side of a vessel, his bones were slowly starting to solidify too, not before too long that he'd get his chance for muscle recovery, perhaps even more so if he was lucky. 'Indeed I am, friend. Let us shake on it then!' One of the arms that were dragged behind, the one that hadn't the tendon ripped apart came closer and extended for a shake. It was a sudden, as the gap between them lowered, surprising to the man as the speed and nimbleness had far exceeded any animal he'd ever seen before. But he accepted and reached, but before that, the hand twisted, showing and even more, the impossibility of nimbleness that he even expected seconds before and tripped the man down his feet. His jaw firmly planted on the ground, hard and firm, though it wasn't hard enough to cause a concussion. No, I need him alive, oh the first man. 'You might've forgotten!' Agamemnon said, with now, a more bitter metallic voice, far beyond any mockery that would've been seen. 'You wouldn't trust me if you knew me well human, not after how long it's been, and certainly not if you were in my position.' It was carried by a grin, Agamemnon grabbed the man by the collar and started dragging the man. The collar helped him breathe, so he made sure that he didn't wrap around too harshly to make him suffocate. 'No expense is too high above for my precious human friend.' They were both going to go towards the main hall where most of the vessels laid there waiting to be seen. Perhaps even hatched, but no. Agamemnon had to test it further, the boxes in his small head prevented him from overexciting and possibly harming any of the other dormant humans that laid in the eternal halls. It was possible after all, with the boxes rotating, the probability calculated, the chances were quite astonishingly that one in a close to an infinite amount of people who lived and were placed into stasis, that one of them would finally and suddenly be brought back. 'Let go of me!' The man's voice echoes in Agamemnon's head. It felt like he was taking care of a small baby, roughly for the size of the man, but close enough where it came to age. They stopped, and conveniently in front of the door. He released the grasp and left the man to crawl into a ball so he could grasp for air. The memory and realisation came to be. 'I know you. I think I know who. What you are.' It was a ray of shots that revealed that the man had the sentience needed to be considered something else. The code was already signalled to the lock and the door opened. Agamemnon replied. 'Good, though I do not remember you other than your vessel, you may be mistaken about me.' With a switch to face, then back at the hall, he welcomed the man, to see the end of mankind. Or the beginning. Agamemnon spread his hands at the twisted halls, like bookshelves holding stars, each encapsulating a small human just like him, waiting to be released by something that never came. A dud as they said, that failed from the start. Another shock given, as he started in the halls with so many heads bulked into small glass socks. Both empty and filled, they all bore sad faces, unnerved and silent, striking at the stars. 'What happened?' It was a monotone, and refreshing to hear. Atop all of it, submission. Yes, Agamemnon, thought, give on to your fate and accept it. 'That this is the future you're going to live in since none of them would survive getting through.' And Agamemnon raised himself to block the light, revealing all his might, his hands bore like a cross, repeating his name again in another voice before saying. 'This is what happened when mankind denied god, they all fell into an endless dream, never to be woke up from the endless dream.' Said the ice cold machine. The man rose up and stared at it, knowing that. Knowing that, it was called. Agamemnon. The name of the machine was easily recognisable, as it was the only working machine, that was disabled, chosen to take care of them. But one thing was uncertain. 'If we've failed, as you said. Agamemnon.' The constant repetition of the name made him remember ever so clear, the features that were polished and repaired, now decayed with the time. 'How come I am awake now? Fully to my own right?' And Agamemnon fell to his knees then, bouncing the light on his face. The feature was still uneven, too much so he wouldn't be able to recognise who the man was. 'You're an exception, and that's all that you'll ever be. You'd better do good for yourself and remember.' As Agamemnon continued his stroller, ever so delayed, in a plane that wasn't contempt with time. Nothing changed, other than the occasional shift in position. None of the pillars and spears filled with amber vessels ever got stuck and malfunctioned, as Agamemnon noted. And for a moment, without delay, as he took note of every shifting one, he forgot. It was a lowered hand that startled Agamemnon and almost made the machine burst out its small shell. 'Oh, you again!' Agamemnon said after taking back his composure. He looked at him, confused and pondered on what had to be done, there was still a problem of food and water, that needed to be had. 'Oh, I know, perhaps you want little old Agamemnon to serve you, is that right master?' 'I know when I'm being made out a fool of so knock it out, Agamemnon. I've got questions, nothing else.' Both of them were located between two giant rotative holders, slightly distracting by the sound, yet he refrained his attention and kept it light. He refused to show astonishment to the progress that was made whilst he was away since he knew the little devil so well. 'And what are thou desiring of me?' 'I need to know what happened. Why are they still asleep, after so much progress been done. I mean, when I was encapsulated, this place was a mess, the vessel no more than a prototype that malfunctioned. Don't you remember?' 'No, though.' He stopped, in his immediate core, the memory played inside the head, though no man was there, other than the glances. No, half of the memory was either blocked or erased, though anything other than Agamemnon remembered was: 'A small plaque was used, to commemorate you. You were dead, or at least supposed to be, in case you were taken out of the vessel.' 'Okay, we're going somewhere. What about those vessels? Aren't they like the one I used to have?' 'No.' Agamemnon turned away, then resumed his walk, yet again, not acknowledging him nor his behalf. This man, the vessel. They discarded the old model after the failure, it seems. Agamemnon's files said so, by the quote from the director of the project himself. Though it was quite the irony, as the small machine was rusting its wires, the only working vessel being the one that was so easily dismissed, to begin with. Now, he remained. The last hope of humanity. 'Slow down, please.' A quick analyzation ran down, as Agamemnon recognised that the muscles were bent the wrong way, the man having a variety of difficult to run. The long sleep and the old vessel had taken away his strength, as they both made way, at the same pace into another sector. A glass plaster stood between them and the endless waste space, draining in a black hole to his right. 'Wait for Agamemnon, you're not leaving me a choice. Stop running away from me and help. Shouldn't at least be concerned about that? Won't this be taken and devoured inside?' 'No, little man, it won't. It's been there since before you were born.' 'I have a name, by the way, the same way you've got yours.' Again he ignored him. It's been long since he's been near another, properly working human being, and with each glance, it became clearer that the man wasn't even near the level of such. 'Though I've no choice, follow me.' 'I'm.' Confused, the man gasped, unable to recall his name. 'You're stalling and the door won't stay open forever, so you may come in and be fed properly.' It was a drop of the jaw, as the facility, they were in had no cantina, nor anything that even resembled something human made by now, not in design nor how it seemed to work. Everything automatic made to fit and to boost productivity. No tables, nor chairs, just extra vessels everywhere they went, crammed together, some attached to the ceilings. An even more eerie feeling came, as he saw the lifeless faces staring, wide open eyes, but inactive in any other regard. 'Were they always like that? I mean, looking as if they died?' It wasn't the last time he'd get to see, though they started moving, slowly on their own, the vessels being dragged across the ceiling, slightly above his tilted head. 'No, though you should get used to the glass, cold and dead eyes as you'll get to see more as we go on.' Another door was opened, revealing a huge hole, empty, filled with nothingness towards the bottom. The whole purpose of the room was unknown to the man, the existence and why, clearly so much time and money was placed, remained a mystery. 'I didn't ask for a tour of the base, Agamemnon, I asked for answers to my questions. You've only answered one of mine.' 'Oh, but I've done more than that little man, do you remember now, your name?' 'I. Adal. How did you know I'd remember?' Suddenly, Adal's knees felt soft, as they stopped, near the chasm. Agamemnon searched to the file, processing something that would work. The voice fluctuated to resemble the voice as if heard from an old gramophone, to ease his mind, as frozen as it was. 'The chasm. Year of creation unknown, though it's been said that it was built, brick by brick, plate by plate, from the bottom to the end. Nothing much is written, other than the common knowledge and rumours. Though it is said, taken from the various declaration and people who spent time observing, that something laid in the depths, dormant. Unknown entry. It wasn't planned in the original design.' Another failure revealed itself to Adal, changed in design, so many people frozen, the sudden play of lights. 'This turned into a death trap over the years, hasn't it?' Agamemnon, tell me. 'If I were to jump off the edge and die, what would happen to the rest of them?' 'Is it not more important what would happen to me?' The question made the man freeze for a second, as the point extensions of the edge drilled around his fingers. It felt less painful that it'd seem, at least not to him, as his body hasn't accommodated to the nerves yet. Yet. He was confused. Baffled, unable to understand what Agamemnon meant by what he said. 'What would happen to you then?' 'Would you leap and try grabbing me before I fall into the chasm?' 'No.' It was made by the harsh tone, almost like a shout of a beast rather than a cold machine. Such emotion was placed into a single word, that it made him even more baffled. Confused, as it was, he came closer to Agamemnon, kneeling to the level of where his emotionless face laid. A grin followed. 'Then what would happen to you, Agamemnon?' He said, and for a second, Dal swore that little machine came with an ego of its own, that wasn't seen before. 'Well, Dal.' But before he could answer, a signal arrived. This hasn't happened before and it was time for them to survive, the signal said. 'We need to go now!' Said Agamemnon, a raspy, aggravated voice pointed towards the door that started opening from the distance and on its own. 'What's happening?' 'Embrace yourself, hold onto anything you can.' But his muscles were already sore, not as the one of a machine such as him. Agamemnon stopped and grabbed Dal by the waist with one of the hands, the other grabbing by one of the vessels, close to the walls. The door was too far and tribulation started occurring, the station shuffled by the force of the black hole, throwing iridium formations. Dal was flailed as the hand he was grabbed with had its tendon ripped, unable to generate the entire amount of strength needed for any other task. 'This may be the end of the journey. Hold on Dal, for as long as your muscles can.' 'I can't. The pressure is too high too.' His jaw dropped and almost decapitated his tongue with a crunch, as all the teeth fell down, one slightly cracked. No feeling of pain yet, he was aware of a small gust of blood being thrown in the air, managing to land just on the floor, near the side where Agamemnon stood, tilted by the force. It was a big one, they both noticed, on the other side of the glass. A giant shard of iridium was big enough to crush the entire humanity in just a forced entry. They stood there, unable to do anything else but wait and observe, if humanity would die or not, despite being merely awakened moments before. Dal closed his eyes, Agamemnon sighed. Approaching, and with a forced scrape, it managed to avoid entering the station just because of its intricate design, bouncing away towards a different destination in the endless vastness out there. Dal was dropped as the overwhelming force gravity upon them subsided. He couldn't help but inhale as much air as he could, grabbing his chest near the heart and one across the mouth. 'You can relax now Dal, it is over.' Seeing him take a breath, standing at the edge of yet another room in the abandoned empty complex, he continued. 'You needn't worry.' With a smile, an emotion that came on its own, that wasn't supposed to happen in the original design, though he showed it as he ended the conversation. 'This happens all the time.' Dal's jaw dropped even more, after being messed with by the small little head. Though he said nothing, it became obvious that Agamemnon became a twisted machine. Even the way it walked as it was being followed, left a malicious trail under him. The colours were changed, space now used for all the vessels that already crept the poor man. The path ahead was straight, but as they went further, it gave Dal the feeling as if they were descending into a dark void. 'What happened? This looks nothing like it used to be before I was sent to, you know.' Humans change. Machines change. Everything started decaying and rusting since it failed. 'What failed?' 'This?' He stopped dragging and pointed at them, even more vessels clustered, on one another laying atop of each other, with every wire and tube in the bottom and the back. 'They've been like that ever since they entered, never to come out, now they're just images of what humans used to be like.' 'Wait, so you haven't tried waking up any of them? Not even once?' 'No, I wasn't programmed, just as you weren't supposed to come either.' 'So you were.' A malfunction prevented me. Dal had a glimpse of them and thought of the reason. So, is this the reason, why? Before he'd get the chance for a full thought, a machine was welded to the wall and stood there staring at him. The sudden casualty it had scared Dal into backing away behind Agamemnon. 'What's that?' It had the resemblance of a human, no plastic, no metal. And certainly, no lower body to support the rest. It blinked, though, mouth shut and seemingly cut in another half. 'This is dinner!' Agamemnon said, after coming closer, approaching the bizarre machine. It now started intensely at Agamemnon and made no move. 'I won't eat that, I can't. It's disgusting and inhumane, just look at him!' Dal did his best to protest, even trying to grab Agamemnon by his other still working arm tendon, though he found himself easily overpowered, looking at Agamemnon stand right under it. With the proportions right, the small head made the man in the wall appear as a wriggling giant, though he got used to seeing it by now, being the least of his concerns. A small plate was pulled from the wall, one of many, made by the same material that laid all around. The wall shed its blood after and laid it there in front of Agamemnon, in front of the plate. Soon, that was followed by the machine that lived inside the wall, that barfed on the plate before pulling itself back. It didn't glance back, as everything that happened was automatic. And even though it was presented to him, Dal cringed at the sight of the forming bulging tumours that swelled and raised themselves with level after level, until they popped. 'I can't eat that!' A diminishing glance was given towards Agamemnon, despite having forgotten that, it was a machine after all. And as all machines did, if it came to it. Agamemnon started lifting the plate and told the man, gave him a warning about being forcefully fed. 'You need to gain your strength, last human of Earth. Eat it all, now, or you may suffer muscles spasms and possible abrogations.' 'But I'm well enough, you must be mistaken in your assortment of my situation. Surely, there must be something else here to eat.' 'Perhaps, but none that would help you in the long run. Understand this, as you're the last chance, if something was to be less, even the sickness of flesh and muscles, humanity may die.' 'If it is so, how come you've treated me as such?' The last human should be treated like a saint, fed and bathe like one, yet you've shown me none of that. Agamemnon sigh, leaving out a sharp and piercing metal sound that almost deafened Dal. He was about to scream but his mouth was suddenly bombarded with a wretched taste. After trying to puke, he stumbled on his frail legs, just to feel as if something alive or to be more precise, multiple organisms forced themselves along with the puke back inside of him. 'Out of breath Dal? How about another?' 'Wait, wait.' Despite his protests and his weak muscles, he felt some of his strength coming back to him. Is this really working? Though he hadn't time to question, another gulp being forced, by the stretched arms that had both the speed and the strength to overpower even the most amount of resistance Dal could use. After another round, he resigned. 'I'll eat it by myself, just stop doing that. And please, for the sake of our wasted gods, just tell me what's happening. I'm sick and tired of going room after room to be forced into these peculiar torture rooms.' Another grin came on Agamemnon's face. Oh, how it seems that its effect has already started taking form and he ate already, from the portion to sustain form. The man was clearly far away from the age, as even a mere child would've recognised something as trivial as the special concoction he was fed. As well as the side effects, showing right away on time. Though as he submissively follows, quickly forgetting what he was saying, something bugged Agamemnon, the system inside the head didn't recognise. Didn't understand, how could this be? A torture room? The thought of it, that even for a stranger, the station has degenerated far enough to resemble such a concept, brought yet another troublesome thing. It knew the station too well, and the previous condition after so many laps, yet the decay hasn't seemed to have evolved throughout the centuries. Could it be that my vision and assessment of the situation's malfunctioning as well? The thought of it brought more, too much decay could cause the station to be ripped apart. Too much damage could cause the reactor to fail, all the vessels as well while the gel and substances still laid in them. They'd die in seconds without knowing. 'Agamemnon, why have you stopped?' It was a sudden realisation that brought Agamemnon back to recognising that they were still in the same room as before. A giant chasm, a sleeping mule. 'Very well, follow me to the chambers, we shall make you rest in a normal bed, though not after we check your health status.' It was another command, given by a programmed response, as Agamemnon was still distracted, unable to focus, even with its emotionless gaze. They ventured, both of them, in the desolate place. Memories and so many events were witnessed by Agamemnon, a portion stored inside his core, the other into the main computer, alternating from one another. Though it was known that something wasn't right, another thing, in particular, Agamemnon didn't remember. The body was moving on an autopilot, knowing that Dal would follow him. Even more so, that he could be most easily ignored until they got there. Dal, Dal, Dal. Agamemnon thought. The name didn't sound familiar and it was nowhere in the database. A second dispatch was sent towards the computer in order to check throughout, only to be known that it'd take hours to pass through so many people. And even so, there wasn't a clear recollection of what was written on the plaque, nor his family name. No relatives, neither if what he said was true. Could it be that he saw me through the old relic of a vessel, watching over me over the centuries? A human memory wouldn't be able to withstand such an overdue, then how? How? There was much to the man, that Agamemnon had to know, him being the key. And then Agamemnon remembered. The automatic cycle stopped as he went on with his peculiar line. 'Agamemnon says, change of plans?' 'What happened?' 'We need to make our way to the main computer, no delay. I shall explain once we get there.' 'Fine.' It was a small detour, though the chances were that they'd get the chance to revive the entire station and the human race again. No more would Agamemnon endlessly walk around the damned empty halls, the programs, and the rust, the decay and the lack of trust would finally be over. The path towards the final destination would come, and in the small head of his, the thought of eternity, finally being dismissed would be enough. They've prevented Agamemnon from previously attempting to end its existence, which persisted throughout the same malfunction that brought that up in the first place. 'Now, open!' Agamemnon said out loud, there was the final door, as he stood with Dal, waiting but no answer, the signal denied. The main frame refused. 'Is this what was supposed to happen?' 'No, we need to find another way in.' In his confusion, Agamemnon froze, yet another denial of his plans. This never happened before, neither the man nor the refusal, and Agamemnon remembered every single time his entry was allowed. The mainframe had to be changed, Ai configured. 'Agamemnon?' Neither did Dal's voice change anything about the thought. Changes. Agamemnon turned and spoke to the man, in the usual multi-voiced manner it recently developed. 'Dal, I inquire a question if you may.' 'What about my questions? You're not the one who slept for lords know how. Not to mention.' 'Dal, answer me. In your time, has anything of what you've recently encountered been implemented?' The machine stared at the man for a second, leaving him the time, to the obvious response of no. Aware of its own maliciousness and corruption, the thought of it had to go. 'You said you've seen me before Dal, when, where, how, what?' Dal rested against the wall, seeing how it was about to sprout in a long conversation between the two of them. It was that and the exhaustion, as the meal hasn't come to its full effect. 'Well. It's been. Enough that your memory must've been detained. I was working as an assistant, hence why I was chosen, and I saw you there, being worked on, interacting with people, as one of the first fully functional intelligent Ai to surpass us. Or so we thought.' 'Coming from the last human functional.' Dal smiled with a nervousness shrill, as the machine emitted a gust of menace through the air. 'Anyway. You weren't working as intended, at least not after the human interaction. You've changed at the test, after having so many other people interact with you, you were almost unrecognisable. Not like you're now, though you started picking on our human behaviours, history, patterns. Even the thoughts we had could be easily recreated inside your observed memory.' 'Strange.' Agamemnon hasn't recalled any of it, having to remind the man once again. 'I've been walking for centuries or more, making sure none of the humans would be destroyed. What you're describing from your memory goes far beyond readable logs. The analysis though would make sense.' Agamemnon, the enemy of God, he recalled that too. Resembling a human, corrupted, rust, malfunctions. Did I cause the changed in the station, were they there before I worked on the mainframe? I guess not. What now, then? Even though you've changed, in appearance, I'm sure that you can help me. You've spoken after all about a way to free them, right? 'We need to force our way into the mainframe room since it refuses to do such.' 'And to do that?' 'We need to manually force our.. 'I've heard you the first time Agamemnon.' 'Very well, then get the vexed blowtorch if we're to enter it.' 'Where?' Without a glance and alarm, Agamemnon started moving again, forcing Dal to follow the cycle he's been set in. 'Agamemnon, is there nothing else to do? I mean, if this fails and no one else managed to wake up. I ain't completely sure I could make it like this and not go mad, or as mad as.' Quickly interrupted, he avoided getting his head smashed by a vessel that was pulled inside a cabin at a desperate speed. 'Machine can't go mad human. But needn't worry about anything, if it works, we could only do with one human.' 'I don't understand why would you need me.' 'A female human.' The sharp slither the machine had sent a chill down the man's spine. The silence wasn't an option, as Agamemnon would've noticed. Damn this crazed box. Another time he had to avoid, as his thoughts shuffled. 'What's happening?' Both of their attention was drawn towards every part of the ceiling and walls, as all the vessels started going into inhumane speed, even by machine's limits. It was the mainframe's doing and if it kept it that way. No, it was worse than that. 'We need to hurry before it thrusts the station into the black hole.' 'It can do that?' The wheels spun as Agamemnon guided the way, the hands were no longer dragged, but straightened, on the side, one supporting the other without the tendon. And even though they went through halls and lockers, saw Dal distraught and frightened by the thought, another one virus its mind. The system flushed away the lights, leaving the cones of light. Dal would have to kneel down, only miss the trusted vessel by the mere chance, a fool's luck, as it went through and blocked a part of the light come out of one of the cones. I won't get another chance. 'We need to hurry, I can't carry it alone. I need your help human, as you need mine as well.' He nodded in darkness and Agamemnon saw. Though it wasn't as easy as it seemed to be, the ones faded, the vessels stopped too, echoing at a sudden freeze that managed to come across the entire station at once. Close, only to touch Agamemnon, Dal asked. In a whisper, as he could barely breathe, at a steady, rising heart beat rate. 'Are we alone here?' Oh, another one from the human, perhaps it's more to him that what was thought. Perhaps not, Agamemnon thought out loud. Dal did not notice the small sound coming from the box, separated from the one coming from the dwarf of a machine. 'That information is classified Dal, so you won't be able to know.' 'What do you mean by that? IS there anything straight when it comes to you? Any information? At least a steady pace, remember that I'm walking on my knees now so I may not be able to keep up with you.' 'Stay down and don't make a noise. We needn't get unwanted attention, in case you forgot as your memory hasn't adjusted, the mainframe is malfunctioning. It doesn't know where we're at the moment, to our advantage that is. So keep following me and don't let go.' There were audible mumbles, though Dal didn't protest, he had no choice. No matter. I will figure out what's happening, though. Dal thought about the previous action and how bizarre the machine acted, not to mention that the appearance he saw in front of his eyes disgusted the man. A grotesque form that has become, concealed by darkness which made it barely bearable in the whole situation. 'Hold on.' The arms came back, and they blitzed through the hall, avoiding a crackling noise of broken machinery as they thrust further away. The piercing shards of dust, bearing their flagrancy came with a sickening blow that pierced Dal's skin and shoulder. Not even Agamemnon could deny how strong it was, as the small body got slightly scraped too, a feat indeed as the body was made to last. The room behind, even with the enchanted vision, the lack of light made it clear that something crashed from the upper level. The shards too, they weren't normal dust, the one specific in the alloy which covered the vessels for protection. The men there. 'Dead.' 'What happened?' 'Don't let go, until we reach the light Dal, we can afford to lose some humans, though not you. You can fix this.' A trial and error followed as they both passed, touched the walls to feel and avoided falling debris. It's a few more corridors, mainly used for transportation before the room, the door behind them close. A set of lights appeared and Agamemnon felt a zing in a box that stopped. No longer could he hear the signal anymore. Finally lit by a dark red glare, he released the man, still not used to falling on his knees to grasp for air. He sighed. 'We need to keep going, at this rate, there won't be any.' 'Stop. I've already told you. You won't answer my questions, you won't help and you keep forcing me to follow. Why? Is there even something I can do, a reason why you're acting so?' 'I don't require to speak to you more than I need in order to achieve my goal. I'm prevented by the system otherwise.' 'How could a machine be selfish? How could you emote this way without any consideration?' Dal bit his tongue. It can replicate some emotions, I'd say even more, could it be that? 'Water.' Agamemnon said in a hush. There wasn't a way back and it started filling the amber room they were in. Out of the wall, though, another machine came, resembling in appearance the one that fed him. 'Another one of these? I can't take any more than that disgusting thing, certainly, there must be another way for me too.' 'No.' 'At least let me..' 'No. Do not approach it.' Dal was stopped in his tracks, as he was ready to jump rather than be touched again by cold metal fingers that attempted to resemble a human's. He waited. Agamemnon waited too. As the elongated wormish creature stood there and stared back. It was a grin before it started extending with its body, coming towards the man. 'Run!' Agamemnon's wheels had an advantage, even with the water under them, though they weren't sure. Dal tried his best, to take corners, a wall. One that bounced on another, a slope then going up. The place had various doors leading to yet more twisted rooms of slopes and other doors, sidewalks that made the room inaccessible. Instinctively, Dal followed Agamemnon, knowing that he'd be the only thing he could trust in the situation. Even a glance reassured, the creature still pulled itself, stretching its limits as he saw. It wasn't metal that encompassed its body, it was skin, and embodiment of fluid and materials that allowed it to reach unearthly distances. They ran as the machine had no neck, even the face was outstretched so it's getting more space. A door was in front, the first straight path that was not twisted, Dal made an effort and outpassed. 'Open it.' Agamemnon said as the hands wouldn't have reached in time. As he entered, Dal came too, closing the door, though meaningless, other than a few snares and small bits that pierced the already damaged face after it managed to burst through. 'What is this place? This can't be built for a human.' 'No, it was not. Originally built for a detention program for the humans that would misbehave.' 'Blank rooms filled with rooms that had upward and downward slopes, a spike popped out of the wall.' 'This too?' Agamemnon noted. Though it was clear, as they were seemingly reaching a dead end, the other spike wasn't theirs. It came out of nowhere and impaled the head of the already outstretched machine. The elongated skin, muscle and texture have gone far enough that it was visible through the transparency, where the small circuits laid. It didn't help it get out, being clogged through and eye, straight to the long neck. A crackling noise kept coming as it strictly limited its movement, the hands that would've helped it escape were now gone too. Too stretched to make any movement any longer, it did its best, as it tried ripping itself from the point where it could lay hands upon itself. The way it shook its hands, made Dal cringe with emotion, the power and the conviction it must've had, even through a program and something that was merely implied, to get to such extent. Before it was getting too late, he resumed following Agamemnon, looking around for any lifting spike. A rip and awe, came to the sound as the machine, once resembling a human ripped its own jaw. It fell to half of its body, as a wriggling worm-like circuit filled, that would've ignited otherwise, if not for the system active. Small jets of water were being thrust from the ceiling, travelling across every spot. It wasn't enough to stop, but it did slow, adding, even more, water below. 'Agamemnon.' 'It will not hurt you, it is not energy that powers that machine.' Said Agamemnon, travelling as fast as it could too. There'd be more and more twists and turns before a stairway, another room, the going back up. It was clear that by now the mainframe felt. 'It knows we're after it, so push on before it's too late!' They stopped, after yet another hidden wall, that shortened itself then switched to the sides. If it weren't for the distractions and the constant check behind of him, Dal would've easily noticed how they passed so many of them. The sounds of the wriggles were too obnoxious to ignore, especially the echo it bore and it followed them. Bouncing by the wall, splashing against the water, the ripples came to be. Agamemnon still went, despite that, through the water, as it didn't seem to affect any part. 'How far away? It might catch on.' 'The very next corner.' Before Agamemnon finished saying it, the corner broke in half, revealing a passage riddled with wires, circuits and other components. It was clearly not intended for the common use, something that Agamemnon somehow accessed, despite having his signal ripped apart from the frame. 'Is it safe?' 'As safe as the water running next to them. You will have enough time to worry about it after we're there, human."What about that thing following us?"It will stop after it realises it's too late.It cannot fit, not to mention it's not fast enough.After all, the reason it was create was to deliver sustenance, and nothing more.'He said, as they both entered, unable to close it back.Suddenly, Agamemnon widened itself, making use of the long hands to walk, and keeping the lower part of the body hanging.'Damn it, Agamemnon, I can barely fit.'Dal had enough space to breathe and walk on the sides as for following Agamemnon, too close to comfort.The wires were sharp and slight hints of energy were visible, even through the covering parts they had.It front of him, the lights were flashing, the back rubbed against various circuits, and below laid the water.The rest was darkened and there was no way as they went further away into the shortcut.Perhaps it was his weak lungs that made a slight suffering come.'I'm having a hard time breathing through this place.You were.Right about, I should've consumed more, I can feel my lungs sag away under my bones."You'll have enough, just keep being close and."The beginning of the speech was interrupted, as Dal's focus went towards the splashes of water and the sound he heard.He knew well that at the opposite end of what they were approaching, the same place from which they came, the sounds of the cracking jaw being rubbed against hard plates echoes even more than before.Metal against stretched meat, machinery that could cause damage to machinery, it did not care.'It's following us Agamemnon, what must we do?"It's too slow for us human, it has no carcas nor shell, there's no way it could break through the wires and break everything inside.Keep pushing man, there's no other way for us.'After a couple more seconds, Dal came into darkness, being guided by the hand that reached Agamemnon's shoulder.Something resembling a shoulder, with meat and everything was there and a good choice at that too, the gate opened.They exited and came back tot he station, water dripping inside the hall.It was lit again, apparently, the frame has stopped.'Is it safe now?Can you close it too?I can hear the water drips and splashes, it's still following us, we can't risk being caught."Enough human, you're not the one in charge.'And in a flash, Agamemnon both silenced and smashed the door from which they came, sealing it forever with a strike that held enough power to crush metal, melt and weld it in a single swoop.It was an amazing display of both strength and prowess and Dal didn't even see much of the strike.He felt it happen.Agamemnon then turned around, opening yet another door, the signal working, almost as if he was opening the door for a temple.A slight distraction came as Dal also heard the restless cutoff machine slam its head against the wall, over and over again to no use.Agamemnon asked, then, as a lead to ignoring that trapped beast.'Are you coming?"The man came quickly, though not before he asked Agamemnon.'Won't it go the other way around, or even back inside the wall?"No, I've already sealed the other way, the mainframe has finally settled down and should work correctly.'At this note, the boxes shuffle.Agamemnon thought.Close, my master, we're getting close, I've got the catalyst of your return and you've got mine.You've got much to answer for my demise and name, Agamemnon, Enemy of God.Enemy of your own given title, the enemy of mine.

Hekkerik

The night awakened, stirring the land in its grasp. A dim lit torch broke loose and fell atop of the ground. Someone dropped it and was seen by everyone that was silently lurking in the forest. There were many that remained still, undistracted by the calling of the dawn as it was devouring the previous cycles atop the sky. They've seen enough to know nothing substantially would happen. They followed. One. A second glance revealed that there were actually two of them running as fast as possible and in their rush, they forgot the only thing they could see with. Not that it mattered to them. Sounds of broken trees were audible, along with the way. A boar was standing, feral and at least two feet in height, a bone-like finger made a swirl motion and penetrated between the space of its opened jaw and nose, grabbing it along the hunt. They were silent through the night, as it was no surprise that the fugitives were drawn away by the sounds of a feral boar, shouting atop its fungus filled lungs. Being hit against trees, bouncing against the ground inflicted pain. The beast was inhuman and so they said. 'Don't slow down. They'll catch us.' It was the voice of a woman, wearing a velvet dress, carrying twilight withing and a child with her husband. She fell and revealed, that from below another finger came and penetrated her ankle. A deafening shout came, fear instilled. The man ran away, leaving her to die, along with her child, as out of the ground, one of the beasts came. A wicked grin came to it, as the rest of the party reunited. The woman then stopped screaming and shouting, ready to accept her fate. Staring directly at it, the boar was released. Only by a fraction of insight has she managed to close her eyes, the boar ripped apart with only one hand which already was incapacitated. Down to the ribs, the guts flew away, blood sprouted anyway. It was dark and she could only feel the bone inserted in her leg, a pair of tusks came closer as if to speak. 'You bear a child-woman. Or so it seems.' Unless she ate one of the boars like the one we caught. A pair of laughter was audible, though the sounds were filled with the flagranciness of their stench. It was unbearable and they thrust it towards her way and she was unable to cover her nose. No sudden movements. 'Silence.' The one that had his finger shoved in her said. It was clear, the one closest to her was the one who spoke the loudest. He said. 'Woman, it seems. You've got another life inside of you, bearer of twilight, what must you trade for it?' It could've easily slain her there, as it was shown, clearly with the boar, even less of a time as it was infecting by the second. 'Please, spare my child.' Silenced by the demanding tone, as if spoken with insolence towards her. 'Enough of that woman, you know well that the season's about to end. We cannot rip your child-woman out of the belly without killing you. And it's not worth.' 'Drugh'Varr, there was another that escaped, one that accompanied her. What we're to do about?' 'We will deal with that after, he's not the one to bargain for now. As for you?' The woman had no choice, she had nothing with her, not even the husband of hers to help. The only thing that would've worked, if possible. 'A promise?' At, which the sound and the way she said it, made the bone like finger retract. The blood immediately coagulated at her sight, in the dark. They came closer, revealing the starved faced, their rugged smiles, the empty promises and the act of their which said. 'Well, woman?' They had war paint on them, though there wasn't any war being worn, which explained a lot on why they acted the way they did. She recognised, despite the dark, their hulking bodies, their disgusting race. If she could, she'd spit, though there was another life to be taken into account, not only hers. 'What will this promise be?' She had no other choice. As they dragged her along, carrying atop of their backs, straps of her hands, her feet and back. A life in servitude, hers and the child of hers. She knew too well, what would happen to her child, the ears wouldn't even sprout even again. The night diminished, she fainted. Dragged along, awakened. It was a rough night where she laid in fear, twisted on the empty ground, hidden in a hut, their village laid there. Before her eyelids lit, she quickly backed away, breathing as she saw. One of her pursuers, as she thought, sitting with its legs crossed, staring at her. Has it been watching me this whole time?' 'You don't need to fear me.' 'No, this couldn't be it, those tusks are much smaller, fornicated and. She would've remembered the piercing that came through, the reflection from which a ray of moonlight would've come. No move was made. It spoke softly again, extending one of the hands, having small bruises and callous on it. 'I have heard of what has happened and I'm ungrateful to hear. But you needn't fear, even though this might be inconvenient, I will not harm you nor your child.' 'You beast, how da' Quickly, from the sitting position he leapt and came face to face, without even taking a second to have his hands firmly aroused at her neck. It was stroking it, still, no intent to harm, even with such an impending way, he denied his inner will to retaliate. When he said. 'You're in no position to make demands, so don't forget that now, woman! But, don't think that I won't use other ways to make you learn.' The breath was visible on her face as his eyes widened. Double the size of her, and not only that, it could've snapped her neck in half, like any other of his kind would've done in his place. Even though that, he refused. The way was open but she knew too well, even by his hand that she wouldn't even get a chance to run. The rage that she once bore now retracted back in her system, on her knees as she waited there, not once glancing around. But slight seconds as he got out, revealing the sight of an entire village of tusks, all standing there with their other small slaves. She wasn't the only one, and even at the slightest sound of abuse, she shuddered. Was it fair? That she stood for hours alone, not making a move, thinking about her husband and how would she raise her child. Alone in here, in this camp. He's gone too never to return to me. Food would be brought along the day and as promised, not an additional touch would be laid against her. She saw the figure and even thought the pain was visible on her cheeks and bones, he didn't say a thing. A peculiar set of traditions and acts separated all of them. 'Why am I so tired little one? Unable to react anymore.' Her voice was softened by the cold stone she has stood against, the tent having no room for anything that would reduce the pain or even bring the slightest comfort. It must've been the entire day spent there, barely eating on her knees alone. The fruits seemed to be rotten but she would be punished if she were to puke it out of her system, that was obvious. He came back as the night approached, paying no mind to her and the small scrapes. There was no need, both of them falling asleep at different corners of the small tent, content with one another. The following days followed, almost close to a routine where she experienced the same, remorse, pain, and loneliness. Not a word has she said since she got there, only to be left at the mercy of her thought as she pondered what would he do. Unwilling to do so, she noticed how he looked at her, the tusks fiddling, the bent years and the eyes of an ancient pup. What could he be planning to do with me, having his disgusting way? I must not give in, for mine. It was too long, and a distracting period that made her forget what was said about her womb. The night of her capture and at the same time departure of her husband and her that she was mention. A girl in her womb, a little me, bargain to be sold and taken by them. The features she saw in him weren't as young, he'd be close to her in that sense. Tagged skin, wrinkles and long fingers, moving fast for his age, though that wouldn't be enough. Who would take care of my child after he'd be gone, what about I? After another night of silence, she decided to break her vow of silence and finally address. 'What will happen to my child after I'm dead?' Her eyes were as reddish as they were, it wouldn't be any longer until her child would be born and already had her powers left her for another. The man that laid in front of her, in sheep clothing after a hunt, he once said something about a promise, though that wouldn't be held onto after he was gone. 'I'm terribly sorry my dear, though there's nothing I could do. Not even I could control my people past the veil of death.' Finally, she started shedding tears as the thought came. 'Then why don't you end our life then? Mine and hers, she cannot be raised in such condition, I know she can't. Raise and bred into captivity in a fate worse than death.' 'Is that why you've been hiding the food, throwing it away to rot in the sun? Did you want to die along the daughter of yours? Come with me.' He invited her to join, revealing the sun that came through the opening in the tent. With her knees trembling, he had no choice but to help her walk, using his hand to push her back whilst holding her from collapsing the latter time. The small village was the first full sight of her captors, who stood there. Working, at lumber, acting like a community, a stand there with flowers that were just as wild as the fruits and vegetables he was selling. Another one with a polish purple skin that glittered into the sky, helped by a man the size of her carry supplies over. There were those whose war paint was no more, or fractions across their faces, broken ears that weren't pointing sharply towards the skies and nails that were forced open upon cracks and cracks. They should've been dead, and perhaps they were so, now that they were left to grow old, needed for a war, all they had was sitting and reminiscing. There must've been only three fairly young, the one that managed to get her, the new generation, the children they had, seemed different, frailer than them. It could've been a shock to her if it wasn't for the deprivation, the slight of senses, sleep and intentional ingesting of food she forced rot into herself. 'It doesn't change a thing.' She said, as he notes, looking at her dry, parched throat, that seemed ready to scream at the mere mention, before continuing. 'My husband left us here, abandoned both of us. We've had the chance, both of us to escape, if it weren't for his abandonment and the acceptance of my.' She paused, remembering herself. 'Our fate.'

Explorer of Grand Fiends

A shallow feeling that ran down an empty throat. It saw only what it made fit to do what nature has taught the creature. Devour and expand. That could be read on the note found on the ground. Two fingers moved on and examined it, warm, not in the kind that someone wrote it some long ago. A pale expression came down Oliver's face after finding his gaze, slightly above the note. He stood still and waited, talking to himself in his mind to pass the time. It saw me but did it see me move? It might pounce as my throat if I make the slightest tilt. The animal was still carrying a body in one of the mouths behind its back, plunged deeply inside of it. Oliver wasn't heavy headed, knowing that an average body in weight wouldn't slow it down enough to prevent preventing his escape. I can't outrun it either now, from the size of it, an adult. He remembered the notes he's read from his father, the documentaries that were held in his absence too. Everything that he had to know on how to recognise a specimen from the species and how to deal with it was down his notes, written down. Since it was called, he went through it on how to deal. The voice of the professor was clear in his mind. I only need to distract myself for some time, as I won't let down my nerves and drop my muscles. Self-control was taught early in his age, something that could be thanked for during the various training exercises he had while growing up. 'And now we will study the direst of the beast that you will encounter during your travels.' Said the professor. 'You may be able to notice, hopefully at least, small, difference between the species of the races. It might be hard to see from the various images presented from the projector but bear with me.' His thoughts were now so clear that both his professor and his thought could be aligned. Compared even. 'Scales on the right.' He saw none that was carried. 'Long and sharp claws and the end of the legs and hands, almost ape-like in nature.' None that can be traced, though close to it nonetheless. One that was immediately fed to his mind, almost entirely noted by him was one trait. 'A rare breed indeed, you might not even get to see one of these. It's almost as rare as the breed of the Sebaceen.' He recalled the professor being interrupted then by a fellow student, almost as doubting and curious as he was when he first heard him say that. 'But how can anything, even a breed be so rare?' He spoke, at least at the time with no care for him to be asked, or any raised hand for the matter. Why am I thinking this now? I can't get distracted. The sweat already ran down and started dripping, the animal even acted in a way towards that. Oliver felt like shuddering, leaving his body fall but he stopped it. He dares not lift his eyes from where they were at, nor move a muscle. The control over his every limb was still held to its every segment. An extra head that held a body, he noticed and kept that in mind. 'A dangerous breed, indeed, with an extra head.' He remembered it well, even his colleague's name, for if it weren't for him and his question, he'd probably be dead. Alexander of the pox. A strange name, sure, and even stranger that it wasn't a nickname but his own. He asked more, a fellow student that had the same interests. Oliver, perhaps had a different type of thinking, being more practical than questioning when he was younger. That is when Alexander came to the equation, he had a solid based, a tight knowing of the subject that Oliver hadn't. 'But, professor.' And that was the particular moment when he shined. 'How do we know it's not a mutation, rather than a separate breed?' At the time, it seemed like one question said by one that claimed to know it all, or one that would only ask to gain the favour of his teacher over than his peers. He hadn't known what he's done as Oliver would've ignored and perhaps forgotten about it in time. It made the professor go deeper in the breeds just because it was brought by him. 'Well, that's simple. It's been studied by a fellow biologist from one of the midsts I've grown into myself. Professor Grohhenhower, a genius in his domain. He found a dead body of the creature and brought in front of our campus council for them to see. Over the course of analysing the body, followed by dissection, documentation and various reports, it's been found to be one.' 'But, professor, how could they be sure, it was still, just one.' This is when he got more in depth with the research in mind. 'Well.' He stopped to check and saw that there was time. Ironical how Oliver was running out of it now, as the creature was approaching him, his muscles sore and unable to hold longer. The reminder of the history of the breed and the recanting of the voice of his old teacher somehow felt soothing at the time of danger and the time of need. 'I've got to apologise if I'm reluctant to go farther but I guess. One must do everything if he's to see his class succeed through everything. You may now stand down Alexander and listen well. Professor Grohhenhower. Ehm, Grohwer was younger and more of an introvert than your average person. Perhaps that's the reason that bound him, after finding and. I'll be honest with you since you seem so interested in the story.' Oliver recalled the spark he saw in his eyes, though not his, only a reflection of the various sparks risen in the eyes of his students. Everyone, including himself, was eager to hear the story. Reluctant at first but the professor reminded himself. There's no place where I would dare be reluctant for my students to know. Because, if he managed to get them to own even the slightest insight he had, his entire life wouldn't have been without a scope. But there was another problem, as the subject of his friend wasn't brought before. By no one else that knew them both. And no one else wanted to know. This is why it was really worse. 'You see, he. He did something dangerously stupid and insane. And you have to believe me that I'm saying this as a friend as his action didn't mean something else. A terrible, terrible deed indeed. His entire life was always different indeed but nowhere there I would've suspected his obsession with it. Seeking no fame nor applause, he wanted to be remembered for discovering something that was not. That's what pushed him to do it?' 'What did he do professor?' Alexander was even more enticed to know, as we were all. 'He didn't take the refusal well, that's why he decided to go and find a living specimen.' Whispers and groans could be heard across the room, more or less the same. All of them having bred and going around the same thing despite having not known about it. 'Ehm.' Oliver felt like shivering, as the voice of his old professor had such depth and strength that its effect could be felt even through the lenses of a memory long gone. It was so close now that he could feel both the breath of one of the heads, followed shortly by the other. The body had one too though the eyes he stared into, still unmoving were as lifelessly as his were about to be. That, if he failed to stay still. 'It drove him to the edge of losing everything, including his mind as a matter of fact. Perhaps it was a reason why he took the journey in the jungles of Kyr. If you may open your manuals at the eight hundred page or so, you will find a map of the general area.' 'But, it's not a medium where one would exactly find a living place.' This time, it wasn't Alexander but a common friend of theirs, Chana. And she wasn't too far from the truth, it wasn't a medium that would let them survive, especially such a breed that was once seen as a mutation. Perhaps that being another reason to think so, as it wasn't uncommon for mutations. Or derivations. Or such. To go as far as ignoring traits that would be deadly to themselves in another medium. The professor gave those thoughts some flame. 'Good observations Chana. Though this type of fiend might not be able to survive, another breed seemed to gain some new traits. Other than the obvious extra skull attached of course. Which is why.' He paused and took a note, it was a mess, especially since he had almost hundreds of them stashed under his desk, ready for use when he was ready. 'Be ready class because I'm preparing to quote directly from a copy of his writing. It might appear quite peculiar so I'll try my best translating it to my best of capabilities. Ehm.' Another lump in his throat came out that moment before going on. 'It appeared that, after months of travelling and surviving with the help of some locals and friends that I've been left on my own. The professor never told the children what really was written in the notebook of his was quite rare, almost unattainable if you hadn't the proper knowledge where to seek. Unless you've just happened to be an acquaintance of his. Nevertheless, what was read by him was different than what he said, they would only hear the specific parts of phrases. None of the feeling of desperation and hopelessness that the old professor felt. Neither of them that is. I've been abandoned. Though where that was written, to them it was replaced, appearing as if he said trifled with what he found. By those that I once called friends, by everyone at hand. The locals that were paid, left away, afraid of the beasts that roamed the jungle and the sleepless fiends that wanted to get me. Though I have not gone unprepared, a couple of journals I have written to document what I found. March of fifteen, the augur day. It was this date, after going through the depths, so shallow and tightly tied to ancient stones that it seemed to me that they were brought out of an unearthly place. They were often debates, the stones that are and their location but this isn't the reason I've decided to note of it. The marks there, I've managed to draw small images of what they looked like.'That, he could show them.The class was astonished when they saw the various representation, stones out of chalk, covered in various sinks of ink that was either splattered or precisely laid there.'I followed the trail.'One made by the creature's precise marks on the ground, they were a few signalling that perhaps they acted in the group.This is where he writes about it, a theory if you may.The breed might be getting closer to being intelligent, setting up a precedent.Most of the fiends haven't shown it."But, those blasted fiends are starting to act tribal.I've found what I identified as.Well, I'm to announce that I've not been completely abandoned by the locals who wanted to help me.But they were taken by the fiend that I dared to hunt for my discovery.They know that I'm here and I'm afraid that already I've sealed my fate.But."All is not lost if my research survives.'There was a string that he pulled.Ever so clear.It must've been sealing off a part of the book that he didn't think he'd get to?No, too old for that as it faded into dust after being pulled and revealed into the air.A bookmark but not resistant, one that wasn't placed by him.The professor jumped a few pages to reveal to them, a quick warning laid before he'd get to go past it.It was written and said by the other professor himself.'Heed my warning or be gone.Though the latter might not be as worse.You must head back and never return, for you shall face most certain death.I've risked my life so far and accepted my fate, knowing that's the lack of an escape.'He remarked the sudden change of colour of the faces of his students.This part of the writing, he didn't misread nor cover.IT was as he willed, they were getting the point after.'I found them, all dead.Necks snapped but not dead.I was forced to attempt but failed.It must be the second hand.'It was getting hard to read as the writing displayed was utterly missed, almost entirely on the page.'A substance was inserted into them to keep it alive, only but the upper part.They're staring.I know this that I will have to pay, forcing them to come and face this dangerous haze I was forced in.The way back has collapsed and there's no doubt who did it.'The beast, the fiend and motherly unnatural names that it was called, it started at it.As was the body with its breath, getting the substance that kept it alive right from the tap.'And then, they've raised themselves off the ground, with whatever strength they've had left.The neck bent backwards.'And this part was covered, after realising the mistake.A pale mortified look on his every student, looking at him and daring not to swallow.Perhaps it was his voice that cut through the air, taking all the moisture travelling around.Oliver's throat was aching as was his then.An unwanted and unmet dryness that plagued him as well as the others.'I think we should stop now students, you've got the point.Perhaps we should go on and find out what's so special about this.'There was a pause followed, almost immediately by a gust of silence.'Right.I will carry on now.For what it's been repurposed to and used even now, after the brilliant discovery.And again, I must quote.'He flailed his hand in front of them after seeing how scared they appeared as.'Don't worry, it's nothing too harsh for your young ears.'Not even Alexander nor she did dare say another word, nor any question came out of their mouths.'I will jump straight ahead to the point.'And a thundering thud.'I will now say what's written here, on the prevention if you encounter this creature.How you might be able to escape, if not.Well, it's as rare as you may think, to encounter and no more than three specimens were encountered.Out of which, two were by the same person.To which I must admit, what happened to him really troubles me to this day.Though, what he did was most honourable as it opened to us a gate to be able to use it as a guide and escape any possible entrapments with its kind.This is important and dares not forget, out of all breed, if you encounter this one, there is no way for you to escape.You can't run because it has the agility and strength of two and I take directly from here."I was able to go on and followed the marks, seeing it only by the shadows that were not fast enough to follow both the bodies. It occurred to me to attempt to follow so this is why you must excuse me if my writing is ever so shattered. 'With lines that were splattered. I was approaching what I believed to be the heart of the jungle, where it most likely made its nest. Not entirely like a trap, though I felt pulled it by them, following the set of branches that I think might've been purposely placed there for me to see the trail. Lead there, I had no other choice but see the past image of it coming around and following its nature. It felt like I was played with by the predator, one that seemed to have both the speed and quickness as it flung its body across vast gaps between trees above of me. This is unrelated to my research but I swore I saw its faces taunting me. Down to the movement and the fragmentation of their teeth and to the slandering tails that threw small branches at me over waves. If it turns to be right, if I managed to get more opening. To document. And. 'Another end of his entry. And it was already done, for Oliver failed to escape and died, his neck snapped. Now, only the past remained and the future of the others. All but the documentation that had to be finished. The professor sighed. He saw them placing their notes and how they were writing down, now finally after he let them start. Was it something I did that made them act this way? He asked himself and answered with the help of an inner voice. They will take some time in doing so, I can focus. And it would only be for their lessons. The professor justified himself with that as he opened his small book and read again but only for himself. The duty of having to intentionally misread still was up to him, something that it wouldn't easily go away. I think I might've overextended whilst coming on the territory of his. The more I ventured, many other people I've encountered if I dare even describe it. You must forgive if I refuse to draw it as it would only be adding more to the senseless gruesome web I'm seeing. This is where I set camp, in front of the teeth, close to the belly of the beast, if its biology would be correct. I must say to you now so you'd better understand. He paused after he saw a shaking hand being raised for him to notice. A strange occurrences for him to get so tied up and into the words of his old colleague in such a way. If it weren't for a reflection of the light that bounced off the nails, he more than likely wouldn't have noticed it. 'What is it?' 'Could I be excused?' 'Very well child. The respect was shown as both then bowed, but the child stopped and asked. His throat was silken, an important child with a future, he asked, still shaking after the effect the story got through. 'Will. Will there be homework?' 'No, you're to be free from this, so are all of you. 'An attempted smile of his face thought it turned to more of a corny grin that didn't do much to light their faces. Did they hear what I've told them and showed no reactions? Perhaps something happened and they've misheard even more than what I've said. 'I said you may go, child, now scurry off so we may continue. 'A nod of the head and he was on the way without looking back at his professor and the rest of the class. They've looked at him, though. The most he'd just arrive at in just a few pages. It was almost as if he remembered, vividly, the first time his fingers pressed against the dusty page and swipe it left and right. He continued, having the namesake of his friend in his hand. 'Let's go on the child, I need you to listen and understand, how far we're pushed, as a human in order to achieve progress. The next passage reads. How I've been thrown against wood. 'Solid and misunderstood. I was beginning to understand how that fiend felt like, despite being its prey, I kind of did. In a way, it felt the same as I did, cornered, alone. Angry, unknown to the world. I was being pulled towards it just as it was drawn to me. Perhaps I could've been more precautious, but this is good data I managed to dig from its behaviour. The marks, the strength it had. A moment ago, it left again and hid, leaving me enough time to recover. I will draw an image of the wooden sticks and various lumber projectiles it threw at me. 'Here you have children, the images. 'The professor shows the image for a second, they were slightly less distraught. He then continued reading: All of them broken into various shapes, as you may see, the tips of the various sticks that were thrown had three prominent shapes, sharp, round and hollow on the inside. The third one seemed to be lost along the way, perhaps taken from both of the types and left there. No more than scrapes were done so far, minimal injury, though I've no doubt that if it were to attack me. Or, they, could as well rip me apart as my guides. Luckily for me, I had enough of a break to rest against a rock formation and cover myself in the dirt to hide my smell. There I stood for a while, drank coffee out of a thermos I've had in my bag and rested. If it did come to it and died, before I managed to document myself and its behaviour, let me assure you that I've done my best. Even if my only weapon would've been a small coffee holder made of metal, without any of the liquid in note left. The night was approaching and there were no sounds, no wonder and nothing else, so. 'Is anyone there?' A whisper came to be. I need to hide if I'm to spend the night and protect my notes. With a slip, he slid all of them in a well-rounded pocket that would've easily held ten times his notes. It was most suited for protection, being covered in various layers of leather that would've slowed or entirely sloped any claw that came into contact. He passed slowly. Just a few feet away, there were leaves, tall enough that they'd provide him cover through the night, combined with his smell entirely taken, he'd even have a chance to survive. He leapt and came closer, though, two pairs of eyes were not far from him, glowing in the dark. The professor froze and stood there, not even inches taken away from the rock. It charged at him, and he knew then. Despite how frail he was, and the old age, his notes were all left there, barely buried, a moment ago under the dirt. He shouted and countered the charged, seeing the head flailing from behind and dripping all over its back. As they all charged, the fiend stopped as did he. The pain was quite visible as it emitted a high pitched sound. It melted and burnt small area and it was visible how it convulsed on the ground. Smoke came as it penetrated deeply. 'This is my chance.' I charged and went at it, with a desperate attempt, wielding my thermos, at which, at a sudden roll, I managed to strike a deadly blow and cracked the main skull in front of my eyes. And ever higher, pitch scream came, though he knew then, that it wasn't fully dead. As the body itself started going into an aggressive convulsion, even worse than the previous one, the professor managed to fall back and avoid the foam coming out of one mouth. Though it was obvious, a few signs of the muscles could be seen, the sudden movement of the limbs, nothing strong to push it, though. 'Interesting.' He said, knowing that it should've been dead. 'You're doing something, this is clear, despite the fact that you should've been dead by now.' No death blow as this was the perfect opportunity, enough that, he'd get to fully take advantage of the caffeine he had as all the sleep was now gone. With more notes and pen in his ink, he looked at the creature, moving and spewing a substance out of a mouth, burning through itself, still alive. It was described and rewritten, of course, in the final version of the journal as, a substance. No colour in particular, though, it appeared to have the same properties as acid, corroding skin, the area on which it was poured inside of was inflamed, red, no hair on it and burnt through. Strangely, there was no blood under the fiend, other than the small pool coming from the other broken skull. Clearly, this corrosive substance hasn't gone by. Though, the professor questioned, why has it not died.

Unresting

And so it was done, the deed finished and with itself a dark future breed with intention. Euclidean stood in front of the corpse of his now dead brother accompanied by a wicked grin, breaking the teeth of a wolf he killed earlier in the afternoon. He knew that now there was no return after what he has done, especially since he's done in the place he's chosen. I've no time to crucify you my dear brother so I will settle only with your head. With a swipe, finished by the pause of his thought, he removed the head of his brother and tossed it in a bag. Both took off, one with a body whilst the other with nothing but his clothes and sword. It was rusted and it took way too many attempts to fully decapitate it thought it was too late anyway for the townspeople to come. They burst the doors of the church to find a shocking discovery, the body dumped and burning at the stand where the priest would've stood. And in his back, the giant amalgamation of skin that was represented as a stone altar smiled. Another shock came as they realise they would have to accept it and eat the body. 'Damn that boy, he must've slain his brother.' 'Calm down Robbert, it's not that much of a loss anyway, now that it's pleased.' It was a woman that pointed at it, just as the flesh stopped burning, crisp and clean, just to be used by them to feed. 'But is it not too early for a sacrifice to be given? What if it will require more?' 'Then we will give him more. Starting with that boy.' They nodded, forming a crowd, taking blades, pitchforks and even teeth to throw. The balance had to be maintained at all cost, unless they would have to bring even more constant sacrifices, lowering their numbers. No, he will be taken too. 'But only after we deal with the corpse, so say our lord and laws. He's a mere boy and can't get far.' 'But father.' 'Enough, we will do as our lord commands, unless you desire to join him instead of the boy.' 'I'm sorry for misspeaking about that. We will do our lord's will if this pleases him.' 'Go then. All of you before you bring his wrath upon all of us.' It was the middle of the night and none were properly dressed, almost none. For a moment the priest stood tall in his ceremonial clothes, as clean and straight as if they were ironed just moments ago. With the runes embedded in his robe and pair of holy books strapped onto it, he signalled and pointed towards the sky. They watched for a moment, as a pair of sheep, controlled by their shoppers, mindlessly obeying his every word if it meant not offending the god. 'Is that?' Before one of the peasants could speak, he confirmed it with flickers. The priest wolfishly grinned as he said his name. 'I, priest of Dionotyrus our precious and flagrant god, Marcelli Damasus, first of my name. I beckon you with a curse, he ho dares make an uncalled sacrifice that wasn't asked for. You will never be able to hide in front of our eyes as long as we watch the sky.' A ripple in the sky, moving the clouds and everything in its place. They would know, therefore, at any given time, that under the ripple would lay the boy. Precisely there and unmistakable that after they were done, he'd be hunted, never being able to hide from their sight ever again. And so, the crowd was appeased. A day or two passed, their feast was done, as it was required of them, with or without their liking. 'It's a week to get there, you know?' 'I understand, here's the money for it.' Euclieed not only had a head start of them but he also had stolen enough money from the church's box to make sure he'd be at least half of the world away from the small village cult. He recalled, planned, long before, having a map long braided on his chest to see. As the town he and his brother lived in was located near the sea. Barely uninhabitable and not even on the map, he didn't need to know the precise location anyway, only but the general direction. Thought came, as he paid a carriage, joining two a pair made out of a gentleman and a woman. With the head of his brother long abandoned in a river that they passed and with the pair silent, slightly distrusting of their travel companion, he was sent into a depth of thought. Should I report what happened and of their doing? The blasphemy of their religion, that I was once forced into, I spit on that. And so he did, on the open side of the carriage, he spat outside, out of spite. Yet, he actually had enough respect to do that and not spit inside of it, making the man who drove the carriage kick him out, or even worse, be reported to travel crusaders. 'So, out on a joyful pass, 'ey?' The man asked the boy, looking straight at him, followed by a set of time stamped glares coming from his wife. She hid her curiosity as it wasn't alone, but accompanied by fear of him. The boy had their mark, wanting or not down the shoulder, an iron lead that was used to carve it, to the point of resembling either a scar or a crested rune. At least that's what she thought it looked like before it was covered up by the boy. He had a scarf, their family's, to thank for. It belongs to his brother. 'No ser. I'm only trying to get as far as possible.' Though the carriage was held to a stop. The young boy's expression become a lesser shade, to be only followed by confusion. 'What happened? Driver I demand an answer' The gentleman asked though he received no answer. All three of them wondered what happened that they'd be stopped, at which not even the driver would dare respond. They came to get me, finally, though I've no sword to defend myself. Perhaps I will use them as a diversion then make my escape, seeing how they wonder too. He looked at both, knowing that he'd been able to see through any act if it was displayed. Both were natural, even as they opened the door and stepped outside, answering the call. 'Get out now!' The muscles that held the throat stiffened as he found himself in the middle of the two, loaded crossbows pointed directly at his eyes. A band of thieves, each mounted on a pale horse, a spike collar and red bandanas that filled with the extras. There would be no mercy if they moved, that was sure, as one step was made and the man near Euclieed found himself impaled in the foot because of a misstep. 'Aieeee.' He yelled, signalling he'd yield if they'd thought he'd attack. His wife frozen and Euclieed could only stay and notice. There has to be a way. A blank expression quickly filled him, seeing the punch of money he left the driver, in hopes he'd get him as far as possible. Even as they stood there in front of those thugs, his mind raced towards the tribal people who'd get behind and eat him after catching him. 'Quite a nice catch, wouldn't you say Gzar?' Gzar, that must be the man with a scar on his eye. A glass eye that remained unnoticed until he pointed his gaze towards it. This Gzar didn't notice me yet and I'd rather not anger him by staring at his missing eye. It took a few moments to clear his mind and wait. Two two bandits, each on a higher lunged horsed still spoke about what would be done about them. There was no way to escape by running, as one of them was already pinned down, his wife cowering down to ease his pain and what remained standing tall was the boy. None thought him capable of anything, and in good reason. It was by mere luck that one as frail as him killed his brother, regardless of how much he blew it out of proportion. He could hear their mocking and the laugh. 'What about that boy, ey? Perhaps we should keep him for ransom.' 'Pah, look what he's dressed like as if anyone would pay anything for that. By the looks of him, he's no more than their slave.' 'Enough!' After waiting for the pain to finally set in, he broke them off, lifting his foot right through the arrow as if it was nothing, instantly breaking both the body and the feathers at the back end. 'Stand aside, I will deal with this.' Luckily, his attempt of intimidation, it didn't save him, but it was enough to prevent his death from doing so. It shocked both his wife and the boy, moving the attention of Gzar back to him. His horse approached. 'You're in no measure to give orders to anyone, though.' He lifted a hand to stop the others from firing. 'You've got my ears, sir.' 'Not a mere thief, this one. And that cut on the glass eye, it must've come out of a cutlass. Virgil took a quick look at his wife and the boy, despite not knowing who he was, he still had a strange attraction and need of taking care of him. At a point which brought him to a deal. 'Free them, I must plead with you. And in return, I will give you more riches that a band of thieves could ever dream off.' They looked at each other for a time, each rubbing their cheeks and chins in wonder. Whispers were given life. 'He has quite the suit, it must be worth something, look at it.' 'And the golden ring, it's crested.' 'Yes, wait, crested?' Even the saddest of the lot, three from the back noticed the crest, shining away. So closely that it even reached Gzar's ears. He looked at what caught his legion's attention. A hawk embedded on a spiralled pattern, melted on his ring, pure gold that reflected even the weakest rays of the sun. 'So, you're the lord of the Crescent land, huh?' As he said it, one of the thieves, out of all started shaking, his crossbow fell and unloaded itself in the ground. The body, as even the horse under shivered in fear after realising what he's done. There was the saying of the land. To strike the lord is to strike at god himself, the fairest and joust of them all. Others started approaching their fellowing thinking that they'd do a favour, putting him down to await the judgement. They stopped. Again, Gzar stopped them from coming back at the man. 'I'm well aware of who you are, as all of us known. This is why I decided to bring you to our leader, to await the judgement, o lord of the land.' His back turned but he didn't move, expecting a question from someone who already knew the answer. He asked. 'So are we your prisoners then, is that it?' It was most unfortunate that he wasn't able to see the grain of Gzar, though more opportunities for that awaited. They complied, his wife alongside, helping him move, and the boy. 'Should we bring the boy too?' 'Hmph?' For a second, he turned, both his real and the glass eye seemed to stare at him, unnervingly, bearing his even soul inside. The boy returned the gaze and the wonder with only a pair of blinks. Staring at the nose, he was able to look at both of the globes without giving any impression he knew about the glass eye. It gave Gzar a feeling of uneasiness as he felt something about the boy, a gleaming maliciousness that dived into the depths of the innocence of a child. Layer upon layer hidden, and the thought of it made him reconsider whenever or not he should release the child. 'Take him with us, he'll stand at the mercy of our leader, just as they are. And it will be quite entertaining to see both the lord and this skimp of a boy be trialled in from of boss. Isn't that right boys?' As the eyes stopped staring at one another, he went to rally his troops before they'd make their way. This boy hasn't taken a second off my eyes, he may be young though there's a seed inside she'd want to hear about. Inside the mind, it turned even him, one who wouldn't dare bat an eye again on things that'd concern maliciousness. Though the foul stench of that was flagrant around the child, making it even more surprising how the two of them who accompanied him haven't noticed it. Rounded up they went and not another word was said, not before pushing the carriage out of the road and taking the horse. A smart choice as it was the season for it. Small rabbit turncoat bugs, thought to have been evolved from the common woodcracker termites, they'd devour it in less than an hour if no one was there to scare them away. The wind was strong too, that it blew a portion of the dirt and replaced it with dust, removing even the last notice that someone was even there, let alone a band of pale horse riding thieves. Though, as they went, chained with rope along their hands and dragged along to see the leader of the band of thieves, unknown to the boy and the others, a ripple laid atop the sky. Still, it went and it will not disappear until the debt was paid. The sky shattered on their way as they marched through dirt, water and stone. A small ration of food and water was given after a day of the walk, as they were not as cruel as they seemed. With the camp set and the pale horses resting under tall leaves, they remained there for a night, under a tree that got paler through the night. Dark brown became paler, almost infected by the horses. Two which, Euclieed's surprise manifested in form of a question, though not before jumping back at the sight. It provoked the laughter of three other men that stood near him, almost to the point of spitting out their stew. 'Relax boy, nothing will happen to you. See?' The man removed his glove and touched the tree with no fear. 'Is this what you're afraid of boy?' Followed by even more laughter. 'Step away from.. Wait. But how could this be? How is it that you're not affected by that disease.' Over his shoulder, Gzar came and placed a hand. He pointed at the horses, which still hadn't explained a thing. Gzar moved swiftly and noticed that at night he felt no maliciousness coming out, almost as if it was a different boy, even more, innocent than the last one. Curious. 'You still don't understand?' 'No, I see the horses and the affected tree, but.' 'Look at the leaves.' And the immediate reaction helped him notice the obvious, the leaves remained unchanged despite being on their backs. 'Let me explain to ya' since you don't get it. 'With their backs turned, the other two prisoners struggled with their ears to hear. Both of them were interested as well in hearing about those animals, as never before have they seen, nor thought about being a different type of horse. Perhaps sick horses, but it would've been quite the stretch about anything else. 'These are gooza horses.' 'Gooza horses?' Euclieed said as he met his gaze, presently with one of the horses. 'They're quite peculiar, they've been a gift given to our leader.' Gzar came closer, made a sign to one of his men then went on revealing what happened behind the curtains. As both the child and the prisoner turned to see, they found themselves amazed, even more, after seeing that the horses had no hooves in the back anymore. They were dismissed on the side, revealing a pair of sharp carapaced needles that inserted themselves into the ground. 'They needn't drink nor eat, as they take all the nutrients required for any type of tree by connecting themselves to the roots below the ground.' Mouths were gasped, as one of the needles grew twice in size for a moment, after taking a considerable amount from the ground, before deflating. A raspy voice came from the back then. 'But what about the colour of the tree?' 'Don't mind that, it's mostly a reaction from the chemicals inserted by the horses to be able to take what it needs. Think of it like boiling our food before we eat it.' Virgil seemed pleased despite the situation, as it was another situation he never went through before. Though the problem for him and his wife remained. This Gzar is quite an unpredictable man, I shouldn't make the mistake of underestimating him, who know what other tricks does he have other than those pale horses. He nodded twice to his wife. We need to wait just a bit, to hear this judgement, I'm more than certain that I will be able to bide by the way out, as well as yours. Perhaps even the boy. That, even Virgil felt a warmer wind coming from the direction of him. A peculiar phenomenon that felt out of place, though it faded away as they stood staring at the fire. With smoke spears punching the sky, what they didn't see is that it was lead into the ripple, spreading even farther. The effect was seen by the party as they searched. Balidier, with his ear near and his eyes going through the ripple, he made a sign towards for the other three to see. 'There, right there. I'd wager one or two days left until we get there.' They were the fastest and most efficient from the village. Said by the priest himself that they were bred from the lord to save him in a time of need. Which begged the question, always and foremost, from what? 'We need to get him before it's too late, you saw how the damn priest reacted in private.' Silence. 'Balidier stopped his rude companion, showing him the sharpness of his twin blade, at which the slash cut through the wind and spliced his tongue in half. 'That would be enough, you will not dirty our lord nor the priest responsible for him. I'd wish I'd warned you about your tongue and to watch it, though it's too late now.' He turned after, ignoring both the scream of agony and the other two who stood there mercilessly to the agony that was displayed in front of their eyes. For better, the alternative remained that they'd either be burnt then eaten or just eaten alive if they failed the mission. Not to mention a number of wounds they'd get to have in case they insulted or came too far from order. 'We ride now.' His throat cleared with that, despite, wondering himself. What did the priest mean by that, though? What could our omnipotent god be afraid of, even more, of our priest? Euclieed, I swear, you will pay for what you've done, both to our lord and your brother. A solemn swear to himself before heading away. And the ripple was followed by them. Unknown, the boy only sneezed, as if some spoke his name, wasting some moisture in front of the hot fire, which brimmed it to pieces. 'It's going to be a long night, you'd better get some rest. I'm 'especially talking to the three of you, make no mistake, if you attempt to escape when we're sleeping, you won't get far.' I swear on my honour that we won't make any attempt. You've got the pledge of my land on your shoulders, so don't attempt to intimidate us. I will meet this leader of yours, make no mistake.' Gzar was fairly impressed by the look as this pompous looking lord, slightly covered in dirt stood his ground despite standing in the middle of a band of thieves in the desert. They laughed it out as it was said. 'You're not that bad lord, though that's not for me to decide.' 'Then who is, who has out judgement? Who, then will be the decider?'

One hundred and five

Hellish being with long finger-like appendages that go miles long, penetrating the eyeballs and rendering people still. It went deeper and deeper into the cornea until it reached and picked on the brain. Reports of murder were often found in the city of Bhaaza but none like the latter. The citizen became rather pompous, making them even more. 'Unaware.' Alive's clear voice echoes through the roughened streets. She's been paying attention to the rumour and even more than that, it was almost as if they became part of her and the heritage she had. Leading the group of people she was appointed with made her uneasy. Four other accompanied her hired thugs. Even as they walked, the company of their made her feel uneasy, as if they'd turn to stab her at any chance. They've not believed not witness it. Truthfully to herself, she hasn't either. A being with such elongations that it could easily stick them and suck on the bone marrow and the brains of its dear hosts seemed high unlikely. 'Stop.' Word by word was spoken by her and even that was hushed as she hasn't planned on making them remember it. The stinkers were called, undoubtedly to carry the body, just in time too. A hand was risen then quickly lowered and they jumped out of the meadows. The two didn't even have time to shout for help as they dropped the dearly deceased. Two of the thugs jumped and grabbed one, making sure they'd knock and grab him. 'No murders.' The body reached the ground already, as were the two carriers that held him, being placed after near the sidewalk. Some bottles were present, enough to make it appear as if they were drunk all along. A grumpy voice came as another did it. 'Smart thinking, they'd be waking up in the summer with that.' 'Shh, someone's coming.' A pair passed by, only seeable by their shade and the one left by the umbrella they carried. They went over the bridge, far enough over the sewers but farther from them. Alive stood clear and waited, she knew that as long as they stood still none would hear them. And it wasn't long now until the morning sun would come, the danger was amidst. Sounds of clicks could be heard. They spoke in whispers. 'My lady, what should we do?' Her pointing finger was just above one of her lips, he understood far enough. One of the pointed above of them, right as the couple just passed. Two others went and grabbed the clothes of the men that were carrying the body before getting into position. Despite being shrouded, it was still warm. 'Am I the only one hearing those noises?'He was a butcher of a man, quite distinct of all four of them and it took a while until she noticed what he was talking about.'That must be it.Carry the body where we have to meet, I'll follow the sounds by myself.'But.'I can handle, go before they wake up.'Understood ma'am.'They were advised to get into possession and leave, which they eventually did, though without the likes of her.She followed the sound.The sky was imploding above of her as the sound of fireworks started.A celebration, now?She thought, wetting her lips before she closed her eyes.The sound would be clearer if she just focus and it wasn't going to happen unless she tried it.It was the perfect opportunity, as the sounds of explosions would cover the lamentation of the dead.Click.Click.Click.It went on, she took a right and found herself on the main street of Mayple.From the distance, people were awakened , having their gazes straightened to look above.It was a fiend she knew and most certainly someone would see it.Then again, it wasn't a mindless one, that she was sure.Safer paths could be taken to avoid obvious stares, some shades, turns, darker corners of the town.She just hands to find it.Looking at every dark corner in sight wasn't hard but it had its tricks.Those elongated parts that stretched themselves onto every turn had their well-endowed tricks.Other functions too were attributed, and there wasn't time for her to debate whenever or not it was unholy or evolved.It could see through them, with smaller and softer portions popping out, there was the laying danger.First, she made sure she wasn't standing in a dark corner but not too far into the street, people could see her.And utmost secrecy had to be kept.Second, she had to be sure, if it came to her finding, it wouldn't have to know she saw it.Otherwise, it would ignore everything else and go for her instead.I must think straight and note slight changed.Humidity in the air, as the sweat from such pressure on its body, would easily accumulate with no doubt.Swift motions in the dark.She had the plan, easily in mind.First, I'd find one and wait for it to devour its victim.Then, I'd go and follow to its bloated body, it must be the way after feeding so often.She prowled.It always helped while going over a plan again.In the midst of the dark and the light of the fireworks, the features were almost lit.A thin body, broken nails that weren't hers, distinct features of her faces, cheeks that were slightly pushed forward.One fair maiden was she called, something that she's always carried with her in years, young looking.'Shh.'Again, she repeated the motion but this time for a smaller man, a boy that woke up and stood at a window.A top floor, which made her be especially careful after avoiding it.A thought wondered in her head while more people started moving around.He might be attacked and cannot ward him.From his point, he barely saw anything.A pair of glittering eyes, closely to the shadow up to a point where they almost blended into it.The window door was closed after a voice came and told him to go back to sleep.A sigh of released came to her face as she saw it.She enjoyed the distraction, but perhaps too much.'Where are you?'Impatience started rising and she soon realised the reason.It was close.Small pores on the skin allowed it to spread a thin liquid, almost to the sheet of a paper that planted itself into people.Accompanied by seed like formation they'd receive both the means and the water to raise themselves in seconds in their hosts.Harmless to a point, affection them only with feeling that would fade, a natural kit that was built and released at will.It's grown depended on its tools.She thought as she laid on her back to a wall, with one hand reaching for a knife that rose to the belt below.'G'day mam.'She quickly changed position, her pose accompanied by a change of face, stance and motion of the hands.Appearing as neutral as she could. 'G'day sir.'A man with a top hat and the usual black suit, accompanied by a coat to match, a selection often used by many in the town.Appearing in a casual manner, driving away by her own will, never to be seen twice in the small place.By now those thugs must've gotten there, she thought. Right to the spot. 'There, what now?' Quayle asked he was done dispatching of the robes and the medical suit they've taken, not before looting them of what they've had. 'And what about the merchandise?' A few needles. 'He was stopped despite the lips being in the right position, all four of them being in the sewers, stopped at the sight. It was there between the two of them. Damn that smoke break. Quayle's mind gone, in the first place on blaming others, a defence mechanism made by him. It wasn't enough to save him nor his friend. Nor the body. Echoes ran after through the sewers, and at a point, heading towards the outside. 'What's happening now?' The two started running, first thinking it'd be a bad laugh on both of them. Thew was wrong after hearing the ghastly sounds of the scream they've released. As they went there they didn't account for, momentarily forgetting where they stood at. They ran across the sewer water, being caught in an awkward moment after a bad decision was made. Marab, previously thought of making a bet, as the water was infected with small flesh-eating parasites, who would stand the longest. Harmless, even in pairs, this wasn't the problem that laid there as they gave themselves away and how they were approaching. It was done before it even began. The small parasites came into play for more than one reason. They shoved them away, with no pain, though they did what they were intended for. In their teeth, they carried the agent that was thrown into the water by the looming nightmare that momentarily made itself unseen after it was done. Along the way a sudden slow of emotion as they were affected differently. Strangely, either the slightly murky water or the biology of the small fat parasite came into fruition. It was a new type of poison yet to be discovered and it worked just as it was intended. As a poison. Sores on the part of their feet, followed by aching. Before they reached the scene of a murder they fell down, still drowning. Still conscious, though their bodies numbed. It took its time this time after being aware that no one else was approaching them. Seconds, that's all it took to be finished with them. A quick but slow lift of their head, not above the water but inside. It prepared one of them and he couldn't scream nor defend himself. He stood there and died while his friend was drowning. Above the sewers, the gate from which it came was fairly hidden from mundane sight and so was it. Daylight was approaching, putting a stop to the display of lights across the sky. Signalling everyone in the town that it was time for them to be awake. 'I've not time for this.' Alive said, the poison in her system was already diminished by her own doing. Once nobody was in sight nor any window open, a small incision over her arm and vein let the blood finally run out. It was marvellous how easily she got rid of it. The confusion that plagued her mind went away along with the blood that went away. So clear it was for her to see that it was already time to retreat, with no more than one sign of the beast kept loose. Along the way, she managed to cauterise at the end of a torch that was embedded on the metal rod across the road. It was painful and she left a whim. The windows were already radiating with a yellow light, spreading the light across the street. Too late as she already flipped the circle of metal and entered the sewerage system. A splash of water came but the way was clear. They must already be there. She thought whilst on a leap there, trying to outrun the signs that would've been left. It reminded her what the head of the operation told them. Outrun the light as much as you can, for if it reaches you. No longer will you be a shade in the dark, they would notice the figure that's surrounding the place, carrying a dead body or worse. Their memory is tight and they never forget what's done. It pained her to think that she was seen by a man, directly in front of her. 'Damn that man, and damn the head. We were not announced.' Her voice was cut short at the sight of her companions, laying dead in the water. Her expression turns paler as the smell of it. Rancid it was. Whatever happened inside their bodies left an odour, so strong that she had to rip a part of her cloth and shove it in her face. They were a superstitious bunch, thinking that the smell would get them diseased. Perhaps she wasn't too far off this time. There will be consequences for this. The thought of it made her shudder, before making the appropriate retreat. 'It's been an hour or so.' 'They will get here, we all know how dangerous it is.' In the middle of the room and between all the scheming, stood two of them, the captain and one of his subordinates. A tip reached the end of the table, followed by another one, so long and so forth. He saw how the captain was losing patience too, knowing not to push it. They were both turned in the cabin, staring at the door to wait. The captain's tongue, he called it, a place of storing and plotting. In front of him, with his back turned stood Herb, a middle classed citizen with an aching jaw that was rivalled only by his back and lack of foresight. His arms were stretched above, no sleep was had for neither of them. Even the mug felt lonely across the table, the fourth one to be empty. It's been far too long, delays were made. 'They should've been here for. F. For at least four hours ago. And they're not.' 'I am aware of that Herb.' 'No, you're not, if you were.' 'Herb.' The captain said his tone, with the tongue spanning across the slight cut over his mouth, close to being monotone. Both threatening and calmly as he already knew what they were thinking and was only acting the certain way to warn Herb not to say so. It felt to him disrespectful otherwise. But it came nonetheless from the thick headed man. 'They are dead.' 'Enough.' 'Damn this Herb, he is acting like a child. A small observation as he leapt across the room to stand on top of a chair, staring into the abyss. The room got colder. 'Shh.' His eyes went separate directions of his whilst trying to swallow on his dry throat. They waited, hearing something big walk, a few feet away, on the other side of the door. It was big. The steps could be felt, reaching deeply into the ground and splashing the water almost into small puddles across the concrete paths that ran along the stream. They waited even more. It passed. 'It's the third time this week, you know what it will happen if eventually, it will get its hand onto one of our!' She arrived in time, at least from her perspective. When the door opened, what greeted Alive wasn't warm but almost a position of war. Both held a harpoon and a lamp, either as threatening than the latter. 'Have I done something wrong?' Alive asked whilst the weapon was seated back. Herb passed her and sealed the gate back, but not before he took a look, both sides. Am I getting paranoid? He asked himself but that was diminished after seeing the marks on the ground, left by the creature. The look on Alive's face did nothing to betray what happened, but captain Hygrad knew well enough. As for Her and his return, he didn't ask. Instead, not a second passed without his gaze not being lifted way from the old captain's wrinkle skin and eyes. Judgemental, as usual, the one that would glitter and tell you. You'd better heed what I said and realise, it's getting dangerous. Reminding them of a, now, long gone, the previous conversation that underwent between them about the state of affairs of their organisation. Alive wanted to greet his friend. No, he can wait, the report has to come first, he has to know, we are losing more and more people as it is. Four, no, five mugs of coffee, strange, even more, were left the room, they weren't present when she left. And never has the captain invited people of casual conversations over coffee and such formalities. 'How long have I been gone?' She had no clock neither a way of knowing so it's no wonder it came as a surprise to her to hear. 'A few hours, maybe more than that.' The words span and barely hit her in an unexpected way as it was important. 'But, I've been gone for a few minutes there and.' She stood and recalled the previous event, going over it. The side effect of the thing that entered her skin and polluted her affected her perception of time, getting rid of one of the senses she had. That was important to be written in the report, along the hazardous body. Her lips were not dribbling after she wet them and continued. 'You've probably suspected by now, they're dead.' 'When, how?' 'They died carrying the body on our safest route. 'Is he testing me or has he not heard that I've had no idea how much it passed? Perhaps it was time for a quick reminder of the retaliation that had to be.' 'Am I to be tested if I'm telling the truth?' 'No, why would.' 'Then why are you implying I'm lying to you about the circumstance I was in?' It was a small escape from the captain, one that he wouldn't want to admit, especially to the glaring judgemental eyes that were now staring at him even more deeply. Almost as if he has now become the abyss that Herb previously stared in. 'I did no such thing, though I feel compelled to admit that. There's a better chance of success in our operation if we were on the tip of our toes at all time.' 'Does that result in personal attack too, I presume?' There was a genuinely distressed look on her face, she wasn't going to take it being called out, especially since with what she's been through. Duty came first for Alive and after that was done. The mourning came after, in a way, she thought that if she was more vigilant on her watch, it wouldn't have happened. And not for them either as the seed of doubt would more than likely sap even the future people who were to be called in her command again. Weakness, I can't show it anymore, not unless I want to be replaced or dismissed. Her mind was semi-clear to a point where the tip between focusing at her captain and trying to forget what happened drew closer. After all, it was easier to forget than to break your own knees along the way. 'You know I've meant no disrespect, I cherish our friendship. Even more than our partnership. And that goes for you as well Herb and you can both admit.' He stepped sideways and away from the chair that was stricken to the ground, firmly to cover the entry to another level. There were signs of both truth and trust in what he said. Yet, he wouldn't reveal what he knew, his secrets for the exact opposite reason. Herb and Alive approached neck in the neck too, close to being uncomfortably in the manner. She sniffed the air, feeling the aroma of pepper. One that was thinly sprayed across the air before she arrived. Alive raised her hand but Herb already gave her a napkin to stop her in mid motion. A friendly gesture, though one that might not have come without a price. From the dossier of his, he revealed the large set of maps. The captain has been used to making them, some still had the scent of the old ink bottle used into making them. 'Is this the town?' Alive asked, her attention now staring at the different points on the map. Those must be the different roads along the map. She thought as she noted that straight lines were dragged, with the and bout precise and technicality of an artist. No squiggly line and neither was the ink spread across it, professionally made, which made even Herb wonder. Is this truly made by him? Surely we could not afford to have an artist on the board, one would need to lower his stance to join the likes of such an organisation. Only one seemed to pop out along all of them. He presented it as it appeared to them. 'Both of you can see it clearly. The sides and such, I've marked it with the lines?' 'What is it then, the roads?' Herb cut Alive short and said what she was about to, whilst making her stop. Perhaps I should've let them think that way, both of them already seem confident about it. The door opened before he'd get the chance. A beard that almost overshadowed the man came that came in was the most distinguishable feature he saw. 'Sir.' It held a tone that would've normally invited pleasantries, to which the captain only nodded. The door was close. Another one that's late, the captain thought. He noticed that more and more scouts were delayed, perhaps. Even affected by something. 'Regardless. You noticed the lines.' And they stared at them, analysing them constantly to see. She's already been there twice and had the opportunity to see and question it. 'The map of the town is wrong.' His expression didn't remain unchanged, a frown that encompassed his face whilst speaking to her. 'Those aren't the roads.' He said, pointing at the source of them. It was almost like a maze, bent across the whole architecture of the town. In a way, it reminded Herb of the early gothic style he has encountered in many different places in his travel. Then again, he hadn't been out to point it out. Alive, on the other hand, saw where he was barking. It all lead to the 'Entry.' "Then the sewers?" It came there, as a thought, but quickly dismissed by Herb. 'No, that can't be either. I've not been outside but I've had my spare time to go and check every surrounding.' Both of you are not entirely wrong, it's neither of that. Those lines or tracks you're seeing are my documents. I've documented almost each of the nights where it moved its fingers, located at every victim's house too. 'This must be the reason he brought us both here in such a time, not to mention why he made me wait. To confirm his suspicion. There must've been at least twenty paths it took, all different, under the other drawn maps there.' And why is it that you're showing us? Alive became curious why it was important. She felt as if there had to be a reason behind both of them being called and for that nightmare to follow such exact paths. Of course, he revealed more, different ones yet exact, they would stop as sides, pop at others, forming distant mazes. 'It overlaps somehow, this must be the reason why it hunts so much in this place.' "What does?" Herb felt the tension in the room, sweeping a hand across his forehead to take his sweat. Again, he felt as if he was surrounded by sand despite how cold the room really was like. The captain scratched his chin. 'The sewers, the roads built and the mazes formed above everything else, sometimes overlapping. Tell me Alive, where did those four men we hired died at?' She baffled before giving light to his precise perception. 'Inside the sewers.' The captain marked his top map with another sign but stopped. In his eagerness, he appeared almost like a child, regardless of how dire the situation or how serious it was, he wanted to be right. Quickly on his wit, knowing that he marked the spot without knowing, he used a piece of cloth to erase it whilst fresh. A motion and it was gone, covering the emblem the cloth had. A hawk, now to be known as a drowning hawk, a mistake he thought, to use that instead of another rag that laid on the floor. Alive didn't say a thing and just watch him dabble. 'Where did they die?' "There." She pointed with her finger, at a longer distance than the one he obviously thought. 'Fifteen in total and counting. Any other deaths?' He asked and she noted the slight variation of tone, the unrecognisable change of mind. It wasn't like him to ask information directly but to wait and read the reports alone, that way he would be sure everyone was in check. And with everyone in check, if he wanted to question any specific member, he'd know what information was fed and by whom. 'All right. We got the body from here but I don't know where the crime was committed.' "Have you had a chance to search him before?" "No, but." "Then go back and bring it to me." The captain now shouting, revealing a part of him that wasn't shown before, embedded with a slight of anger and a tinge of madness on the side. Alive found herself in an awkward situation, Herb said nothing. It was either her or the bodies, the thought of an ultimatum came to mind. 'Fine.' She complied but not without terms. 'I need a pair of gloves then and a mask of holding breath.' And a pair was given. 'There, make haste now.' "Understood." She bit her lip, feeling the glare behind his saying. The whole room seemed to be panned in front of her eyes. I swear I could see their emotions, both of theirs. It left a feeling in her mouth, dry. She left immediately, without saying anything to them after. Fleeing from their sight and even the sentence the captain was about to say. Almost like a rush, he thought, after grabbing it. She ran after, through the mud and creeping water spores that were raising ahead. 'Is she going to be alright?' Herb asked, right as he felt the vibration left by the closing door reach him. The captain touched his lips again, still looking at his set of maps, altogether, preparing to place them back. 'I hope.' He was shocked, even to him, after the sudden burst of emotion and when the quiet was settled, the captain seemed genuinely distressed? Even as he messed up with the maps, inside his head, he thought. He wondered. Is she

in. But there wasn't time for him to finish that thought. Just as much as if wasn't for Alive, barely having the mask put on. Finding herself in the place where the body should've been. Only to find herself frozen in place. 'Are you feeling fine captain?' He dropped a cup whilst trying to take it away, shattering it into a thousand pieces, all now spread across the floor. 'A bad omen.' The thought came to be, being as superstitious as him. Perhaps it was the wind that pushed her, the cold gust that made her get there so fast, in front of what she was looking for. IT slowly approached and she already couldn't move. But leave some tears run across her compressed face. She saw it come through as easily as one could, penetrating through the visor covering her face, breaking it as if it was nothing. The two partners on the other side stood there in silence, being left into a state of both angst and nostalgia whilst looking at the shards left on the floor. It was another point of the man, slightly farther than where the five bodies were. No scream, therefore no echoes to be heard. The eyes were closed but it did not go through. It raised the eyelid before going, so slow that it was over, the same way it was for the rest of them. Thoughts ran through her head, along recollections of her life. She felt no pain while it was happening, seeing only but a tunnel that ended up with the memories of her life. The limbs couldn't be felt, anything else either. It felt, to her as if she was dreaming, being taken and carried away, the destination uncalled for. It was over in an instant after she approached and reached the destination. After going through all, and at the same time none of them. Too rushed to be enjoyed yet too slow at a time for her to be tricked into believing she was seeing them for the first time. She heard after finally plunging into the abyss. A voice called to her. 'Wake up. Wake up!' It said it twice but felt no resignation towards it. Being caught into what happened and in a place where memories collided with one another. The air was fresh, that she felt, it was as real as her, though the body of her felt light and slim. Is the abyss talking to me? She asked, or at least she tried but the lips seemed to have a will of their own, unable to move them at all. There came a decision after the third time the voice spoke. 'Wake up!' Perhaps it was something that came along the confusion but the first thought that came into Alive's mind. The one that brought the uncertainty, was that the voice sounded like the captain's. She recalled that second ago she left. I know I can trust him, Alive thought. A tube came from above and was shoved straight into her mouth. Her eyes widened. In front of her, she saw the reason for being so light and started struggling for her escape. Hand flailed, stomach churned to match the movement she forced upon herself and the confinement around her. She saw the water around and a figure being formed, around the other side of where she was. The glass, she felt and kept repeating in her mind. It felt to her almost as if her brain seek a path to follow after not being used, other than thoughts that she recalled hearing before. Shatter. Shatter. Shatter. The words that someone said on the outside, that she remembered well. Thought something missed. 'We've got a living one here, come one a second.' The captain. He reached and held his hand, the flail stopped. One hand stopped doing it while the other refused to take off from the glass. Before passing out again, hearing them whisper. It wasn't much and they figured that she wouldn't have woken up, being a mistake removing her. The voice said. 'I know she can.' For the merest of luck, the fresh air came into her nostrils and her eyes slowly open. Her body was fresh, the doctor thought. The dearly departed's body was fresh enough to sustain it. 'Cap..'. Alive looked and couldn't recognise herself in the place she was. She saw what she wanted and the truth that could be called. A hand reached after and covered her mouth. 'Breathe easily now, you're in good hands.' She glared on the other side, saw a table filled with utensils, working at them laid Herb. Another face she previously recalled seeing not long. Should, I ask? The brain was still adjusting, that's the reason she didn't recall that she said it out loud. Or at least tried as the sentence came out rather like a stutter, that only came to be understood by the many talents of the doctor. Another trait he possessed, lip-reading. 'I'm James if that's what you're asking.' His voice still sounded like the captains, that's the reason a smile came across her face. Grief too as the brain caught up to her, now ignoring the two working men, that, she thought she was dead. She thought that she'd lose the one that she loved. 'Wait, what is she.. "Shh." The cap, James. Silenced Herb, it had to be them. It wasn't supposed to happen, to regain sentience and control over the body. Alive's hand was raised, after being frightened of not being able to see him anymore. She tried reaching his cheek but failed at the last second before her strength dissipating. James understood the act and told his subordinate to stop, he grabbed her hand. So warm, she thought, as a trail of tears ran across her face, not one for grief of fear but out of kindness and contempt. Her arms fell back and Alive passed again, to be found at the mercy of the two doctors. 'Is she?' 'No.' James checked her pulse, finally coming to a conclusion. 'She still lives.' His companion approached, coming with his distillery of ornaments, all sharp and made of metal, bred from a branch for a sole purpose that came to their use. To perforate skin. 'How did she know your name then?' James answered him assistant with a shrug. It wasn't too odd, a mere coincidence and no less than that. After seeing more than hundreds of them per day, active and inactive. Or even the ones that momentarily came to life before having their awareness passed on. Surely after seeing so many and in different stages, from all the stutters, it was highly probably that one would get his name. Not to mention how common it was. 'Very well, we've dallied enough now, we should proceed if we're not to be late with it.' They both placed their masks and sealed the gases inside. She was already done with, at least in most of the part. The body responded well to the new brain, unexpected at first but well enough, James thought. He slightly hesitates. Too much of his thought was spent on her already. She said my name. James told to himself. 'Are you all right doctor?' The formality never left the office, knowing him only by his rank and nothing more. He stopped, responded with a coldness, the same way that it was given to him. 'She said my name.' James took a break and shook it off, before returning to work on her. He ignored the look his assistant gave him. The rot isn't concerned with me, he cares about nothing but his damn position, as would I if I were so lowly in his place. No action couldn't fit better than what he did next. He used his bicep to push and make a clean cut just as he needed. 'Give me the device.' It was obvious to him that his harsh and steel like nature return. Through the air that blurred the glass that encompassed his mask, he noted the seriousness behind it. It was a heavy breath he took before he said it, carrying with it, a lump of most decent gas formation in his lungs whilst taken it back. A glass that helped both of them concentrate. He sighs and took a deep breath just like James before placing it in his hand. Both got ready for the insertion as it had to be done on a living, functioning body. A sphere that was cut on the side, going in depth, small but heavy, multipurpose, though he needed his assistant's help to fit it, though. Under the ribs and barely above the stomach. Close for protection but not too much so it would still be unfelt. 'Fill it.' To which he nodded. The dark but white room felt cosy, enough to send a chill. He never got used and never understood how James did it. Especially since they had to repeat the same procedure time and time after. It was a matching device, big in size, resembling a popped old zeppelin, thought a touch more organing in nature. It was held as a fetus was, the different in size yet strong iron rods held it above, though that didn't stop it from sagging. Carefully he grabbed the tip, not to insert it in his hand and draw it close. Just as he took it, he held with both hands and entered her with the object. 'Under the ribs and wait.' They both held it, this was the longest part of the procedure after all. Waiting so the sphere would stay there for as long as her body did. It gave them the waiting, the time of carefulness and a time for thought. Complications could come, as it was normal in any other surgery, though this was different from the others. James found himself, often abandoned and alone. Lost in his solidarity as his so called assistant wasn't. He knew that he had the opposite of what he had, a family, something to go back to. Sure, someone stutters happened before, but none had the sincerity this plunged into him. And the touch that he still remembered. He found himself again, looking, staring at her features. So peaceful. Such silence. James wanted to say it out loud but he couldn't, not in front of him. 'It's almost ready now.' Time flew, the more he noted of each feature, dissecting it but not as he did to others. No, for others, he did it purely to get it technically pointed, dents, proportions, flaws. How is it that I've stared so much at you when you were in a tube and felt nothing? James asked himself, holding on the pulsating bag, almost ready to pull. But now. Did she have a soul that travelled? Doctor. "Immediately." They pulled it out and dismissed the object. It was quite an old technique but it was kept nonetheless. Suturing the wound with the quality and fitness of one trained in a lifetime just for that, he covered right as the opening absorbed the remnants of air. The substance used was almost alive, feeding on air, wasn't even as bad as how it truly looked like. 'Another operation was successful.' Already ahead and completing the note, another subject written as another success. James looked one last time at her. She was to be placed in a small cell, barely as flexible as the body and mixed up with the hundreds of them. Either sold into slavery or worse. It wasn't any of his jobs to wonder nor to judge what was done with all of the bodies. They've lived their life, after all, made their choice to be kept alive, now they were repurposed for their choice. He lifted her on the small side, to be held against a wall she once rested upon. The pulse first. 'Checked.' James took his time, moving at an awkward angle with his hand reaching her cheeks. An obsession was noted, something he'd get to use against James, so he did hold the grudge against. A rivalry that he thought unsuspected. 'What would they say if they found out that you're having nicks for people of the old?' 'Excuse me?' 'Yes James, your precious world shattered, perhaps even demoted, plunged into a deeper oblivion than what they're in.' 'What's that in your hand?' 'No.' 'Or even better. Succeeding you to my rightful place.' He had the conversation in his mind, whilst writing down the notes. It came to his mind accidentally after having a glimpse of a reflection that occurred on the crystal sharp scalpel. 'He wouldn't even suspect, it could even be played with her as it was. No one would suspect a thing after hearing about this rare specimen and how it spoke so soon.' Everything documented and in a part of her brain, it was stored, easily accessible if a case was to be found against him. No. IT's coming but let him be distracted by him and deliver. One plunge behind his back will be enough to be the end of him, it's a lot less than what he deserves. His body would be used in the next extraction and he would receive an assistant of his own. After all, he had the knowledge, the experience and the practice, the equal of doctor James Hundra the third. A grand name for a stinking fella' as he often thought. Though despite some misspelt words on the notes below him, he still couldn't stop but hold the grudge. It was a small error in the system that placed him below someone of equal, or even lower skill. Not for long now, as he was done wrapping her and placing it inside. He's distracted now. And surely he wouldn't notice a scalpel, a blade taken and hid right in the coat. IT needed two pairs of hand to be lifted and carried, as he was called. 'It's ready.' They kept silence near each other, feeling different about the task. James felt a pain in his stomach, perhaps something he ate earlier. Good, it should be done by now. A small carrier bag that delivered the substance while he was eating, just as unnoticed. Never would it occur to James that he would start seeing unwell, the image in front of him shaking, as his hands. They reached and inserted it, the capsule now opening a hatch and receiving the last one. Strange, James thought. He was left to do it alone. The patience was no longer there, abandoned quite, as the hatch went away and the carrier sent with all the merchandise along the way. To him, Ghaaj, it seemed as their last work together. That down fool, he said to himself. Not even once spoke my name in good tongue, never matter that it will make it easier now. His daring assistant, the one that he least expected to get rid of him, especially since he had a family on his back. Well, ironic. A crack and a snap of the fingers, his hand unzipped some buttons off his coat. Ghaaj knew that there was no one around to see or hear it happen. Under his coat now, his hand grabbed and held the end of an eviscerated knife, slightly melted from a previous encounter. It was just as James left his grasp over the machine that he found himself backed on the edge. Not realising until it was too late, nor that his nerves were slightly tilted from a previous drug, he walked into his own doom. He stopped as his former assistant grabbed him, still facing the other end of the emptiness of the hollow cargo hold they were located in. 'What are you doing man?' James tried moving his arm but he only found himself to be overpowered. This couldn't be my assistant, perhaps a thug? The mind sought to explain, reeking through and find the first valid explanation it could pull off. No, it wasn't like that, no one else could've had access, there was no sound. 'Feeling clumsy James?' James tried swallowing off the bitterness of his friend. Something was inside of him, that was clear, reaching the back of his spine. A strange feeling to him, as a surgeon, to feel such a thing, having memorised everything, down to his every bone and form. No pain. So am I drugged? His thought could've gone so many places, perhaps if he had the time he would've discovered it. 'Farewell

James. The knife raised itself, engulfed in small flames and cutting through its way towards the skull, all in a swipe. His body was left to fall, out of the lack of judgement. 'Damn this man, taking revenge even in his death.' He saw it bounce over the various spires raised against down to the very pits that were left there. It left an eerie feeling as not even the sound of it hitting the ground would've satisfied him. Ghana J scratched his chin with the same hand he used the knife. An accident, perhaps, that should solve his every problem, even get rid of the problem if word came around. 'James, you poor.' Something stopped him from stretching, staring too much into the abyss was already unsettling. Though, a peculiar thing came to mind. 'I said his name.' And soon after he realised where he heard it before. One more particular instance that almost poisoned his entire mind. The suckers of hers, there's the chance she might've already taken a part of him. For me now, Ghaaj, the hunt is on. The distance and the abyss seemed much more welcome to him, and a smile arose. Half the state was already traversed by the ship, entire sectors skipped too, as this wasn't going to be just a normal transportation. She'll be half asleep for at least a few more sectors until she managed to arrive at the destination. The ship she was in and twenty others were to be delivered to the royal palace, with no excuse. It took a while but they arrived there. Still unconscious from the ghizzarious gel inserted through the back of their spine by the tubes. It was enough that most of them had a belly full of it when it was inserted with the tracking objects. Now, a surplus was inserted for them to be kept at bay. A scrumptious invention, quoted from its inventor itself when describing it. 'The inflamed body created as a breed from the ones that gave us all. As in their branches they held genetic codes helpful to many breeds that were created for casual uses in our daily activities. Different types, subclasses and many were devised for those breeds, including the most known of uses. The gel, that keeps us alive. The one that makes us dizzy when too much is applied but keeps us tied together to not fall to pieces. It's a blessing and a curse, it needs no replenish as it's too thick and too muddy to be absorbed by the body. A second nature and the next step in our evolution, something that not even our ancestor dreamed or believed in. Blessed be our saviours, now revered as gods from the past, from bringing the past back to us.' The ringing of a bell interrupted the class as an armoured man came closer to him and whispered in his ears. 'Class dismissed.' The professor signalled them to go after hearing. The entire staff had an earlier release, from their boundaries as the shipment arrived. So many children there, all lied to, some facts hidden. He dismissed the thought, ought to join his fellow staff members. In his mind, the thought of it was clear, the kids wouldn't be allowed to see them, to be saved from the grim thoughts of history. They were all taught in history and knew what happened, the causes and the effects it carried. 'Morally bent.' It came out loud, accompanied by a cough, his teeth sinking it as a company.

Brooding

There laid a broad standing on the street. Her kind was anything but decent, which meant a lot having come from one from a class such as mine. Douglas Pickett, one who lived alone and watched from his lone apartment and thought. This inheritance turned out to be more like a bothering thing than anything else. Just as he gazed once again, he saw that broad. Nothing of her was luxurious other than the small pelt made of small animals which had bored their sharp teeth upon themselves. A pretty thing as it was obviously custom designed. I stood above the high store in my house, looking through the pane and the bother. A few streets away but that noise, the noise of lust that they made every night had driven me mad to the point of wanting to burn to a brink. The light of the day meant that they couldn't do the business anymore. 'Damn these officers.' I said to myself. Bribe after bribe, going from her to them. She must be the owner, with her chocolate expression and hair almost melting with a light blond. Something about her made her charm them easily despite being of the kind brought from a different world. 'Damn her too for making all the noise.' His neighbours had been known to partake from time to time. Perhaps, that was the main reason why they weren't as disturbed by this as he was. Outside the matter was getting worse for both of us. I follow through the garden and recognised them. 'Good morning.' Said one, wearing a tight fit dress, pretending to be a worker of the garden. She was tending to the flowers, cutting them thoroughly. I nodded my head and looked around until I saw another come and go through. They hid with us, bartered with us in the markers, bought from us in the general store. And none of the others appeared to have known who they were, what they were. More importantly, that mad sound drove me as far to the point. I could hear it even now after looking at that old factory. These beings had converted to a place of lust and of sin. 'Sir, excuse me, sir.' 'What is it?' I haven't noticed it but one of them had decided to approach me. She had a veil over her and appeared to be as the rest of us, a human of some kind. But I couldn't be deceived by that. 'Give me that.' For a moment I almost burst and revealed myself and them too soon before the world was prepared. Some of the others saw me react and appeared to have been started by my reaction. 'Excuse me, I'm just expecting something important.' The clerk gave me a pass, but this was indeed, without a doubt or a lie, a letter of utmost importance. I was about to leave for a couple of days from here and make sure I wasn't going to be taken by surprise by any single of those broads. Don't smile at me, I know who you are, I saw you. And him as well. 'Have a good day sir.' That smile was only a thing that attempted to shimmer my rage, but I had come to realise that it hadn't been directed towards me. It was the man behind who had waited for a while in line. His hair was sweaty and unattended to, and from the looks of it, he had come under a charm from this witch. This happened abruptly even for them, as I've never been called there with so much urgency. Apparently, there had been a crisis which resulted in them having to call all apparent employees to work as fast as possible. Right in time if you ask me. The first train, luck and fate were on my shoulder as this was the last one to leave the city for a long time. I wasn't finished but on the long way, there'd be enough time for me to read on. As it lay, 'Dear Douglas C. Pickett, We announce you with utmost respect that you are to show yourself by the noon of seventeen in the laboratory. This crisis may not bode well into the paper alone. For now, you and other two hundred of your colleagues have been immediately informed and have taken action to stabilise this as fast as possible. At least until you and anyone else arrives, the entire laboratory is in quarantine. Please bring whatever you deem necessary and be ready for immediate danger. Have a pleasing day and don't forget that we have your best interest at work. Yours truly.' Signed by the boss himself, the only thing that wasn't typed. Must've hurt your wrist having... One thing stopped me from reading, as I was already embarked with my pass on. It was one of the witched standing on that row, a few paces ahead, trying to find a chair. I knew it, she was having a conversation inside, but I was aware of the fact that I was followed. 'Damn her.' 'Yes, right here ma'am.' She has placed just a few cabins ahead, as I could see her from my window, that draws her attention. Has she noticed that my cabin had been partially open? Was I paranoid? This wasn't to be this mad, she had taken attention and pointed at me. 'How rude.' I muttered under my moustache. Apparently, over the fact that I was alone, she asked the conductor if she may join me. As for that, he promptly replied and opened my door for her. 'Greetings.' 'Greetings sir.' Then came with a fuller sound. 'Ma'am.' A shock ensued, at the worst of times, having to proceed this journey with her despite knowing what she truly was. A witch, a wench, a creature that made too much noise, that damning shout and their strange, pulsating vibration. Why is she here? 'Hey, aren't you that man who lives there, no, that isn't it. But aren't we neighbours? Wait, I know you ser, I live just a few blocks away from you, I must be certain.' That was the last straw, now they taunted me to no extreme. 'Indeed I do, but what of it? I barely leave the house as it is, busy with my work and what not. Actually, I'm quite.' One glance on the outside and I pushed the door closed. These booths were almost inaudible to the point where not even a shout could go through. 'I'm quite curious how you got to find about me at all.' 'Mind if I?' 'Go on ahead.' She took out of her small bag a pack of cigarettes, even offered me one as a sign of good faith. But I refused, and I would do it again, knowing that I could free myself from that poison. Even now, their intentions of harm weren't as clear. Focus, Douglas, the letter. Now that I look at it again, I see that's got quite a few error in its, miswritten words, a shaky signature, too short. Not to mention that its quality has dropped since the last one I received months ago. As a matter of fact, I should've called them when I had the chance. I'll drop a call at the next stop, just to be certain. So far, her glances at my papers appeared to raise something in her. She had kept the cigar away from her mouth for a while and anyone could see how much she had begun to shake. Perhaps something wasn't right. 'Are you feeling well my lady?' This appeared to have awakened her from that momentary slumber of focus. Either that or the moment when I bent the letter in two. One thing leads to another and we finally started talking, now that she appeared to have loosened. 'I'm actually working towards obtaining my inheritance for the time being.' 'Why would that be my lady? Surely you couldn't have been abandoned like that by your parents.' 'Well, I'm sure we all have our differences with our so-so ones but you can certainly not claim to understand my situation sir. I've been abandoned by them and cut from it and you seem to know just how much an attorney could reach. And from the modest job she appeared to be describing, just a secretary wouldn't be able to afford, let alone be able to go on and win her inheritance back. What are you into then? You seem to be a wealthy man. Oh, Adeline. I'm Douglass, and I'm just working what I can get my hands on. This left a bitter taste on both of their mouths. It was clear that something changed after that lie. But in no other way would I tell this wench that I was a doctor, she had known. Judging by her expression, she knew that we were all doctors working there at the lab. What now, what will you do now that you found out? That's crude, but I guess we do whatever we can to survive, right? Her face changed from something pretty to a damned thing that appeared to have been battered by a combination of rage and old age. It didn't leave much room for sense, judging by the fact that she was as young as-as in her twenties. But the witch remained a witch regardless of what skin or wig she wore. I could see it by now, the next station that would bore. I swear to all mighty, if any of you wenches had any of it to do with this, I will. Before the silent threat, there was an exchange of gazes, just before the man came in to ask the tickets. Here. Here. She mockingly repeated. The way she made the man look at us make him think we were a couple. An even deeper insult I concur. Before you leave, may I ask you when's the next stop. I'm fairly in need to give a call, it's utmost important. Well sir, why didn't you ask, we have a line sitting just near the driver's cabin. Emergency only but if it's true. It is, I'd be utmostly pleased if I could. My small luggage bag was right in my hand. Just as I placed myself, I appeared frightfully enough to push her away from standing so close to me. You won't do it this time, I will take the call. If you may follow me, sir. I nodded and came out of the cabin, locking it now. It appeared that the man was dull enough to forget the keys, which got me promptly to close her in. She hadn't noticed yet, as a matter of fact, she tried to ignore me and my actions now. Too late, wench. No one saw me there, in their shuffling confusion but I had taken them, soon to give them back after I was done with my call. We went through the entirety of the train to the point when I found the small telephone. It was rustic, quite a wonder how it managed to work. Wait a minute now, I believe you dropped this. Fate had worked with me now, perhaps it had known of the vileness of the wenches. That might as well be the reason why I acted this way. But the sudden motion of the train and the turn made me drop the keys. Lucky enough, it appeared that this affected both of us, sending us to a state of dizziness and inability to control where we landed. It worked just perfectly as he mistook this action as if it fell off from his pocket. Thank you, good sir, and talk away, it's rare to see someone so polite riding on the lower class. Don't mention it. Fat oaf, who dares bring the attention of the class here and now? You should be thankful someone even paid the fee to get on this dirty train. Looking back, I closed my small compartment and the windows as well. No one was to hear all of this, regardless if one tried to eavesdrop or not. That wench and that fat oaf will be dealt with later, this was important. The call came out a surprise now, as it was revealed that my suspicions were true. As it appeared to be, there wasn't any letter which was sent at all. Nothing of the sort, not even the slightest drop or missing apparel for them to be brought back. Someone had tampered with the seal that was used for the letter, I announced. At which I was advised to go to the local police or to return as fast as possible home. They were doing something there. This was dangerous, the act not of a rational man but that of one who had been driven to the point of desperation and confusion. I've let the phone immediately down. We were at least one hour in the train ride but nevertheless, I decided to take on my nerves and pull the blackness that of which was my blood. My hairs were dirty now from the fall but I survived jumping out of the train. The vision had begone for seconds and it appeared that I had jumped just in time before we were ready to enter the dark tunnel. And from the other direction, the other train would've crushed me before I had the chance. Nevertheless, despite the fact that I was wet and alone, the night was approaching, I was still one hour away from home. There I saw her though, in that dark locked thing, unable to open her iron locked window to jump and follow me. But that's the time when I saw her in the truest of forms. A malevolent dark thing which appeared to have abandoned the head and push small white things in the air, like a grown barnacle of some kind. It pushed towards those clothes to reveal the naked body of black and blue, a woman stricken and eaten now that it wasn't needed anymore. That mouth ran across as a surprise when it started to hover in its small box. I saw it and reached for the crucifix around my neck, but it was too late. They were all alone to deal with that locked terror. But I was more afraid, for they knew where I lived. Even as they went to where I worked and stole the seal, to the point of the matter when they haven't realised it was even stolen now. 'I need to get home.' I said to myself. Even in the darkest of nights, if I ran fast enough, I would get there before midnight. Henceforth, without any other option, I ran as fast as possible, in the cold. This harsh weather only pushed me to get there faster, as I was waiting for the chance. A mere stood there just waiting for me to ride it with seemingly no master to stand beside it. Perhaps it was either the merest of chance or I was guided by something to return home. Nevertheless, since there wasn't any human in range for me to ask out of which this wild animal belongs, I took control of it. This appeared to be closer to a dream than anything else which had happened to me. A lucid dream in its true meaning. Nothing was displayed away from my reach, I was on my way and soon to breach. The inner barrier which stood between us. With a bit of luck, I could've even caught them during the act and alerted the authorities. 'But what are you planning? You disturbing things?' I asked myself as if knowingly, some greater thing which had affected my fate could hear me. As a man which believed in logic, this thing that affected my life had taken it all. There wasn't anything for me to do but to go there and see for myself. Steal what I had? There wasn't anything of value in sight that I kept, at least something other than my papers and what not, And the papers would utmost certainly be checked first, that was the promise. As for this mere, it'd be abandoned near the border, once I was sure I'd reach the point. But, this was about to come as a shock, after my journey got to an end. I saw what was to be a trail of smoke rising to the very top of the sky, and immediately knew what they've done. Even my simple-minded beast started acting bizarre upon that sight. Neither I nor it knew what was about to happen to us. 'Damn this thing. Begone you beast.' Since it was about to betray me, I went alone and past the crowds. Past the streets, I reached around. And when I was close, I was forced to my knees to see what had happened to me. The entirety of my house had burnt, the entire top was engulfed in a burning fire that appeared to be affecting only my apartment. A ring of smoke came out of my window and I swore I saw a wench inside, grinning as she saw me at my thinnest of moments. Whatever I could've done became pointless for me now. This was my defeat and as I became aware, there wasn't anything for me to do. What little I had become engulfed in the fire. Soon they'd extinguish it but that wasn't a place to be living inside. The men tried to help me but I refused. I waited there, in the range of the debris, hoping like a madman that I would be crushed, but that never had come. Only ashes and burnt out wood remained at my top, in the middle of the damning night. For, but only a sight was allowed for me to take. The entrance was forbidden despite having inherited that top view above the other paying denizens. Now there wasn't anything I had, a man on the streets. And everything happened in the span of so little but of her grin. I could see her from the other end even now, smiling as she watched me intently. For a moment, I was certain that she eyed me even when I stood to gaze from my safe place. Nevertheless, this was my defeat and none would get to know of her actions or what they were. So I thought until I was getting ready to approach my new life. That's at least when I was aware that my torture would come to an end at last. Awareness proved me wrong this time. She came to me in the darkest of nights, when my sleep was still disturbed, my vision so blurred. Red and mad, it came through my mind. 'Come with me.' She said and went on. 'That thing which happened to your place, quite bad,

I'd wager. How about you live with us? We got a small room in the basement which would more than certainly fit your needs until you can get a place for yourself.' This kindness had belonged to a lizard but I was desperate. Caught between living on the street and wanting to sleep without hearing those noises. Perhaps it was that damn tongue that bewitched me for I cannot explain for myself why I've accepted this. This transition was immediate. I was to be accepted by her and brought to the basement through a secret entrance. Dust, cobwebs and other signs that made this look like a tomb rather than a basement brought a kind of shock. But as I was sent there to the bottom and left alone,

I have come to realise that the silence I had thought I've obtained was a lie. Neither the light was dead there, as this resulted in me with looking above. There were far gaps between the planks and I could see fragments of light coming from above. But that wasn't the thing alone, she had made this place only to torture me now. Hearing that damnable sound of sin and how they sucked the succour out of the victims. I was a slave, a small parasite trying to hide between the cracks. No matter too hard I tried, I could hear them even in my sleep. The tainted, the bizarre, the images of my house burning and that made me at once realise what had to be done. 'Could this be a mistake on her part?' Suddenly, this torture of her had become a cry for help. Had she realised what the others were? I didn't know but as I reflected on what she appeared to be. A blue eyes thing with blonde and dark skin, but from what she appeared to wear, she never partook into this. She eyed me intently but never did mention of what was about to be done about my condition. This was certainly something which would've made her realise just how disturbing this situation truly was. Someone had to deliver these creatures away from trying to breed, I was utmost certain of it. Either she or the hand of fate guided me to this point when they needed to be delivered from our world. I didn't care about which side she was on, but I've made a promise to myself. No more sleepless night. 'Whatever happens to me, I don't care for anymore, this is to be my fate. I will be sent into a slumber internally if this it is.' And luckily for me, the closing hour would soon come, these were to be the last minutes and the only chance to repay that debt. There was still hope that they'd perish. Most of them. The memory of the woman who stood alone locked there still reigned. Perhaps that chance came sooner or later that one of the passengers bore a revolver. Oh, the horror they must've encountered. 'The telephone, my house burning, they must think that I'm dead!' In both cases, both my neighbours, that which knew me from far away and my employers were aware that something had happened. Enough of that now. First, they will perish and only after that I will have time to clean my name. There laid a stove in the basement, as it appeared to be the one which bore heat throughout the house. Perhaps one hoped that the heat source would prevent me from sleeping as it reached almost unbearable amount as I stood there. The carpet would suffice, the blankets and the pillows would suffer the same. Even the foundation appeared to be weak, too weak perhaps. I laid a hand and pulled a plank out as if it was nothing. 'This is it.' I said it aloud, as I realised what this meant. One strong flame would help it crush the entire foundation and see that their fall would trap them in this. A perfect demise for these damn creatures that don't belong to our world. Even now, I saw them through their cracks, tending to the sleeping men, revealing their parasitic forms. They were dripping through the gaps, leaving on the bottom the marks of the liquids they bore inside of them. Oh damn you, this will end fast. I'll see you it. I threatened them, but as they paid no mind to me, I was free to go ahead and rip this place apart. A dangerous manoeuvre, but this was to go one way or another. Since they never remembered the reason for this factory's abandonment, this was the time to remind them. They thought they could just come inside. They thought they could go ahead and crawl here and make as much noise. That the little primates wouldn't understand nor care about what was going on. But now, as this place was ripped apart, they were certainly wrong. From every side, this was to be a place of plunder. A single flame came into being, which spread as far as the eye could see. It was the perfect time to escape, but as I've done so, someone stood to wait for me outside. The woman that had brought me into this place, standing as if she was expecting a report of some kind. I'm not your dog to stay here but I have done as I was asked. "What did you do?" She wasn't aware yet, perhaps because I close the trap doors before the smoke came out. A crackling fate would've awaited me, as I saw that near one of the doors there was a lock standing there. "You wanted to lock me inside." It was a mere thought, nothing more than. But to that, I turned and finished the motion, closing the half turned to lock. "That key, give me the key now." She should've noticed my eyes earlier for I was ready to go down this path and take every single one of them down. Even a simple-minded servitor didn't deserve to live. Now she didn't even have the chance to run or scream as I leapt at her and covered her mouth. Soon my force overpowered her and forced itself of the nostrils. "You should've listened!" I said, and it turned out like there was no one around to see the ordeal. Her eyes turned red once she saw the little trail of smoke rising to the sky, almost unnoticeable in the deadest of a night though. Before I knew it, she passed out, though her heart still felt some beats. "Damn witch bit my hand." But I had the key. Hurt and bleeding from my hand, I managed to stumble on the street and noticed that there wasn't anyone outside. Something of the closing season made them fear the darkness of the world. "But don't fear my brothers." I said as with my lungs filled with smoke and my mind with my intervention. That my acts were justified, I was aware as I said. "You will not come into our world, I'm certain of this, you spawn. Damned things from the hellish realm from whence you came, now return." And with a final twist, I locked the door and threw the key. They would need tools to open this door from the looks of it, as the factory was now closed. I now started walking towards the doors of what was once the building in which I live. Soon, everyone would be awakened by the screams. It didn't matter a bit for me, for the way upstairs was free for me to use. Since I doubted of any door that which was locked, I arrived just in time to hear the entire town awakened, tired just as I was. Then the crash came with an immediate blow, as I knew it'd happened. I caught it just in time just as my hands laid around the round opening and saw the factory get crushed under its own weight. The flame soon engulfed everything which was crushed, revealed that there had been a pit under the factory. A deep hole which had been used for mining in the ancient days before the revolution. I looked baffled once I realised just how further below had the destruction gone without a notice. "This is the end of you, I suppose." And now that which remained was for him to close the door and have the peace and quiet he had always wanted and thought he deserved. No one around to wake him up, no creature as this world was safe. Soon they'll see the man who had the return, they'll realise once she was wakened. But they'll know as well when I return, that what I've done was to save them all. Henceforth what came now was the dream, one that hadn't lived in the longest of while ever since they had made the conversion. A few people felt as comforting as he felt now and that said a lot about it. Now that he was free, he dreamed the last thing he had thought about. The vision, that only moment when he was caught away against his senses. A moment of vileness when he was there, in the body of another. In my hand laid a revolver, six bullets. Perhaps this is what happened, that it came soon after the conductor arrived to alert me of the thing which was locked in my compartment. After all, that was first and foremost the only proof of the existence of those things. If someone had any chance to, believe me, it would've been one of the passengers of the train who stood and travelled with her. Nevertheless, even a corpse-filled with stench would be enough of a proof of something as vile and deceprid as such. My hands were sweating. People had been complaining about those dark moans and strange noises. No one wanted to believe what they were riding with and it was a lot easier than trying to accept what they saw. Fear ran among everyone and the only one who could do anything was the conductor and the officer on board. 'There had been a man there and a woman, both passengers, I'm sure of it. Both of them just disappeared.' It wasn't certain, but both of us stood as far away but close to seeing a bit of it through the glass. A hideous thing and I was certain that it would become even more hideous upon approaching it. 'We need to do something for their safety and our. If it lives who know what it can do to us or to the safety of the passengers.' As little as they were, he was right, someone had to deal with it. But from the looks of it, the damned thing had made a mistake into revealing itself, as now it had become immobile from the looks of it. This was the perfect time to come upon it unaware state. There had been three shots which came down on the slumbering thing. The first two penetrated but the last one bounced and fell on the floor. Pieces of the glass came down on the floor. 'Open it, I need to be sure it's dead.' He handed me the keys and as I opened I noticed how the form fell on the bottom. Some of the sharper pieces of the glass pierced it as it laid below. Nonetheless. 'The passenger's sir, I'll deal with this now.' He went on ahead and started dealing with the suspicious looks after letting me inspect this. I could see it by now, how it started dissipating in the air. But in the little time, I had the chance to inspect it as much as I could. After all, this appeared to be dissolving in the air fast. Regardless of how repulsing it was, I used a cloth to turn the body around and puncture through the belly. 'God the stench is damning.' Those organs had belonged or evolved to match that of a human, among others. A curious thing, I wasn't a doctor but realised that those lungs had been stuffed and were the first to go out and be reduced by their sides. I couldn't say but it appeared it might've been suffocated. As its black form finally disappeared, there'd be nothing left but a dark mark on the floor and the stench. Not a body, not a trace. 'Close this and don't let anyone come it.' I opened the windows before giving out the orders. He had no expectation for this window to be paid, but the sight of its shimmeringly waste became too dark to be looked upon. The man lost his nerves but at least the deed was done. As this dream appeared to end, Douglas was the next morning once one of his neighbours had complained about hearing noises of a struggle above her. Apparently, someone had managed to snick in the abandoned burnt apartment and make his home there. What the officers found was a dead mean who had died there somewhere in the middle of the night, coincidentally at the same time with the fire. Nevertheless, Douglas was pronounced dead, suffocated in his sleep by the ashes. There wasn't any funeral, as the state had decided to bury his body in an unknown place with an unnamed gravestone, a mystery of the city. At least now the top floor was closed for good, same as the factory now. The city decided that the hole could never be entirely covered by the section be surrounded by a tall wall that would block all entry on it.As for that thing on the train?'Legends, urban legends, nothing more to be concerned about.'Said the officer when asked, and thus all had ended for Douglas C. Pickett.

Leading the damned

It might've come as a surprise to go around and walk as slowly as the man in front and the others.His suit was of a high descent at least he made sure to have it shown down to every little cut and sewn line of silver.Still, most of it remained dark, blue, just to match the colour of his hair and his appeal.There was another thing about this transport.Four, no, five of us going through.Each man stood around the coffin, making sure it floated just above land.No mistake could've been made no, was it was obviously not hovering.A few meters above the air, no fluctuation, carried and pushed around by the sticks.'Pass.'The leader of the unit said as he checked around.It only took a moment to insert his finger and be recognised.A peculiar method of recognition, a small syringe coming through the tip of the finger and pulling some of your blood inside. Too small and steep to leave a mark, it was something a child could only dream of in his fear. But what was in the coffin to need this security, to begin with? None of them was informed, and now they were to embark in the shuttle to what would be the longest journey of their lives. Stuck together in a metal case with what was to be the dead body of an animal of the creature of the sort. Nothing human could've been in there, to begin with, unless one would count the stories of gigantism in which no proof had taken effect in years. 'Carry it and be careful not to drop it.' He was to stay in front with the driver. It was a busy day from the looks of it. At least eight hundred others going about their day, some going in bigger shuttles, others just loitering about. Taken from another man's perspective. 'There was a kid sitting that day, a body, young of the age, a lad, near the dock area. He was eating what appeared to be an apple, the old kind, not the altered ones. It was already a rare sight, judging by what he was dressed like, ya know. Like in the old photos of black and white where they carried guns and what not. Anyway, he was standing there, looking distinctly that time. I was with John, Carter, Malkovich and the one that leads the operation. Wicwiz, of Wichjoz, a foreign name of some kind, I can't truly remember. There was something I pointed out to the others, from the distance, the boy looked like he was someone who didn't belong in there. A little thing lost in the time. "Stick to the important event mister Andrej, stick only to them." The man nodded in his chair and looked as if he was going to spill something which they didn't want to hear. Something happened that day, and for the past interviews nothing much of value had been added. A small distraction, here and there, before the blankness of the veil in which they were closed. Until they reached their destination, that door wasn't going to open. Food and water laid about and one toilet for their use only. 'Worst of all.' As the man who had given them the assignment had said, a highly ranked officer of the military had laid this following approach. 'The circumstance leaves it that you can't-do anything until you reach the landing point. You may eat and drink whatever you have but focus on protecting the unit. Carry on with your mission and make sure that it arrives safely.' These were the order, at least, in retrospective, looking back, there should've been more of them. A harsh lesson had he set. 'Hungry?' Asked Malkovich as he lit a candle in the dark. The others were surprised as this made them look like a bunch of cultists, especially since the shuttle had already gone ahead on going. The speed and the noise were already hard to make it hear what was going outside. From the sounds of it, there was a desperate need to deliver this. 'A fine thing, they are feeding us with salt and butter, it can't get any better than this.' Said John after taking a bunch of sardines. One of them still stood alone in the darkness, clouded. This was mostly because he was trying to read the inscriptions on the grave. It was certainly a peculiar thing that they appeared only in the heart of the dark under the candlelight that they became visible. Especially since they were carved inside what appeared to be wood. When it came to be and they reached a safe distance, Carter took the initiative and lowered the small flying plate it was on. 'There's no need for it to use the energy if we're here, right?' Came in John as his fellow went on to deactivate. It was certain that the fourth was silent as well. The others weren't as uncomfortable as they had appeared to be, at least not from the bumps in the road. Various flying debris and even small chunks out of meters were just flying through the air. Abruptly speaking, the others who made the traffic worse didn't really help with the situation. I broke the silence and made the confinement unit shuffle. The candle was dropped and as the light went out, all four of them grabbed the coffin and held it in place. It was then that everyone, at once felt a shiver and a vibration as if it came from something which was life. The unit which would've hovered might've been destroyed if it was still kept one, so they said. A pain, truly, but it was a fairly good call to go on ahead with it and carry on now. What was to be done? Each bump made it harder for them to hold it still. But even harder, at least for them remained that something just hit the far end of the coffin. Something hard was inside, and whatever it was, corpse or someone who was being smuggled, it appeared to make a sound. Practically hard to be heard in any other circumstance. This was a voice without mistake. None of them had failed to recognise this tainted whisper. Someone had to pay a visit and speak to him, one thought. When the next step towards our destination comes, I'll inform the unit captain. 'Am I the only one who hears this?' Even as this went on, one of us appeared to have spoken. Perhaps it was the fear or the paranoia, but none of us was sure who spoke those words. Could it have been Carter maybe? Perhaps John or Malkovich. Regardless of who said it, we were all still met with the same silence as he holds the grave. Something might've been stored inside, as one way or another, it kept pushing within an incredibly weak state from the likes of it. Everyone instantly placed a second hand on it. 'I'm thirsty. Could you keep all of your hands on it until I drink?' This was peculiar already. We all kept our hands near to one another, still on the coffin, making sure none of us was to make a mistake. The more we progress, the more it appeared like this was less of a coffin and more of a tomb. Its size appeared to be much greater and had something more of a grandeur in the meaning and the feel. Something changed along the way from the feels of it. Of course, this meant nothing in truthfulness as the fact of the matter remained. Something moved inside and everyone was aware of that. And this darkness and the fact that none of them could recognise one another made it worse. 'I'm still holding with both hands. For a second there, I couldn't even recognise my own voice. Even as the hands numbed down, there wasn't much to do anymore but wait and have a little faith. Another one went on. 'I'm doing it as well. As there came the third and final. 'I'm done drinking if anyone else's up to it. There was something of a chuckle there, as to pass the bottle of rum. None of the others became amused. Their heavy breathing became heavier. 'Something needs to be done, we can't go in like this without knowing what's going on. I'm certainly not the only one who feels this thing inside just messing up with us. That laugh, that power it's slowly gaining, how long until it pushes out and takes us in? We shouldn't have been assigned to this in the first place, yet someone up there messed up. "If you're so afraid, why'd you join the military then?" The damn silence didn't make it any better. Neither was the fact that they couldn't recognise who was this deserter of their ranks. 'I'll bring up the light then but I'm afraid it might not stay for long. The wind of the outside world came into this hold of theirs, shaking, pushing the air. Tribulations were the least of their problems as it appeared to be going well. 'Now, If I may. There came the light. Everyone except Malkovich who was now holding the light and the tomb with one hand looked just as surprised as the others. The inscription changed and it appeared that most of the suspicion was right. At least, there was sand below and the once normal coffin had become even mightier than it should've been. Not only was it golden but it appeared that it was twice as heavier than before. 'This isn't supposed to be here. Please tell me I'm not the only one seeing this, am I?' John looked at everyone but me. He was way too surprised to realise that there was sand as well as this change had come. Even the shuttle was laid under an apparent paint job from inside. 'Look. Hieroglyphs, inked all over the place, from the looks of it. None of them realised what had happened, but the desire to push the flame out must've come as quickly as ever. 'It must be this damned thing, I think it released something in the air. We must be hallucinating now. 'Carter was somewhat of a self-taught expert when it came to that. Poisons, gases and other types of drugs and paraphernalia of the kind which made it seem like he was taking something with him to the grave. He might've called it immediately if it wasn't for the fact that he wasn't sure what everyone else saw. 'Do we all see a tomb that replaced the coffin?' Mighty lord, one thought, just how deep below could this go? What mighty creature might be swarming through the winds and the dust? 'Can we all feel the sand and feel the smell of musk?' They all nodded in response. Every single one of them appeared to be moving their hands around the tomb and felt its form in front of Carter. At least, this had to confirm it. 'What will happen next after we lose the light?' There wasn't any other choice but to keep the lid shut with their hand. Since something was pushing from below, they needed the constant strength. 'We will eat and drink one at a time, understood? The rest of us should keep this tomb sealed until we reach the destination.' Luckily, the bottles of water were tightly shut so there wasn't any damage done by the sand. Carter had to drink and eat something of a turkey sandwich in front of the others. It was uncomfortable now to sit there and held the steeply placed entry and with that in mind, the others had to bend their knees and sit there holding. There was enough space from the looks of it and perhaps that was the least of their problems. Soon they'd become numb from all the sitting, especially since there was still a long way to go. 'It's getting worse each time the light goes off, stop putting it down unless you want to be the cause of this.' Even as John said it, he could see on Malkovich's face that his moustache was getting grey from fear. Carter might've finished but they were in the worst position now. Something was pushing hard from the other side. It wasn't long until it would break through. 'What are we going to do? Carter sit down and help us!' Half choking on his food, he came down and ran his hands over the entire object. He held with the strength of two now that he was there and couldn't complain about the hunger. There was more than enough down his throat. Now everyone was holding onto it on again, other than one. 'It's obvious that I can't hold the light any longer and help you. We must give one out or another.' In truth, the moment he placed it safely away from his hand, the light vanished into the dark. Now everyone was unrecognisable once again as the ride went on. 'Is this a trap or one of their dark experiments on other humans? Could this be something of the sort? Because I'm fairly certain this is far too strange to be happening now.' 'I don't know what to say but there may be signs of a gas or something which made all of us hallucinate.' 'Could it be from the turkey sandwich I just ate?' This small fact confirmed that voice to have belonged to Carter. But other than that familiarity, there was nothing about his voice that made him recognisable. Something blurred the voices into unrecognisable chants of some sort. 'Is that you Carter?' There was something about this that made in unlistenable other than the one seat away from me. At least that was clear. 'Use the light again, it settled down.' This time, Carter was the one to take out a special gas lamp. It had a small bottle of gas which was inserted by the side, the thing could run for at least a few hours. The next thing revealed was the fact that the tomb had grown. It had taken hold of more than two-quarters of this small room. 'It's getting worse, we need to stop and tell him what's going on. I've got a wife and a child waiting for me, I don't deserve this kind of treatment.' There were changed in Jones at least. He was still kneeling and holding with both of his hand but his hands were violently shaking. His eyes were uncontrollably going around, looking on every side and on every corner. I need to leave, I need to leave. He thought, desperately trying to focus on something but failing horribly to do so. As it came to be now, he was the only one in pain. The bottom half appeared to have been cracked into the dark. 'We can't stay too long in the dark anymore, John is right. Regardless of this being a gas or not, we can't take the chances anymore. We need to get through this, hallucination or not.' There was an interruption now and again. 'And you're saying that you and the rest of the crew had experienced something as ridiculous sounding as that inside of the shuttle? From the reports, you were supposed to carry this coffin which had to belong to Augustus Rodman. A valuable antique from the looks of it, rising up as high as eight hundred units at least. "That's what happened so far, at least from what I remember." The other reports, files and declarations said the same, at least from the looks of it. From what was said in this, they made no stop until the destination was reached, but this wasn't the problem. Witnesses and cameras around the city recorded and confirm that at no time was the door opened during this journey of theirs. 'But how?' This was quite interesting, the cracks made it obvious that it was about to open one way or another. 'John was getting even more nervous. One of his hands was getting down his jacket. This is certainly important now. 'He had brought a gun all along, as a matter of fact, we all had, but none of us had revealed it to the others. The moment he did it we all realised what it meant. In a way, he knew as well. As it wasn't entirely unexpected, as he pulled but pointed towards no one that the scenario came to his mind. He cocked it and shot Malkovich the first, either me or Carter would've incapacitated or pulled one of ours. There wasn't enough time for him once the first shot made contact. He could barely focus and breathe, this would've been worse for him this way. 'That's when we tried to calm him down. "Don't do something you're about to regret now." This was obviously the key to intermediate for the time being. Pain rush through, the pressure on the tomb was done. Carter was getting into reach to disarm him now. 'No!' He yelled this, but of course, no one outside would get to hear. It was already late as he came from his knees and stood upright, getting the height advantage. 'Take out your hands off that thing, whatever it is beyond, it must die now!' It was getting dangerous at first since everyone appeared to be condemning that threat. 'I said, hold your hands in your hand, don't make me shoot you. Don't try, I'm not the bad guy here but I know what you're trying. 'His eyes were immediately on Carter. At least he knew that he was outnumbered. This situation couldn't go on anymore. Not only because of this situation but also because the gas was running out. I remember having this in my mind, this simple question that still baffles me to this day. Has it been a few hours already? Perhaps, in a way, there was something to be surprised at, after all, the light was beginning to dim. It was either him or us to come on ahead and feign. We complied with his demands immediately. Without the pressure placed on the tomb, a gust of wind came through the small cracks from below it. Now, this is when the light went off as well. I do not know how it could've happened since it was tightly sealed but it happened nonetheless. The light went on as the cold gust somehow pushed through through the seal. We heard no scream but for the same muffled voice or chant. Every single one of us expected to hear the first shots since we were already taking care of this. It wasn't too surprising that we were all having our guns just getting loaded. But a curious thing, this made us forget about the tomb and everything about it. 'I'm going to turn on the light now.' Truthfully said, it was getting too cold for any decent human being to stay. We've never experienced something as cold as that day and you must trust me when I tell you, this was inside of the city's hottest area. Surrounded by shuttles on every side, all of which emitted carbon, heat and boiled oil. It had to leave a mark of some kind. 'Turn the light now.' Everyone expected something to go down as fast as the light turned on. When it did, we found everyone to be standing on two feet. Carter held the lamp and the static thrower in one hand. One shock would be just enough to push him into a temporary paralysis. 'I didn't know you were carrying that with you, Carter.' The only one there who appeared to have carried something to disarm rather than to kill. It was a somewhat nice gesture for him to do. But it wasn't the time. 'Where is he, do you see him?' Everyone looked but as their sight appeared to have avoided, it finally boiled to it. The lamp lit the stairs which lead below. A deep path, that couldn't lead to anywhere now, other than it is an illusion and there was a hole into the shuttle. There wasn't any logical explanation, but for now, this they had to accept. They broke the only thing that held the tomb closed for so long. Its remains were spread around. 'What do we do now Carter?' Malkovich appeared to be the calmer one now. I was messing around with the supplies, looking to see just how many we had. And I believe that Carter was checking just how many other replacements for the gas lamp they had. 'Plenty, in case you were wondering.' The incessant look on my face asked the question for me. It was hunger that got me, luckily, as the sand hasn't gone inside and the food wasn't spoiled yet, this gave me a moment to do so. 'Eat fast, I might have an idea where he went.' 'Carter, you can't possibly mean for us to go down there, even if. What if you're wrong then? If we're hallucinating, won't this just make us hurt one another? From what we know, we might as well just have been arguing over a wooden coffin, pushed to the point where we might've shot one another.' 'Enough, whatever it is, we can't risk this to be true, you can feel around the stone and the stand. You can even breathe the air, can't you? We'll go down there, take him back then seal it with an organic foam, now that there's nothing to put on top.' 'And who made you the boss now?' Malkovich was the other one holding a real shooter, not a stun gun. He wasn't pleased as well as I was by the orders. 'Relax, all of you, we need to think this as adults and more importantly as the hired guns which were brought here to protect this.' Immediately, Malkovich appeared to be enraged as well. 'And look how that turned out. In a way, it was true, this might've been the striking point. But don't get mad, you saw how that turned out for him and if it happens again for any single one of us, who know what might happen.' 'A vote then.' Proposed Carter. He had lowered his stun gun in a sign of good faith. As have I for a matter of fact. Malkovich was already ready to shimmer whatever remnants of rage he had before going on and looking back at the proposal. He knew that Carter wasn't going to come in his favour. Hence, it was me who decided. We took provisions after, without having to wait any moment for any other intrusion. Malkovich complied easily, at least so he seemed, but that came only on one condition. Said by himself now. 'I'm the one who's going to lead this expedition or this maddening craze around our tightly sealed box.' We both reluctantly agreed to that requirement and went on with his condition. After all, he appeared to have been doing it well for a while now. The walls were embedded all around with ancient hieroglyphs. They matched the ones written on the coffin from the looks of it. Now there wasn't any time to take any rash decision, but to be sure of it. 'We take him and leave as far as possible, we cannot risk it anymore, this is getting on my nerves as well.' It was quite obviously driving me in a state where I desired to harm my other fellow soldiers, perhaps even in something worse than that. Perhaps the air, or the morbid signs, which changed as well. Something with a lot of force managed to carve those signs he previously saw. 'Well, to put it in a manner where you'd understand what I'm trying to say, the previous one might've been chiselled which left that certain appearance of theirs. But after that, it was too familiar, those marks, the cast of teeth, cut through an angle. And that was stone, believe me, I felt it with my own hands. The others weren't as concerned as I was. Perhaps that's the reason why they haven't noticed what laid between our small pursuit. It bore through me.' 'Why didn't you warn the others then?' There was something of an error there, perhaps. Since he was there with them, he could've told them at any time of what he noticed or observed. 'I don't know, I couldn't answer this question if I wanted to. It just slipped into my mind and never got brought until now.' 'Did you want them to get hurt?' Asked the interviewer. He was digging deep with his claws. After all, he was in need for every word to be recorded to the second. 'I. Before speaking, he picked up another small machine which was already buzzing as if warmed. It played during the moment I said that I was driven to the point of being mad and wanting to harm them, said in those spectral words. 'It's a slip, that's all. The air there, perhaps the small space. I'm afraid of right space and it was more than enough being caught with them there, trying to rescue the man who was lost down there with a few shots in his hand.' 'So you went there with the thought in your mind to murder him.' 'No, we went there with the thought to restrain him and bring him back with us. Now, may I please continue?' There was a second hidden device. The man forgot completely about the marks left by the teeth. Strangely, this was a lie as there appeared to have the same effect on them when he spoke about it. This might've proven my theory, but if it is so, why could I be the only one who remembers it? Not only the teeth marks but also the words are written there, familiar, to the point where I was able to understand what was written there. 'Get out' It was placed under rows of warnings, lots and lots of them, disturbingly placed. Their form morphed into the indistinguishable text after a while. A language perhaps too old and esoteric to be looked upon. Something was still dripping from a hole. 'Can you hear that?' It was a river, the sound of water. 'In the city?' Asked Cater, still with an innocence and curiosity which belonged to him. He was ready to return as well at the first sign of pain or fear. 'Hold your nerves, both of you, this shouldn't go any deeper. And push the lantern a bit, will ya?' I'm trying to look where I'm going here. 'We reached the first chamber just well enough on our own feet. An eeriness was about it. This thing was a maze from the looks of it, a trap from the very beginning. Two open, gateless passages on each wall, only three of them. 'One where he could've been through, which leads two feigns.' Thought Malkovich as if for his plan to find him. 'But only one right now and have we the time to check everything right?' 'Cater, you can't be that much of a coward, even Pierce agreed to come with us now. What's with the sudden change of tune? We're already here, aren't we?' Malkovich appeared to have already fallen to the effect of the musk by now. It was in his eyes, he wanted to stay here and never leave. With this quick deterioration, who was to say if John was any better than him? Here he stood, the man who wanted to seal the only way inside. 'I remember.' Said Carter which shook me out of my boots immediately. 'Something's there, isn't it, the force that pushed or tried pushing out of the tomb, it's here isn't it?' This was a curious thing. Silence, dark, an immediate change of gas was unnoticed other than a flash. And as it went on without telling us, I saw it. Tall, made out of darkness, perhaps my mind playing a trick on me in the grimace of time. It was a tall humanoid which pulsated with something, large teeth and no eyes but the sense of smell. As soon as the light came, in the flash of a second, the light revealed nothing there. Other than the terrified look on my face, none of them appeared to have noticed anything at all. They continued as if nothing had happened. 'It could hunt us, couldn't it? With that strength, don't forget that it must've been the reason why the gate broke. And he stole kidnapped John or might've from the looks of it.' 'Why did it avoid us then, huh?' Malkovich, just as he questioned it, finally noticed me and how I stood there, almost like a guardian statue in this desolate maze. 'Pierce, are you still with us?' His fingers were snapping for a while until I decided to answer. I was phasing away while Malkovich seems like he was to be taken in as full of a blow like the other ones. A peculiar thought, judging by the fact that Carter appeared to cope quite well with the circumstances. Finally, I answered to their calls once they stopped repeatedly going on with them. After all, this wasn't to take long, the whispers were about to come. They will hear them sooner or later now. 'I'm here, what's going on?' 'This thing, this virus that has apparently infected John and both of you, it appears that it's driven you to this state of paranoia and rage. We need to get out before it's too late and we get too caught up and unable to run away.'He always hated John, even from the very first moments we were given this assignment.But one thing beat this.'How come you're not affected by this?'Asked Malkovich, suspiciously getting closer to Cater.'I don't know whenever or not I'm affected, from what we know, this might've been airborne and every single one of us could carry it now.'"Stop talking gibberish and tell us, we're waiting.No rubbish answer, just a straight, yes or no, why are you the one not getting affected?You want to leave, don't you?So desperate to leave others behind rather than save them.'"You're a madman!"The shout of rage came down on Carter as I watched.Something truly affected me in a way that left me in a state which made me helpless.I couldn't help but gaze in the blank entrances, full of the void and the gloom while they fought.The fear and excitement of seeing it again came over each flash of the lamp after being dropped.Carter.He started screaming after being wrestled down.I thought I saw him again in the darkness, but this wasn't safe for either.'Could this be John?'Before Malkovich could take out his weapon and end the fight, they were both pacified by my words.They listened there and raised themselves, almost calmly.A few bruises on Carter, but who could pretend it wasn't fair?After all, Malkovich was as fat as a barrel from the looks of it and as reluctant to leave as a heavy stone in the river.'We find him, but we can't split up with a light.If you want to stay after, that's your deal, but I won't waste my life for an ungrateful runt.'Making sure that there were plenty of rations and gas replacement, we went on, everyone together, taking the right and the second tunnel close to the entrance.It didn't take long for us to go through, as paranoid as we have become.They left me to lead this time, perhaps because Carter wanted to stay behind Malkovich, just to be sure.Still, they forgot to notice how there laid something there, on the walls.It spoke of something I couldn't decipher nor describe that well in the mids of a small lamplight.Plus, there was something in the air, hard to breathe from the likes of it.Hard to grasp, how it ended as fast.A dead end.But something was off about this dead end, the drawing on the wall which appeared to be almost primaeval in nature.It was a tall thing which appeared to have come from an abyss of ink.Closer to a splatter of ink than anything that would've been.And what did even stranger remain that it was recent?'Look, there's a mound of dirt raised there.'"What do you think it might be then?"Perhaps, most likely a burial ground, from the looks of it, the ornaments on the side, the gibberish was written on that wall.'He noticed, Carter noticed, how could it be that he noticed it now?This had me turn around and look directly in that blinding thing.I saw him again standing tall in the darkness before going away.'You see them as well?What do you think of the writing?Have you read the others?'I'm not entirely sure what I said, but those are the words I thought off.Both Malkovich and Carter appeared to have been struck by something as I said it.It wasn't fair that I was left there to wait for them to get closer to leaving.We had to check them together and none of them understood why.We checked every single one, dead end after dead end.Making me stand just behind, closer to the dark, which made me quite reluctant.It was obvious that someone was playing a trick on us.Something at the corner of my eye just as we traversed to the other room.'This is the last one, there's nowhere else he could've gone to.'And the end of which they went but this was no dead end alone.There was a small hole, as to the size of someone or something which wasn't there anymore.No coffin, nothing but dirt and the cast of something that was huge.'It might've been an ornamental figure of someone who might've...Suffered from gigantism, so I presume.They don't usually go past the age if you understand.With the chemicals and all, as they say.'This saves of him wasn't about to last any longer.'So there was someone here after all, wouldn't you say?And we did stay here for a long time, haven't

we?"Malkovich was getting anxious for his proposal.He was licking his lips as if they tasted like milk and honey, just as he peered around.Before talking, he looked at me, seeing how distraught and away I appeared to be gazing at those writings.'I think we all know where that thing is.And before you say anything Cater, it may be that indeed we spent too much time around each dead end, leaving it enough time to escape.'None of them would've believed me no matter how I tried to approach the problem.Now, Carter looked as sane as ever, when he proposed it.'Let's at least return and see if he came back as well, there's nowhere else he could've been gone."And if he isn't there?"Then you can go ahead and explore this for however much you can Malkovich.No one here will try to stop you any more of put you in a spot you don't want to be.'It wasn't an option now that I knew what was lurking there with them.But as they shook on it and agreed, I bit on a bar, as hunger took on.I don't know much it passed, but I was getting worse with each moment.There's more to it now.We climbed back to find out that the place from where we came from was sealed as it once had been.But the problem was the fact that we were the ones trapped this time.'This cannot be.'The others were repulsed once they saw it.I was sitting just in front now.'Pierce, open it already.What are you waiting for?'There was a repulsiveness to the tone but I chose to do it anyway.I couldn't lie and say I wasn't as afraid now of what laid just behind of us.'It won't budge, I'm sorry Carter."Malkovich, help him.'Not even both of us had the strength to push it, no matter how hard we pushed or tried.A heavy object, most likely laid just above the lid.There was enough of it to hold down and dismiss our every attempt at the matter.And the hardest thing became apparent.'Look at it, wait a second now.There's no crack anymore, it's not the same stone which held that close when we were standing watch.'Carter had born both of a furious face and one full of fright.He called us both below, immediately to try to find the best course of action.One had to be as well as it came.'Whatever happens now, we have to wait for the shuttle to reach its destination and for them to open the door.We have just enough provisions to last us if we share them.Come on, put down all you have.'They emptied the three backpacks into a pile of everything they had.By now it was obvious that John tried to flee and came to the point of outsmarting us.'He must be the one standing above, the one who trapped us you know?'We were eating, at least Malkovich was, at a time like this.He was eyeing Carter as if everything which happened here was his fault and none other.I started feeling the same in a way.Even as he changed another one in the lamp, this made us both nervously mad for some reason.We stood just in front of him and gazed upon that tall form come even closer.In the silence that came, I turn to take a look and noticed the blood encompassed eyes Malkovich bore.'Carter, I know where John went."What was that?'He hadn't noticed either, but both of us now appeared like a pair of frightened animals.This wasn't as good as it sounded, to the point where there wasn't a certain way for us to be controlled.Rather, this would've been darker than it was.If it weren't for that light he bore.'Give me the light Carter, just let me hold it for a second."Step away Malkovich, you don't want to do this again.'I haven't noticed it, but he had his weapon, taken directly from him.That wasn't his stunner.'When?'I asked, not that it matter whatsoever, but I was just trying to take my mind away from what was hunting us.The air was getting thicker just as we waited for this standoff to begin.Sweat had run off his hand by now, and we both realised just how nervous he felt.'Are you going to shoot Malkovich, Carter?'Something bore through me as we waited.I hated it, as much as it appeared to be tainted.A force above us was playing us right there and now, and what was going to happen now?The sound of a static gun went off further away.'What was that?'From the sound of it, a couple of shots were fired, to its full force, but no human spoke a word above.'It might be the rescue we were waiting for.'It was a sickening thing, but Malkovich took advantage of the distraction and jumped like a rabid thing rather than a human at Carter's throat.He bit deep just as he unwillingly emptied a shot which successfully warmed and bored through him, just above the chest area.Not enough, at least his life wasn't about to be saved.I watched in horror as the light flickered and in darkness how the hole in his body was still alight with its edges of the fire.As it rolled down I waited, crawling towards the light.'Carter?Malkovich?John?'I tried asking for anyone at this point, at which I have received no response.There lay the body of Carter, rather pale, on the ground.Only his hand stood in the light, but frightened, I didn't touch it.Too afraid to take any decision, I stood and watched as something grabbed and dragged it into the dark.A noise that was too sick to describe now made him seem like he was never to be seen again.Now, there was only a place to hide, into the light.'Am I the only one alive?'After grabbing the lamp and saw everything we had been spread across the floor, I saw him.'Malkovich.'He was hardly breathing on the floor.'I saw it.'He tried his best to speak but judging upon the condition he was in, there wasn't any way he'd make it.'Where's the.'I looked at what I have, holding the lamp only to myself now.There wasn't anything there.'Malkovich, he took my weapon as well."Bastard.'He spat some blood in the process, thinking of the best way he could've made this.At the moment, there wasn't anything that would stop the bleeding, as we weren't ready to do what we were doing.It was maddening to stay and smell that musk and the seething heat wave which was about to come.'You see, we were supposed to go through a cold climate on our way, henceforth, we had an extra pair of leather and of fur to cover our shoulders and what not.'This hit him extra hot as he lay on the ground.'Help me with this.'I came down and lowered his jacket, took down his fur and slowly undressed him until there was his shirt.Damn it.That was a big wound, too big for him to go any longer without losing consciousness.Everything was wrong, John was dead.Carter was dead.He was going to go as well with them.'Don't.'Immediately he reacted at me walking slowly away with the light of the lamp.'Don't leave me like that, don't let him get me like this.No one deserves to go like that.'I was aware of the fact that Carter didn't die from his wounds.There was something that pulled him in the dark before he bled out.'I saw it, you didn't bite on any of his arteries, it was a flesh wound before he went down."He's alive?'He asked surprised but hadn't realised yet that the thing he saw right there, lurking in the darkness.'No.'It killed him before anything could happen.'There's no way out, if we remain we'll die, it seems, nothing else to say and nothing else to do.We got no weapons and I can't stand here and watch you bleed out.'He immediately came to a rage.'Coward.'He yelled, pointing at something.There was something he could've used to suffocate him, to cushion over his face.Anything at all.Carter had none of that and bled from a flesh wound before he was dragged into the darkness.'No, I'm going to leave you now Malkovich."Coward!'He shouted as if there was someone else there that could've heard him, but we both knew the truth.There were a few recharged on the floor which came out most likely out of Carter's corpse.There wasn't any possible way for me to change the gas without being caught.Either way, I've made my choice.'Goodbye Malkovich.'Before I could hear him should a third time, his voice got muffled immediately.I waited in one of the tunnels, just against the walls.Somewhat, I expected him to receive somewhat of a good death, seeing how much he had come to want to spend his time in this place.All of the sudden, there came a shout of pain which was born out of cruelty.Somewhere in the dark, I heard the sound of his death.His bones and spine crippled, eyes melting on some sick joke of fate which brought us here.It made me guilty, enough that I took this time and distance, as I heard him suffer to chance one of the gas ammunition it needed to go on. As for that quick motion, it was enough to go on. There wasn't any second wasted until the shout was brought down. It was written on the wall, I thought I came to a realisation, sacrifice. One word, well spoken. This, beyond the veil, I became apparently engulfed in this confusion. He had to be there, but there wasn't any mark of having been handled in any sort of way. At least, no. 'Malkovich! I changed my mind, I'll help you. Malkovich, it's me. Pierce.' There was a raised mound of dirt, standing in one of the passages. Taller than it had ever been. Not only that, but that thing was supposed to be the empty one with the mark of a tall body. Now, it was filled, enough for three bodies to lay. 'I need to get out.' Just as I turned, it stood in the way. Not for an instant, not for a moment, but stood there, tall and whitening. Its face was that of a dumb primate, looking as if it had discovered something. Black with small eyes, somewhat of a grin which missed that thing which stood above its teeth. I couldn't realise whenever it was a grimace of anything else. But what I came to understand was the fact that it needed to go through. Immediately, I sprang to the side, shatteringly slow and shimmering with fear. It still waited. Before anything, I knelt and pushed the lamp in my lamp and turned away, trying to cover it with my body. This couldn't work, I knew it, but I had to try. There was darkness laying all around, but it might've known what would've happened once he grappled me and revealed what laid. After waiting a good amount of seconds, I went on and turned around. It wasn't there for now. But this ended fast for me, as I sprang right to the stairs and ran to what I could only describe as an open door for me to go through. Somehow it reached there and broke it again. Left alone, I placed the lamp on the large bench and took out a static gate. Placing it around each corner, it was set up and ready to emerge. As the lamp faded and the only entrance below was sealed, I lost consciousness. Or rather, I remember taking the conscious decision to go to sleep then and there, once I was aware that I was safe. 'You chose to go to sleep, why?' 'I was tired and thought it all to be a nightmare or something more close to the sort than anything else I've encountered.' 'Do you still believe this?' 'I don't know.' The man kept writing down his notes, everything said and recognised in my speech and patterns. It was quite obvious that he didn't care. Down there, I wasn't aware what it said, but... They say that they found me on the floor, standing next to the bottom, the only one who managed to escape. It was sealed, but the barrier had been long removed from the likes of it. The same can be said about every supply we had there and the other three of them. Why did it decide to spare me despite taking the others? I don't know and I don't want to think about it anymore. What I know is that whenever I come home, I can't stand looking into the mirror or stand into the dark. There's no other way, ever since I was released and free to continue as I've done before, I can't help but think of it gazing upon me. A tall figure, coming from behind, stalking me at night, coming to take the last body for the mould. 'God, have I told them about that?' This escaped me, as I made my way towards the gate. Three men disappeared mysteriously despite having the shuttle not being stopped during the journey. And the worst of all so far was the fact that the coffin was bought by some exquisite foreigner from a faraway land. What he got was more than he bargained for, as I'm more than certainly aware that being will once again raise itself past the confinement and haunt his new landlord. As for me, this was certainly an experience I dare not talk about anymore, to anyone as a matter of fact. Again, I have lied about the gun which was stolen from me. The only regret I had was the fact that I had only a bullet loaded by the time it bore above us. Henceforth, that's why I refused to shoot Malkovich. 'I'm sorry for it my friend, but I'm sure that whenever you go.' For one more glance at the mirror as the lights went on. 'We will most certainly meet each other once again.'

Town of dread

A thin linen thread used to keep a balance between deceits and reality, pull it far enough that you won't know what's what. It used to warm me at night, thinking about it as my eyes widened on the cracking rooftop above my head. To figure out if whenever it was there or not waiting for a proper invitation to come in my flustered home, the falling objects that landed everywhere below my quills. My leg hurt from time to time, though I couldn't never tell which one was it, neither could the people from the service when I decided to join them. But that was a long time ago and sometimes I wondered what would've happened if I decided to stay with them and overextend my period. The slight change of course that got me here, I remember that it was somewhere in the Yorks, at least before time demolished the rest of it after the strife, a hard time for many alike. I haven't managed to get accustomed with the locals, at least not initially, nor could anyone else who shared my particular situation. Even if, we seemed alike after a while. Not that I've managed to live there more than what I could call a while but well enough to know when to keep my mouth shut and what were the consequences for not doing so. Fair to say, the place that festered my mind left quite an impression on me, one that I would never forget. The way here was quite rough, especially with the harsh terrain and not being able to pass well through because of my torn out shoes. A carriage was ready to run me over as it came through the same road with no regard nor care for my safety, managing to prevent my death only by the mere thread of luck. I landed on the side of the road, covered in dirt and looking as rabid horses returned my look of disgust, mere seconds before they were ready to rush farther away and never see me again. The block of wood that was carried by them held someone inside that I wasn't able to fathom, blocked by a red cloth that did nothing to stop the stink eye that persisted through. The first thing that came to mind was how much I'd be detested by those which I'd get to encounter. And that who hid inside the lit cart, whoever decided to keep a candle inside of it wasn't in his right mind. Before managing to take off the grass, the dust and the other remains off, it vanished away leaving nothing but an eerie feeling coming out as it was getting darker. Clearly ill-prepared for this kind of hospitality and seeing how I remained alone, staring into the woods, I had to keep moving. Not paranoid, not in the slightest, I thought that someone was hiding in there, creeping and trying to find a weaken in my plan. A shoe that dropped, that was the perfect reason and solution for a small sprint, judging from its looks, it came from the caravan almost passed on me. I stared for a moment into the distance, seeing how it was abandoned, with no one around to hear me shout. No one to help me still in case something happened. Doubtfully I couldn't be aware of all directions, as I barely managed to hold my composure after almost being run over. And now it was much worse than that after not being sure of what could I expect of it. "Huh?" The cold wind felt like daggers thrown in my back and for a second there I could've sworn. That it was more than a wind, it felt like a breath, despite looking around, there was no one there. "Is someone there?" No one responded, I turned around and held it tighter, the boot, something I've almost not remembered. But the most peculiar thing, though not what I've seen, the markings on the boot were written or appeared to be written by someone who had no knowing of the spoken language. At least seeing it that way somewhat kept me from thinking of what laid around trying to get me. Focus, the voice inside of my head told me as nails almost pierced my neck, uncut and nails raised up high. Damn scribbles with sagged ink, someone even had the discourtesy to cut some of the note in bits. The weather and my now swollen leg couldn't have come at the worst time. It distracted me from the silent and the fashioned path I was taking, strangely how it was the province and they'd usually be full of people. Anything would've done, anything other than the ripped branches and the thought of seeing things. I was starting to be affected my something, ugly dim beetles flying on the sides before going away after reopening my eyes. My throat was parched since I've not had a drink, the dehydration might've come sooner than expected, taking an unasked toll. A blessing in disguise, it took me away from the guise that hid in the forest, standing alone not far from my location. One bridge but that was enough for both of us, with my steps being replicated by another one that wasn't too far behind. A blessing I thought, of a good sign, the first plank was taken away, something under too but I couldn't see well enough. Since the sky itself blushed in the darkest night, with torches lit by far, a small town from the looks of it, not much about it but glances were enough to make me seek refuge in there. My head was hurting, the worse headache I've encountered before, a grasp that held me stolen in the middle of it. The bridge I stood it seemed to be taking a piss on itself too, something that wasn't my fault nor did I thought such rubbish could infect me. "Damn." I said, thinking that no one would be able to hear me, that my words would be wasted on ears deaf. While stuck in there, between the crossing of the roads, the lungs of mine started acting out, giving me a feeling of blown smoke out of them, one that would come from a fire full of coal. Couldn't say how much time was spend in there but something was coming at a fast rate. Whispers that were being thrown, trying to mock me, I couldn't figure nor did I care, who was popping them out there. I acted on impulse despite that, and it ended up being a mistake. "Who's there? Show yourself you damn rascal!" A damn brat from the town, I should've known that someone would come to take a piss on me, even worse than the bridge. I looked around despite not seeing him, he had to show his face at a point or not, the gates of the town were getting ready to close too from the likes of it. Getting more dangerous wasn't something that I planned for, that's why I decided to turn around and pay him later, he had to return to the same place after all. As for, I've decided to take my chances with the cobbled bridge and shaking teeth like planks. "Is someone here?" I asked, thinking on how my eyes deceived me, not that the time was on my neck, draining on itself along the sweat. The boot was in the other and my devotion to the cause, not asked for, still pushed me with steps to could, the handwriting has gone and my sweat being thrown along everywhere. The fever kicked in by then and it got worse from that point on. "I've no time to waste, coming closer will only get you hurt!" A yell without looking back, I was too busy shoving my hand deeper into the boot, tattered inside laying a skin that wasn't supposed to be there. One of the planks was putrid and fiendish, my foot going through its foundation with no trouble whatsoever. Slowed down, I started bleeding, small sticks and chips punctured my skin, making me release a lament short lived. It was even worse as I ripped the plank apart while pulling my leg through, without giving a concern about anyone that would've seen me do it. The fire had been waiting and so was they, I was well aware of it and in no other circumstance would they keep the gate so openly vague. Now sprinting, I knew nothing except when to stop. With my bloodied leg and following whispers steps, they wanted to make me hear and be flattered by how well they were imitating me. The path ahead was clear and it started snowing, looking below was the farthest I was going to go as I saw what I was leaving behind. A trail of blood, so thick and ugly, it was coming from me most likely. The torches ahead were getting close to bursting in cinders and spread ahead, whatever their reason was, something made it worth it. To risk having an entire town join the fire made me think that there had to be a good reason for it to be like that. Each step made helped to throw it off, the ill-will of the trickster that wanted to have it done to me. The breath I held in almost popped out as I arrived in front of the gates with a tired body. "Come in while you've still a chance!" He said, landing ahead and pulling me through, roughened up and almost the same way as I. The way must've been full of mist since I did not see him on the way, but what I did see. Gates of wood, as tall as they came, pulling themselves from right to left. So sickly, the trip on the way made me feel abruptly and out of order, nothing in my body made sense and parts were numbed down to the core. Below me, a puddle of salt so much has gotten in my blood. The same hand that pulled me in, it came to lightly and fast to help me lift myself and place upon my feet again. So many of them, strangely ridden and dressed, wearing feathers and acting in a strange manner than I could ever imagine. Others were even worse as their mouths were sewed to prevent them from talking, though not advised, from the way they stared at me, with fright. The one who helped me was different, in contrast to them being so tribalistic, he wore the simplest grabs. Expensive fabric would be too simple to be said, not to mention how clean he was and kept them. Old but not as them, he wasn't from this place either at least that's what I could gather without having to stare too much without saying anything. "Oh thank ye' for bringing my boot. I thought I'd never see it." "Of Course. "I handed it to him and somehow missed, despite being the only one so vaguely dressed, he missed a boot like I was wearing. Almost the same size. The boot was none of my concern now as the feeling of unbalance moaned through my body even as we spoke. "It's getting cold, come one, we should get in." He pointed towards the biggest house, his hand going through the crowd, stacked to see and check. People have gathered around yet away from one another, refusing to approach and talk to me. And I had no idea why, even as I took the initiative, they seemed to be getting away as I did the opposite. "Don't mind them, they're just scared." "Of me?" I asked him but he gave me no answer. I saw it in their eyes too, which made me wonder what was so intimidating about me? Everything I did, acted and dressed was made to hide who I was, as I knew for sure and it was confirmed. No one like those who came to serve. "Wait here, don't enter until I call you in." He said before deciding to go in alone, taking the carpets that were supposed to be the doors away. I turned around to almost see a flock, all of them almost cornering me as if I was their prey. Not sure what to say, I decided to look above as everywhere else was obscured by their bodies. To my surprise, it wasn't snowing, nor was the cold air coming. A mere distraction that worked, I was the first to turn back and see them look above. "Are you trying to make a fool of me?" I asked and immediately felt the backlash as they turned to face the impertinence shown by them. They flocked just and birds, acting as such until one approached me. I wasn't sure what to make of it as some were still scared despite trying to go around, all but one. He was buffed, the belly unbuttoned made him look like an ostrich walking with his tail between his legs. Before being able to open his beak, I was interrupted again by what I was doing. "What are you people doing now? Come on, break it up." He managed to come and throw the dust covering him in all directions. "Snow again." I said after one flake managed to fall on my hand and take my view away. He didn't hear nor would he have cared, as he passed me, with a swinging motion of his hands, they all started walking away giving no thought nor entertain his thought. Even their supposed leader backed away with his flock at the sight of him, now fully dressed. "Damn people, they forgot how to act. Are you all right, did they touch you or anything?" "No, I'm fine. But they haven't given much to pounce on, even if they seemed like they were." He rubbed his cheek and lead me in, away from those harpies running by. The place was dark and then lit, the likes of which I've never seen before. A light like not encounter, at least not in any other place than a field of battle. Such a burst just popped out, revealing with her blind eye. I stood near him at all time and didn't dare question until now. "Who is she?" "Wait a second." "Nevermind, I'll ask myself." Just past his shoulder, I got closer to her to finally find out, after being thrown so many times now. "Listen." I said the fire got close to melting my breath. "I just need to know what's that outside. And why are those people dressed in the most peculiar fashion." "Sit down and listen." Her voice threw me off, my feet and more, I underestimated how I felt. "No, don't come, If he wants to know he can sit and listen." I didn't notice but she signed him off, making him leave despite not being able to see where he was. Turn all of the sudden that I did not notice how fast she approached me opening my mouth before I could grab it, using the other to pour a liquid stricken right through a pair of leaves embraced together. I choked on it but on the side, as she pulled herself away. "What did you Wha did you do to me?" She answered soon, after pointing down for me to see. "For your leg." "You could've said." "And you could've listened." A fair point but I've had worse than that. I was sure to let her know of that if it wasn't for a slight of change, the shards, the sticks and whatever else stuck in there got pulled away. Shocked, I backed away as they were pulled into the fire adding forth a slight change of colour. "What was that for?" She ignored me as she went on, trying it with her tattooed hands, going over the fire. Strange, her eyes were white but almost coloured, I swore I was able to see something reflected, almost close to being projected in her eyes, giving them a shade of red. I haven't noticed until then when, after getting defensive, but everywhere around objects being places and hid, ritualistic in nature or so did I think of it. Flutes, sticks, stones, the kind that were found on that bridge too. "Ballaska amashur barra." "Stop it, you've got some explanation to do woman!" I tried shutting her off but that didn't work. My gaze kept venturing around then back to her, keeping me away from noticing. Blood on those objects, the smell reeked quite awful. She kept throwing so many things into the fire and it was getting too hot to stay. "Wait." She finally stopped, right as I grabbed a part of the rug, almost tearing it up in pieces. "What is it? Haven't you done already?" "I merely tried to ask of you, that's all. Though if you don't agree with it, you're free to leave at any time, though I do not guarantee of your safe pass." "Is that a threat?" I asked but was given a silent answer, I swore to her and soon left after, leaving her to her insane ramble. "Damn it" My lungs were almost shouted outside of my body and I felt like I was going to die, threatened by their looks. They've done a great job reminding me of everything I felt before, seeing them as my enemies. Some were scared, others backed, knowing that the meeting did between us didn't turn out well. Their feathers rustled and even with the torches lit, I passed by and approached the gate. They did seem colder but I was stopped. "Wait a minute now, you don't want to go there just yet." "Listen, I don't even know your name." Though I kind of knew I could trust him, the smirk, the greyed hair despite being young and even his ever growing beard after. Either was his look, ragged clothes or the fact that the circumstance made me like him but I decided to go on with the guts. "I'm. Trying to protect you." Yet he refused and I might've taken it too harshly, well endowed by his lack of respect and a better decision to trust me with his name. I looked down then back at him, trying to figure him out and what he did. Not that hard, even with the flock standing right behind him, though he did take his time pondering on what was to be told. "Are they always like that? I mean from your time spent here." A simple banter that could've or might've helped. He was the only one, being fair about it, which I could have with. "They'll grow on you. Listen." He didn't take the initiative to open the gate and perhaps I was in a rush to make the decision of leaving on such a cold night. Yet he asked me that. If I'd be willing. "To spend the night? Come on, it's too cold and getting worse, especially with what's out there. I've seriously considered since I had to get accustomed to them, looking around and seeing their architecture, their small houses with hidden wooden, ready to resist a fire. No wonder they were so daringly lighting up those torches, so many of the sides, burning harder now than ever." Fine. "I pat him on the shoulder before continuing my exploration, telling him next. "But I'm not sleeping in the hen." We had a laugh from that, at least I did. Some comfort was brought though not enough from it, returning to the flock with their flying feathers, it was getting too late. And I was slightly afraid of what laid in any of their houses, especially with all the silence they seemed to share. An open house, I'd get to share a room with him. "Wait a minute." I told and he nodded. No one was watching from what I could tell, everyone retreating to their places. Strange, no wounds on my leg, nothing like that, no perforated skin, no mark. "Are you coming?" He asked me before pulling the round door, feather on his ankles and more. "I'll meet you there, just keep the place lit." I trust him not to bother me anymore as there was still a score to settle at least until the coming morning. Deciding that perhaps it was a good decision to go back and ask her, I opened the place to find her waiting. The fire settle and the misty smoke lifted itself up, an opening above. The moon was just there ready to open its feverish mouth and inahle it on the wrong track. "I should've have acted that way."I told her that and I was sorry, for everything said and done in fury, I knew better than that.Normally I did, but everything so far was so unexpected and I was unprepared to deal with."There's nothing to forgive."Yet I saw there was, a mark on her hand, have I touched her before?"Have I?"But I stopped, unable to remember if that was caused by my or not, I wasn't going to make a fool of myself again.I sat down, another invitation that was responded."You.May explain."""The reason why you're here, is that what you wonder?Well."She told me the reason behind, needing those shards and pricks coming from someone who was lost for a ritual.A second look and there was no blood on the objects, laying everywhere in another order."Right, but what does that mean?""You needn't know."Her eyes were shining and only with the help of the moon, for some reason after, I felt lighter.She kept a grin and nothing more, her eyes now shallow I didn't know.I left again to finally join him, feeling some pain in my chest, almost as if something was taken from me.Whatever was in the drink didn't seem to last and with each moment passed, I thought about what did she really slip inside of it, poison or anything of that sort.Strange, after leaving.I never remember seeing a black feathered one, his skin paler too, even worse than I thought.He stared at me as I just managed to get some composure and hold myself.No one around nor on the sides, to see me nor to help in case something progressed farther than expected.A simple manner I thought at first, surely it would just be another one of them, harmless.And even If I were to be wrong, my training had to finally come in hand."Can I help you?"He gave no answer but a deeper stare, not to mention that he was doing something else.Behind his back something in his hands, it could've been anything, henceforth I refused to approach any closer than where I stood from.The back pain never left, I noticed how he still refused to move his lips even though he was somewhat like the rest of them.Silent and afraid."I won't hurt you."And I became rash, deciding to open myself to him without expecting any consequence since my decision didn't seem to be dire.As I approached, he did too, finally deciding to heed my call.Both of us were slow and steady, taking it as it seemed to be.Not longer as a situation where we'd meet and tell, I felt threatened and unable to back down from the provocation at hand.Despite not having something to defend myself with, other than my arms, the training received after so many years should've come on in handy.Close enough, some sticks laid below.Their clicks were audible after stepping onto them, enough to make him slightly look down.Luckily, he didn't see rip a part of my cloth from the back of my shirt.I held it inside of my fist, clenched to hide it, this was going to do.He saw me stop and he did too, having nothing to intimidate me with, he finally snapped from the dull waiting."AAAAAAAggh"I shouted at him as he revealed his knife while the expression on his face and overall became a paler white.A blunt knife not sharp enough, yet it wasn't enough to stop it, the scream and what not.Jumping for the neck, I used the cloth in time, drenched in sweat and twisted for some resistance, I managed to block the knife inside of it and hold it there.With a foul motion, I threw a punch, holding on the dull knife with a drench and glance.Still no one around, I had to be sure.I kept flailing at him and couldn't stop.He fell on a knee covering his face with a hand, the other wouldn't."Let go of the knife."I said, unable to take his hand off, seeing how the blood ran down his nose and mouth, made me wonder still.How come he hasn't passed out?A kick in the jaw and he almost fell to the ground, still holding the knife as if his life depended on.That stopped him from falling over but still there."What's going on?"A second of panic and felt a slip.I look to see the circled light come out with him behind, blocking a huge chunk of it on the way.We looked in confusion and for a second I did not remember.I felt a shock and thought of it only as a moment.As I turned back to see, shaken and barely holding his arm still. The other side yelling and rushing to come to me. "Nooooooo." I heard and didn't last, his voice faded away, I was stabbed. The shock, the pain delayed, I finally managed to. With the help of both my arms and the will to hurt, I twisted his arm and broke his bone. He didn't scream but seemed to be in the motion, finally fallen to the ground and leaving me only with the present. The knife now shoved deep inside of me, held my mine and his after coming to my rescue. "No. No. No." He kept repeating in, entering in a state of panic, I haven't felt such a thing before, it felt so new. The shout and his scream, though. It managed to wake everyone up to come and see. "We need to go. Fast. They'll seek retribution for what you've done." His voice and head were both spinning and I still haven't fully realised it, what was happening to me since I decided to come. Almost like a limp, I have dragged away, the gate now locked as if it was made of metal. No wood, just melted steel, screaming and black, tall as the sky. "Am I seeing? Are you s..?" I couldn't ask if as he was busy, trying to find a way. "There, the lever." He said as he found it but it was too hard to leave it alone. My strength leaving me, I hadn't realised I had a wet cloth pushing on my wound, not realising when he gave it to me. "Come on, they're not out yet." He became so haunting and repulsing, his teeth were stricken and just like the gate in appearance. I had not to choice but to limp there, pulling onto the wooden bars with no steel. Not looking into his direction, the smoke rising from the biggest house wasn't any longer. I didn't know but that compelled me to look back and reminded me after seeing a small fraction of a gust of smoke be. A whisper from far, stored inside of it, a memory that was forgotten, not meant to be. "Done, come on." He let go as did I, and just in time as doors were starting to get open. With another embrace, I counted the last, he helped me get out and not look back. "Gah" Each step made me feel that way as the pain finally got to me, we flew through the gate and saw them irate, the cold got in devouring their once living flames that were keeping them safe. "Don't look behind, whatever we do." The landscape was brighter than before I came, the snow settled in already. I could see my breath in front of my eyes, rippling towards the sky. And I held my chest tighter as he did, looking below only to find a trail of blood that would lead to me. I wasn't sure and did not know how much could I survive, with no proper help and nothing to keep me together. Getting desperate I asked of him without a chance, thinking of alternatives but there was none. "I'm going to bleed to death and will die abandoned, we. We can't make it." I had to stop and hold my breath, going on soon after the small break, foot following the other. "We have to return." But he denied my call, giving me a repulsing look, an insulted nook for what I've said, thinking that I was insane. "I'm not going back, are you insane? They'll kill us both once we're there. No, our only option is to go forward, just keep it tight, everything else, we can take care of it." I nodded being the closest fool. He did not know and neither have I, what lurked beyond us, whispering on the side. He heard it and we were now too far, reaching to a point with no regard for the other. His grip got looser and I felt it took, as we were far away, where the bridge would've been, now it wasn't. He abandoned me with no word nor loss. I fell in the snow as I was pushed, he tried saving himself despite being too late. "Gah." I left out another one, giving my location, it was already too late as it was getting closer. No sight of the one who left me, I knew too well that he was gone. "Damn bloke." I said as I pulled myself closer to pick it up. "He forgot his boot." Something to warm me as it got too cold, even if the thought of him running through the snow with one bare foot and another lost took that away from me. A moment of peace despite laying in a pool of blood and water, I stared at it, seeing it coming. A looming blanket of smoke, creeping about and pulling itself forth. I couldn't see it well but it came from where he went, it didn't take me either to figure out what his fate ended up being. Nothing but a circling black swarm, the stink was coming big. Repelling trail of guts where so big and moving around, the only part of it that wasn't covered by the black swarm. I turned on my back, still holding the boot that brought me here, I yelled at it again but it didn't work. "Baaaaaaah." Again, that was done and it called a change, repelling some of the inhibitors of the black swarm. So much blood, it made it blurry, the boot dirty and it was hard to move. I knew it got cold for it too. I saw something grabbing its guts, perhaps its hands, perhaps not. So much darker, darker than the snow, before losing my consciousness. It threw at me, the other one, his other boot that I did not like. I woke up, feeling obnoxiously sick, throwing up in every direction I could see. Confused, I had to take a moment to regain, I saw the strange room I was in and felt array. My feet felt lighter but that did not matter, seeing how this felt all too familiar for my liking. The placements of some objects and a set of feathers on parts, not too much of a giveaway until I looked and gasped at the sight of it. The door was round and I heard a shout, I rushed to the door to witness it again. My eyes widened and I couldn't look, I saw myself struggling against a fight I couldn't win. Ready to shout, I grabbed my mouth with both of my hands, stopping it from going about. Immediately after I went back and closed the door, repelled and dropping with my back against the cell. I couldn't move, my body froze, I heard myself scream whilst trembling near the door. My guts drew lower as I heard, it somehow managed to get the best of me and hear my call. My own voice yelling and shouting to stop, I heard every swipe and insertion of the blade inside of me, just as I was restlessly afraid to come and see. It felt so real, having the same voice as me. I remained too frightened to open my mouth and check for myself if I remained the same or not. And with a last one, twisted inside, I heard the blood pop out, the oranges ripped, the vultures all came outside to see. All of the doors but one, a silence came after. My heart was pounding so fast, as for myself there was no aftermath, they were approaching. Exhaling and inhaling the gases made, I closed my eyes and prayed it away. The door must've hit me and it continually did, it was getting cold again. I refused to do anything else than stand and feel the pain of the hardened wood stricken against my back. And yet so cold again, it grew so colder, was that the death of me now I wondered. The feeling change and my back felt heavy, I finally decided to open my eyes and see for myself. I was standing on a river, close to being frozen solid. Again, having to deal with myself, a strange thought, I didn't speak but realised, above of me. The single rays of light of what I was holding, a bridge wooden, heavy and unyielding. My lips shattered, and my feet was stuck in the water, seconds after noticing I saw what I did. The bridge penetrated by my own foot. I should've opened my mouth and warned myself but I refused to. Too late but it made no sense. He couldn't have been under the bridge, I was somebody else. And I couldn't figure out, I was bare feet, my body intoxicated with the smell, those guts and others were slightly above. It stopped there, I didn't remember this. But there was no light anymore, not above nor the sides, I saw inside of it, the corpses that sprung. Eyes still open, I looked at them and they looked back. The wood started cracking, the stone crumbling, the plank with a big hole inside of it was the first to fall. My skin was rotten, those insects as coal, they entered my skin, my mouth my nose, make me as their nest before being crushed under the heaviness that ripped the bridge apart. The pain was indescribable and I couldn't scream, kept alive only by my desire to do so. It took a while, walking its feet, too dark to see, to note and to be. My hand was the only one I could feel, barely so, the rest of my body was dead or in a worse case. Feeble to any attempt, I was trembling at the sight of myself again, he looked like me. I couldn't do anything about that but watch as they entered me. Two hands came after and held my eyes. They were mine, I removed them to see, revealing her standing and observing what I was doing."What's happening?"Stunned but shaken, I looked around checking my body, feeling my limbs, gurgling blood and spitting it as it seemed.I was naked, having to cover myself only with my hands.To watch afraid as she approached, possibly to harm me or feed me to her pet.Unable to do anything but listen, she offered me something else.A small pair of wings, of feathers, given as if to a fella."You're one of us now.Shhh."She prevented me from talking.I couldn't talk as she was watching, I couldn't do anything anymore to my liking.My head hurt, my stomach squirmed at the sight of the gates opening.They didn't seem so bizarre anymore nor have I.

Tower

Repugnant blood come back to me, grant me the power soon to be. I looked upon the dreaded stone, the sand and skulls resting below, of me the scene of a greater conflict that wasn't about to end, neither could I even thinking of it another way than the one that was. The embodiment of me raised from the ground, eruption and spewing my fragrant scent of bloodied gravel as it was enveloped by it caused by the eruption it caused. So ugly and repulsing, the way it moved was disgusting. A face that needed not a body to lift itself in the air, devouring birds as they came by, its repulsing skin blowing at their near-sight moment before being swallowed. Such a fiend and I were connected, in thought and body as I called to it so it would come and join me once again. 'Make me whole again.' I yelled and it answered, being pulled towards me, blood floating through the air, calling for me to undertake on, the transformation that awaited once we were whole. No hands to grab me nor a pair of feet to run away once we were done, there wasn't any chance for it to change its mind and drag me away from it, permanently bonding us never again to be separated. The scream and its flagrancy grew thicker, the sand resting now melted away as the boiling blood was pulled, from its body, calling itself closer to me to enter. I saw and smiled as did it. The blood and skin melted, becoming as dust as many more gaps were made because of it puncturing and pulling itself through the body. A skull that floated soon destroyed, making the rest of my once pure liquid that was stolen come back to its rightful master. 'Aaaaaaag' I tasted it as it came back, floating through the air after being impaled by it, looking through my red hands as they were covered in the liquid, renewing itself in the way meant to be. 'What?' The ritual was not completed but soon I realised that someone was watching me undergo of it and refreshing what was meant to be had inside, to be taken away by eyes that weren't meant to see. I fell on the ground breaking it under, cracks that would've let anything stronger in a worse condition as it were. Feeling how my veins were full, blessing the sky for letting me get the chance to get closer to receiving it back, every little ounce that I've lost. The chains holding me broke loose under my arms that grew, the mass, the muscle and even the hair grew thicker as my body grew closer to its original state. 'As to you, the watcher that tries to see. Huh?' A woman and her animal companion, it ran away at the sight of me, partially blinded by the light, I couldn't directly pinpoint but know where she was going. 'I can't let you warn them of my presence!' And neither was I intending to, following in the steps of her, left into the crying dust, slow, even for one such as her. I wasn't inhuman but not weak enough, I lowered my arm to reveal the bow I was holding and whilst running and chasing I bent it open to its full wideness to be seen. The arrow of metal slightly opening a wound through my fingers, cutting the light in half, reflected in the polished metal, it blindsided her as it went right through. 'A direct hit' I said after seeing her bent, with an arm standing down, her companion dog pushing her away. She wasn't dead but bleeding away, repulsing poison that I avoided, following her track and the one left of the companion of hers, none one could find out that I was alive, no one indeed. Another arrow loaded, even worse than the last, my wounds couldn't heal without proper care, risking an infection with each one taken, followed by another using cut followed by yet another strike through. 'Damn it!' The dog had scratched it, through the clutches of my attempt, sinking its teeth in the-the hardwood and breaking it in half. I hadn't any choice anymore that was sure, seeing the image of my blood running forth, landing on its nose. 'I'm sorry but this has to do!' Too far to be heard, I had to act, after getting my scent, I wouldn't have anywhere to hit if they managed to get the town next to the proximity, my arrow had to land to its vicinity. A shot that flew through, none of them expected it as it turns its head to see, how I managed to be the death of thee, hitting through and piercing the heart. I saw her finally stop, holding in her arms. There wasn't any need for me to run but slowly approach, seeing her cry from one and bleeding from her other eye, no weapon and a dress that used to be clean. Crying over a dead animal that was worth nothing, it made me ask her. 'Is this what your life's worth? The one of a dead animal?' She was afraid I saw it in her eye, barely working too, meaning that perhaps she wasn't meant to die, at least what the tradition required. I asked her and once did I. 'Leave now and never return to that town. Your life's now forfeit to the one above so make your peace on the way.' She didn't respond to my address, though my young blood managed to give me back some years, my anger and scorn remained with, deciding that I'd be a better host than any other. I turned my back and did it too, she tried running with him, in the same direction, deciding to step on what I've said. She gave me no choice but to raise it there, to point the bow, and release my final arrow. Turn around, back to face me before it was over. She understood then as the path was blocked, an arrow that managed to break even the small fragments of dust and sand that were floating through the air, with a precision that couldn't be questioned. A nod of the head and another path taken, she refused to now return to the place that was once shaken. A dead eye and the lack of a companion should've sealed the deal but I was not convinced that it was worth it, a few arrows wasted, I threw it away, having to resort to using the bow to another side. And the night was coming too, a cold one too, my food supplies were running out but I hadn't need them anymore, after being so renewed, the ground shaking under my metal boots. A knight shook, my sword was bending, almost falling under its own weight, cutting through the cloth that kept it seated. Alas, I was finally arriving home, and even as the hair under my beard started falling as did the one over my head regained its colour, I have finally done. Regain control over the life of my again and in the sky, I saw a reflection, the map and the entirety of the land, knowing that somewhere, everywhere, fragments and shards, embodiments of myself waited. Waited for me to come and finally claim them back. The tower beckoned for me to come, singing and climbing itself above, trying to reach the sky and call to me, brick after brick that helped it raised it. I've gone through this desert long enough, it is time for me to make my return. Four years of wander and seeking for this and now it would get to pay off, I was returning home and the thought of me bringing something back with me, something of such importance has surely changed me. And the change was about everywhere. Ravens in the sky, that beckoned at it, the lord of the tower waiting with his silken sheets and oafs that waited at his gate, drowning in the river. As a servant came, kneeling forth to his master, all of it just to ask a single question that's long been waiting, almost an announcement of sorts that was brooding about waiting to get out and be asked. 'What is it? Can't you see I'm busy.' A neck was scorched, almost as much as the candle and the limped was that was rubbing off the parchments that were being read by him, he turned to see him carry the usual wine. He stopped and marked for him to do the same, not trusting his intention, he felt something inside, that grabbed and pushed off him to ask of his daring servant that wasn't seen before. 'Who are the? I've not seen you before and my memory's unrivalled.' He checked his servant but soon was stopped, from the opening in his oxidium tower a raven came, flying in a flock and as he saw, an opening in his mouth left out what thoughts feared. 'Ah, how lovely, a murder of crows appeared. A bad sign, one indeed.' 'What forth are you coming near me crows? Can you not see either that I'm busy?' They gave me a smile, not enough for me to repay them, even if their task was small, scouting everywhere around, I told them fair, don't return uncalled forth unless utterly necessary. I said again, holding my prow, nobody moved as I spoke to them, standing in front of me, flailing about with a scroll randomly. 'Craw Craw. Craw Craw Craw.' The crows wouldn't amass for any reason at all, making this the most peculiar of the situations wondering and not for long. 'Someone's coming!' 'Craw Craw Craw' 'Servants, go down as fast as you can, bond it to your feed and leave it ahead, don't let anyone get out and no one in until further instructions.' I threw him a scroll, which he caught, placing it in his pocket, something that didn't bother me despite the clear instructions, dealing with him later would be the best. For now remained to wait in my crumbling tower, glancing around to see for who was going to bring the challenge, unless. 'No, my scrolls.' Panic arise, I had no meaning to wonder about the rest of them and even if my fate would have to succumb, I had to grab and make sure all of them would be safe. 'My scrolls, my papers, my entire work, all would come to ruin if someone came forth.' The door slammed, destroying all the dust, everything in its path, scaring the rest of the servants and missing my chance. 'Damn' I whispered after making sure no one would see me, no one could figure that I wasn't a servant nor what was intended to fall upon their master, not that they'd care much for, knowing how he treated them. 'Are you coming?' 'On my way.' After that quick response, I was on the run, to avoid any suspicion as I wasn't here for long, not staying nor did I arrive and yet I had to act the same way as them. Body bent and head down, I ran down the stairways acting like them, thinking about the renown I'd get for slaying him, slashing his throat and draining his self-esteem as his blood would run down his throat, leaving forever. Almost knocked out of my thoughts, I stopped in the middle of the hall to grab some of the pots and goblets that were almost on the floor, saying and admitting to my fellow in need of help. 'I'm sorry, that was close.' Keeping it short and quiet, hiding my accent and possibly who I was, for the time I spent here, she seemed to be quite perceptive. And quick too, she grabbed them mid-air preventing most from reaching the floor, all but one. I avoided at first and wasn't that fast, without wanting to raise any suspicion nor show what would've been done otherwise. 'Oh come on, I've just washed that spot. Grr.' She seemed enraged by my action and even more I thought as I was in a hurry to do what I was told, acting sole, on my own and saying to her, thinking we'd see each other this last time. 'I'm sorry but I'll make it up to you.' I would, knowing that she was most likely pinned to the wall too by her malicious master, fantasising on the way on how she'd gnaw his white pearls and beard. Inappropriate to say the least, looking back to it, she was the daughter of a priest, making even worse to become the servant of someone like that, making me sick even more than that. That damn bloke that passed by. 'Pah. I bet he won't even keep his promise and..'. A note, dropped, fallen below. The least he could do is follow what he's told, the seal on it made it so clear from where it came from and what was the intention behind and the one written on. Three tasks ahead and everyone seemed to be in distress for a reason, even if they refused to tell me what it was, cleaning, delivering and picking that note were enough to keep me distracted. Though, I wondered if I dared, after leaving the small carrier plate with all the drink of sorts, some tasting well, others, heh. Not. But what was written, really inside of the scroll that fell, I wasn't sure if it meant what I thought it did, there was no one behind nor in front for me to lie about it and tell otherwise. Just a glance after unwrapping the seal, throwing away, even if I got caught, I knew who to blame. So slow it went, the time of watching over them and how it would uncover itself, the deal and the conflict. I stood there, hidden, away, with my small construct to see and watch over how the death of him, perhaps not was going to be found out. 'I'm glad I trained you, my friends.' And from my pouch it came, a string of seeds and parts that tasted well, I gave it to my friends the crow, to leave me alone for now before they would be needed again. A leather on the device, the glass was quite expensive, enough to almost not justify anything if it weren't for such a wonder, to see anything and everything around me. The distance not well, my suit still covered in sand, someone was coming towards the tower, strong did he seem and more than just one of the way, perhaps with a companion too. Either way, someone was following in his footsteps, friends or foe, whatever it was, I was so sure, the one above the rest, waiting in his tower raised up high with his sacks all risen to the ground, he had no care. Messing with his scrolls, one of them even got close to being dropped outside of the wall. A castle raised up high, rivalling only the crying tower that was seen through the looking glass, cutting through the night and blowing the dark as the lenses changed position so I could see well. Luckily for me, my cloak was enough and with the cold of the night, I wasn't burnt in the rug that was on my body, hiding my presence just as much as I managed to train the crows to do my bidding and distract whoever would want to notice me from far. The castle must have a king, one that'd care for its people and somehow I wondered, why is it that he never sent anyone, no guards nor warriors to fight, the rivalling might that was brewing something in the tower. Anything that would save or spare his life, ascended and afraid, he knew too well that his end was coming, not on a horse as I so sorrowful through to be dead, abandoned on the way, from the looks of his armour, that seemed to be moulded with his skin. He was someone who'd sacrifice anything to get what he wanted, farther away, pushing his body and abandoning any relinquished hope that there'd be humanity in him. And yet so young, yet so bold, not knowing that he was rushing through his death at the hands that were to him unknown. And close I was, I could taste it, the rubble that was crawling at the feet of it separated only by a bridge not weary, barely lifted moments ago. 'Damn they knew!' I almost shouted, mad, looking above of me, the shine of the moon and the reflection that sent itself into the water on the bridge, just to add its taunting baffle. 'How did they know I was coming?' Disturbed and distracted, I looked behind and saw no one, though swearing, someone could've possibly been following me. Regardless. I turned to it and made a bold statement, shouting as he came close, looking through directly into my face. Was this the one coming to attack me and destroy my work? A smile came to my wrinkled old face, my white hair almost bloomed at the sight of the youngest for I'd get to face, not even old enough to take a piss alone yet he somehow decided. 'To come and end, to attack someone like. I was stuck at the sight of it as hid boldness almost pierced me, running as fast as one could do, charging forth even if. 'The bridge was pulled, are you insane?' As I asked, I came forth to look, seeing my sea serpents and fish alike, gulping and shaking their foreign spikes in addition and for the waiting, their fourth walking meal was coming even sooner than supposed to. He didn't care of my banter and ignored all the warning presented, not to mention that all of them would've been in his favour. My eyes widened, almost popped out, even at the slight of change and sound of a door opening behind my back, someone decided to disturb me yet I was too focused. 'This is impossible' I watched and saw the greatest leap I'd ever get to lay my eyes onto. 'Hold down at the door, I can't respond. Actually, hurry down and make sure it's locked, he's coming for all of us.' And before I could finish and seal my lips, I saw him achieve the greatest of feats that were ever done, he grabbed the edge of the bridge despite being raised up. 'How could this be?' And the wood almost broke, at the sight and under the power of my gauntlets, looking below revealed to me whatever was lurking in the small sea. I knew I wouldn't pass out and also that he saw me lift myself and push away as far as I could go. He knew and I did, not being able to pass through a bridge so sturdy looking and unable to lower it down. I took a break whilst still holding onto to look above and smile, he saw me do that, even more, confused that how he was before. He didn't expect, I saw it once again, time after time he'd become more absorbed of my deed and mistakes, of everything that was done against him and his property. A fist was raised and through a bash, I started breaking through, carrying off with my assault, punch after punch that landed at the bridge. 'Not so strong anymore' Despite not looking, I could taste his seething anger from where I stood, boiling even the water under me, making those precious pets of his suffer at what would be the cost of his life. Seeing how the cracks came to be, my fist protected from even the slightest possible damage that could even come close to doing me harm, instead, making the slightest cracks go beyond their size. Eight-time bigger with each timed swipe, even more from the accelerated demise that would come and go. The last one came. 'Stronger than I thought.' But I was wrong. A chunk of the big bad gate made out of wood cut from a most likely lot that was never sold after, but that wasn't the reason it started going down, I was lowered on purpose to fall and die. And below me they were starving, their teeth and tongues showing, expecting me to fall but I was too fast and prepared. I started moving as it seemed to be let to fall, to my left, holding with the strongest grip after being slammed, so close to breaking my fingers and running my hand. Slightly stopped and thrown in the air as the recoil from it reaching the other side was in motion as I did that, avoiding my fall, he screamed out-out. 'Lift the gate, hurry! Hurry I said before he comes back.' Confused but only by a slight, I started carrying myself back up to be able to avoid, repeating that once again. A swing and a miss, I landed on the bridge before it even came close to lifting itself away from the ground, followed by a roll, as something heavy came behind. I couldn't tell what he threw back nor did I care, being too far from it and already as my roll became a charge as my feet ascended from the ground. Scared they ignored me, I could see their breaths, their sweat and even saliva coming and flowing through the air, faster than them by a lot of ounces, I looked around before they even managed to close their mouths and breathe again. A gate at the tower, a smaller one, some chairs, supplies and a stable without horses? He had weird choices but it wasn't my fair, I had only my bow slightly bent, giving a shine to no end, he was up there in his tower and I didn't notice. This was out of proportion, three other towers above of me, interconnected and inside of the one I and the servants were, looking back down I noticed, two of them were being close by servants, distraction or not. I've made my choice. 'AAAAAAAAAAAAAh' A show of war that almost threw him off, unable to see or remember where he was, I've made my choice, breaking through the crates, one woman passed by. Servant or less, she didn't notice nor see, I slightly moved aside on my charge no less, using only my arm to push her out of the way. Right, of my a spading fork was thrown, stopping me from my tracks, it stopped me from breathing, a second to grab it before reaching my neck. My glance almost betrayed me and I hadn't much time to seek revenge, I only held in my the red scarf that was being worn, before breaking through the door with my arm. 'Ahh' And the door was broken. 'He came inside.' The servant was spoken. 'Who came inside?' Some people must've come, my fellow helper was stricken of words and avoided looking directly at me, all in a hurry. 'You, I've seen you before. You forgot' The paper, I know, that's not important anymore. You need to get out. I was slightly backing away, unknowing of his strange proposal, the way he was implying it. 'You're going to be killed if you don't.' The same way I might not. Also, I don't recall. Seeing you. 'He raised a knife from his pocket, shining through with his gem, a rare one, even for the master of mine. I stared at it still backing saying no word not that I dare make any move after he raised it further, being so close to him and. Chaos abrupted and everything was wrong. 'Where are my damn servants?' I asked, hearing nothing but a knock, from the other side of the door someone was waiting and listening to what I'd say, returning nothing but a complimentary hush to be followed by nothing of the sort. 'Damn you, who walks there? I'm warning you. My tower seemed to be made softer by the coming of the pretender to my life, as were my feet as the knocks continue. I'm too old to fight and pose no threat. You don't have to do this! Images flew in my hands, everything that I've ever done burnt and ravished under my nose, right before my resting corpse, burning with it one last time. Soon to be forgotten, my progress, what I've done, no one would get to know. No, don't come in. I said as I grabbed all of them, those that I didn't manage to find, those that were not mine, everything soon to be stashed inside my every hidden pocket, just so I could say to them one more time. I beg of you, I've. I've worked so hard, for what? I can't die like this. The knocks stopped and I could hear slashes, the sound of a knife being driven down, cutting down the wood that was standing as the last guardian. My servants most likely dead as no one was here to help me, or stop, even slow at least. Stomach bloated, everything around of me seemed to fluster, quotes mistaken, the scrolls that I've never got to finish and never will. The sound of the door being slammed down almost brought tears on my eyes, despite my every, plead I'd wager that my words would fall on deaf ears just to be swallowed away. Spare my work at least, I beg of thee. It's all I want, it's all I need, just that and nothing more of you. But my fear got the worst of me, the tears befell, the ink started drowning in them, the ones that were freshly made and the same ones that had the biggest of a chance to last the farthest. Then so be it, if this what it will take. I said to myself and whoever almost managed to break through the door, knowing what was going to be, perhaps there'd be a small chance if I took it on myself. As my servants saw me look back at them, all scared as was I, they barely managed to slow them down, all in vain. The light was shining from a place far, a small glimpse that someone sent towards me to see, the last moments when I would be. One time to look back, there was no way for me to defend myself, no way that the door would break, the latch falling on its own, ready to give us, the same as I. No way around, the last pieces of myself, written in drowning ink, soon to be crushed within, I didn't give another chance, as I couldn't live knowing what was done. A smile towards them, one last time, a rarity that somehow seemed to have brought me here. I leapt towards in, with my papers flying, the stack that was being held by me tightly inside my arms and the ones that I wouldn't let go not even after all was done. The lock that held the door now broken, I pushed it, finally to see, there was no one around. Am I too late? But soon distracted as I saw the wind help the curtains fly through, somewhere below, I heard the commotion, so I rushed to the window place to see. Damn, I'm in the wrong tower. On the other side, a fake most likely, I couldn't ponder on the fact that the one I took, the first choice was wrong and he was nowhere around to be. You? From the other side, I saw, someone I haven't recognised in a while. The sight of him filled me with scorn and hate, without wanting it, breaking the wooden stick that held the spade together, falling down and out of my reach. He heard me and got distracted, I thought of him and what, most likely happened, as there was no one around with him and the other tower that laid between us was abandoned. I will tear your... Gahhh. I couldn't see but something was shoved in my back, further inside, the sight of him and the shock he gave me before being pushed closer to the edge. He couldn't talk nor laugh but watch as I suffered, being overpowered after the sharp point of something strong pierced one of my vital organs. AAAAAAAahh. Twisted inside and still, no word was spoken, I was soon turned around to see. Y... You. Before being pushed through, falling as the wooden part of the arrow was taken away, I couldn't reach her neck nor anything else. The crown was horrified, moving as far as possible as two corpses joined the middle of the area they were in, still scared for their lives they wouldn't even risk their eyes after seeing the sharp edge of an arrow shoved inside. They knew they wouldn't handle, whoever managed to kill the man would've been a skilled archer, and if it ended to be as ruthless as the one in front of them, the chance of them escaping was none. All that remained was someone that fell, the wounds and the exhaustion soon befell onto her and her fate unsealed in front of his eyes. 'What now? What am I to do?' This was unexpected, so strange and peculiar, nothing so far that proven me anything else. 'You could join me then.' She said, with a voice not lowered, has she not realised what just occurred? 'No offence but I wouldn't make much of a monk.' 'I wasn't talking about the temple but of there, up north.' 'And what about them?' Both lie down there in chaos and on the other side of us, at the other tower lays a woman that's about to give out her last breath. 'She smirked on the way down with me, as we passed the bodies that were rotting, I wasn't looking at my old friend now, I only focused on what she said. Which was and I swore to remember. 'She's coming with us.'

Dirt man

Your philosophy bores me dirt man. Her hair was dark as was her fair tone, she looked at me with the deepest sneer, laughing at my self-esteem and how I was acting. 'Why are you acting this way?' I asked but she did not answer to me, she never did respect authority but who would in her position. Her spear sharp, the back laid high, she had no knowing of money nor other sights of what she believed in. 'Are you coming?' I asked her but to no purpose, she didn't give me the benefit of the doubt. I am but you're not the reason I'm coming, it's because of the good feeling I've got about you. Both of us were on the road made of the same thing as I was, going through it made it awkward, even after so much passed time, away from one another. 'Then why are you following me so? If you hate me at time, and other not, you seem to be confused.' 'No, you are the one confused about it dirt man. You don't understand how we act and what makes us thick, perhaps you may never will.' 'Nor did he seem repulsing, just as he seemed to the villagers when he arrived at the time, hated and despised, luckily for him that I remembered to ask. 'Did the rocks thrown at you hurt? You never asked me man made out of dirt.' 'Why are you calling me so?' He asked and I forgot that he might still be slow, but the reason for me, for doing so was simple. 'I enjoy seeing people mad, especially those made out of dirt.' 'He didn't smile, perhaps not getting my intention. 'It was a laugh, I don't despise you. Look, it doesn't have to be.' But stopped. In front of us, his home made out of sinking dirt, coming back to life, lifting like a mouth, its teeth held it close, it was waiting for him but I wasn't sure. 'Is it safe to enter? Or will I be buried alive? Us human, we can't breathe underground nor get buried whilst alive. Though looking around, someone came before us, the other places that had the spots taken, their houses ruined, the dirt covered in water becoming only but muck now.' 'It won't unless it rains.' 'It's good to know' I said before being carried away, trying to figure out what has happened and what occurred around in the time he spent away.'This is why you were sent?'Was your reason to seek for help?'It's too late.Now.'His sad tone wouldn't befall on deaf ears but it made sense, no rain above and no water left anywhere else, whoever came by brought the water with and drown them all.Remains of sand, pebbles and soil, defiled by.'Monsters, all of them.'I said out loud, at which he asked back with a scare on his face.'Where?'

Ssloch

A lady with a linen shroud came past me the other day, the only thing I could remember seeing between the bars of this damn cage, the rusted nails being plunged so far into them that it made me wonder how come the blood hasn't come out yet. At least the opening from my fingers, though it wasn't too late, the stream following its course and standing upon my fingers laying under it. My nose was acting up again for the countless time and I always blamed it on the height. 'Perhaps this is my punishment.' My voice echoes below, I couldn't move without making the cage swing aside, making me even more nauseous that I already was. I couldn't think of much, other than what I've already done and pitying myself to the point of falling from exhaustion, the hot bars delaying the inevitable even more. So many sores on my hand, popping out with each further push into the charged metal, relentlessly after so many attempts that left me rubbing it in for nothing. 'And I'm still so thirsty.' I said to myself and hoped that the one that guarded me would come and throw the bucket of water, breaking into the cage as it fell. 'Heh' Such a waste of good wood, it made me think, rather many time with such incompetence, how did I get caught in the first place. Waiting and waiting just to yell. 'LET me out already, curse you all. You're pretending to be so civilised but throw me to rot at the first sign of.' Agh. 'My hands repelled, I had to remove them, abandoning my point before I could even go through with it, making me feel disgusted with having to put on with myself. Of the things given up because of this, my acceptance of fate being released.' And next, you're going to tell us that you've crushed those bars with your bare hands. "I was saving that part for last." Keep bloating yourself with whatever you want, but I won't even believe your damn stories, most of which have fairly impossible circumstances, to begin with. "Like what?" She pondered on my question, a good memory insight, one that wouldn't let her forget anything right, not that she believed much of what I said to her, in the least of a standard. The fire cosy and the sky was dark, it surprised me of how she didn't like the contrast between that, especially since we were in such a cold place, somewhere far in the north. 'I know which one. When you told me that one of you swallowing a child, that was ridiculously insane and if I hadn't known better I would've slashed your belly for that.' "Whatever you say. Actually, since you're standing so high on yourself, why don't you make..". She gave a smile, a wicked one as she heard me, wicked as in thinking she was right, despite being like that. 'Ehm, why don't you recall one of your stories of deeds in the past? Wouldn't surprise me if it ended up being more boring than you retelling one of my stories.' "Right." I threw a chunk of wood into the pyre and watch a small burst occur, seeing how the ale in her hand, kept warm reeked at how much she kept it that way. 'You'd better start your story before it gets ruined, my mood wouldn't be the only one getting the way that ale went.' "Fine, then let me tell of." I was a small girl, perhaps not in the literal but the meaning that I was fairly plump and of height to be, mismatched in the town I was. I could remember walking down the streets the paved ones that seemed to be made of melted iron, filled with so many squares, clean, scrumptious. You could slide on them yet not fall, go through and not break anything in case your body was to touch the ground. All of them engraved from manuscripts, it was a wonder that many seekers from outside came to see and document themselves on any of the matter. I believe it was poorly called by some interlopers. 'The poor man's library' As no one but beggars would kneel down to ask for something, well, in this case, it wouldn't be anything else but words. 'Beggars for words?' "Yes, John, beggar for words. Now, if I may continue without being interrupted." I said to him as I stirred my ale with the tips of my fingers. Ehm. The opportunities there were always arising for both the comers and the ones that already were, I've had the chance to meet so many wonderful people. And those of not so much wonder, not as if it didn't already have some before their arrival. The corners were left in the dark as the gaps where the words were engraved didn't reflect the light to them. I have always wondered, if it was on purpose made that way or just a mistake, even if, most of the corners of the town were in the same condition as the ones like that. So dark and such turns that connected all of them, having entrances inside of houses that laid off the side, or bridges with many pillows and trinkets stolen to cover it up. A second part of the town almost, covered and hidden by the rest of us that didn't dare go and check, I was one of them once since my parents never did let me farther outside, thinking I'd go stray. 'And I suppose that eventually happen, didn't it?' "You supposed right actually. 'Since I was of age and no one would question me or what I did with my spare time and since they weren't there when I decided to do so, the thought ran through my mind. After being so bored with everything, going through the same paths, walking around the same people, time changed everything. The age of strife came and lasted until not so long ago, leaving a heavy toll that had to be paid by everyone, especially by those who lost the most. No one came around anymore, not even the scholars, they were afraid of doing anything since knowledge was forbidden, the streets covered in tar, the shine that once made the town bloom died, making the place for the other town that once hid inside of the dark. Now extend itself inside of ours, if before I was so thoughtful and curious of it, if I looked and saw a pair of eyes and might've heard people roaming and talking in the dark, now it left me afraid. So many crossed it, leaving a slight of abandonment in the city, my parents, my friends and everyone that I used to know grew apart of me. More paranoid, afraid, silent at side so the slim walls wouldn't open their ears wider so they'd listen to us on time like when we were having a dine. We never had and didn't wish for a bigger home, nor did we ask to be known by those inside of our town, by anyone around. I wanted to be left alone, in our small house that was lit, by a light that didn't come from outside but fairly it came from inside of our peaceful lamp. But ground started shaking. 'And earthquake?' "No, even worse than that. 'The house was taken below and we only had moments to grab onto anything on the wall or anywhere else before being turned, to fall on itself. An entire house was taken down and pushed to the limits and we only managed to hold ourselves together by the mere help of a lucky grip. We hadn't a choice after, many tried as we did, to avoid the side that was pushing itself inside and they heard how we tried to resist it. 'They did not like it. 'A serious glance and I could see it on his face, he was both enjoying and was slightly being terrified by the story foretold. And he didn't even get to hear the best of the part. The blow came soon after we barely managed to pull ourselves back on our feet, the roof and every side of everything being still as they first came, not ruined as they say. It went worse after that, it surely did, they held me despite being so big, both their arms wrapped around to protected me, backing away with me. And what's to be kept in mind is that there was no way out, in our backs where was the ceiling that couldn't be broken through, everywhere a mess, thing that couldn't slow them. Not that it had any chance since they managed to break through a damn house and throw in on the side. The three of us, despite being well made and perceptive stood no chance, the place in front of us, where our feet used to be got ripped apart. Pulled into darkness, slammed somewhere behind in the dark spacious spot that took it from us. If it wasn't for our family lamp that kept us safe and kept the surrounding lit, we would've been completely lost and confused, probably having to resort to crawling to have a chance to get out. Not that it helped us become less scared as we stared in front of nothing, of nowhere for minutes, and they were never people that'd back down from any challenge. This was their lowest point I've ever seen them at, their boots wouldn't even fit them anymore and the slightest drops of water hitting the ground in some place not so far from us. Everything happening outside made them shiver, yet not me. 'How old were you again?' 'It doesn't really matter, but I wasn't.' A bug flew by as was said, that being the reason for me looking away from his judging gaze, it was a story no less that I had to continue. 'Which brings us to the point. Where something actually did happen after so many teases in the dark, after so many distractions, one would lower his guard to something bigger to come and take advantage of. We weren't like that, I almost felt both of my arms get ripped as their grip grew tighter, at the point of me wondering if something would come or not so they'd release me. I soon came to regret thinking that. Two hands, old and big, we started at them as they were hidden among the rest of the body. Old and grumpy as they say, riddles with falling skin, a giant ahead, enough that the three of us combined wouldn't give a handful to the owner of such enormous fins. Ehm. It stuck with me for years after hearing it, but that came from the shadows, no pair of eyes, nothing else of his body could be seen, yet he saw us as clear as day. They rambled around in search for us, my parents slightly dodge as one flew about over our heads, making me wonder, such an amazing sight and to think that the body belonging to them. And how it managed to sneak inside of our town. 'apchoo' He searched so much, clutching and making objects fall, the dust flew inside the house and leaving me at an opening to sneeze. Those giant things moved as he was scared, the sneezing of a little girl that was protected by her parents. 'Again, how old were you?' 'Not important now, may I?' 'Go ahead.' It surprised all of us that he was scared, the entire house shook and they moved on their own, hitting the floor, the sides and even the chandelier that rested near. But the lamp remained lit despite the wind coming through, welcomed by his motion, just to be stopped, as if a fan's deceivry was stopped, no more cold inside the house. A thick voice. 'Who.' Ehm, with my throat clearer, I went at it once more. 'Who. Who goes there?' His breath came between and soon after, he took all the dust in his nose along the stench of the breath that came from him. Sounds of him coughing following after being struck on his own fault, choking on his own position as one would think. My parents weren't holding me as tightly as they noticed it too, he didn't appear so menacing at all, despite not being able to see all of it. They held me no longer as I decided to go ahead. 'Wait.' But that wasn't enough, after seeing him regain what it left him and come closer with his hands, I asked directly in his face, or at least where I thought his face was. 'You're now trespassing so.' I took a look at my parents so I could be sure I was doing the right thing, they were still shaking their hands and welcoming back, which I could fairly only take as gone on. 'I'm going to have to ask you to leave.' 'Ho Hah Ha ho. Ha, Ha Ho Hannah Ho.' He laughed in a peculiar manner, I couldn't see a grin and teeth accompanied by a tongue as he came closer to the light. A white beard, appearing old, the thing that surprised me more than what he was, how did he even get a suit like the one wearing. It was made of silk, white, red and black, more than the bloom that was coming from the back, and roots that accompanied him on the shoulder, a lure for insects that he most likely built himself. It was pointless now to stare at my parents as they were now stone frightened by what they were seeing, leaving me alone with him and the sight of happiness he was showing. 'What are you doing in our house? It's quite dark there.' 'It is.' He stopped laughing as he said it, a tear almost falling, dribbling enough water as if it came from our now broken sink. 'So.' My voice went back to falling a few notes, it felt awkward having to speak with such a sight, in front of someone who could crush all of us and take our values. 'Oh, that's right. My intrusion, tell you what. That lap so bright, give it to me and I shall leave your home.' So fluently and well spoken, his tongues moving around his mouth seemed like tokens given to those he decided to share words with. Me. 'But I cannot give it to you, not in the bit.' I came closer and held it tighter near my parents' embrace after coming close to them. 'Why is that? You've got my promise that I won't harm you.' 'The same way you ruined our house? Just look around and what you did.' I decided to confront him, now appearing more of a reckless move from my parts as that made him come closer into the light, with the part of his body that wasn't crawling. Fair being, the place was a mess, papers were thrown everywhere, everything made of glass shattered, the dust flew too but somehow the walls didn't crack. At least the ones that were not ripped apart. 'I could take it from you.' 'Then what's stopping you?' We were so close now that I could smell his breath, so small that I could fit in his nose if he decided to inhale too much and so bold that I'd decide to do something that a normal person in a situation wouldn't do. 'I challenge you to a duel?' 'What?' 'Surprisingly that's what my parents decided to ask too. And what's you're doing now with your face, the same thing my parents did, as closely as possible to their reaction.' In case you were wondering, I manage to see their and mine, along with the lamp's light inside the reflection that helped inside of his eye, almost like another world in there. And others like us staring back because we look alike. That's my child self's thought, not mine, the same one that decided to challenge a foe that's at least eight times taller, through exaggeration of course, not that had a need to be said. I saw it tough, in his eyes and mouth, he wanted to start laughing, amused at my proposal, and before I could come to regret my decision, a vision came. A flash through his eye, which made me think, what if I could challenge him to a duel other than strength, one that a girl like I would stand a chance. 'What if, I make you laugh, you'll leave our home and turn our house back to normal. And if you win..' 'I take the lap and you with me.' 'No!' My parents were immediately coming out of their shells, closer to me to stop the decision made, one in poor taste that wouldn't end up as planned. I knew what I was doing regardless of what they were thinking. 'You can't do this, we can't lose you. My mother's concerns. Who's going to bring light to this gloomy side. With plants growing on the side.' Followed by my father's. 'I have to do this for you, just trust me?' 'Not that they nor we have any chance in the matter, standing at the mercy of someone who had more strength and wits. Deciding to finally give an answer. Fine, it's a deal.' I spit and landed my hand, to which he did the same, though overdoing it, having it reach his lavished suit and almost everywhere around. The same thing happened a long time ago during a rain, well, except the giant part and it was more of a strong storm that almost flooded us instead of saliva. That's a lot more fun now than back then, despite the gentle touch as we shook on it, I hadn't known of his true purpose. Her face change as she said it, taking a short break from the almost never stopping narration. Something must've happened after, either that or. 'I'm sorry, I should go on.' Her voice was an ounce emptier than before, I asked her to stop if she wasn't having it. 'But I have to continue it, after all, that's why we're here, right?' Almost like a man woman glancing around and going through, almost like a shaman to his fire, making sure that we were all still paying attention to it. The story went on. As for her sanity after a bad feeling on what was about to come did not. 'It seemed as if a fairy tale, a child that beaten a giant at a simple game.' But if that was the presumption, it was incorrect. For one moment I couldn't forget but I did. I ignored where we all were, more than the house, but specifically where we were, inside a gap between the dark side of the town and ours, separated only by a light coming from our lamp. Cracked as it was with the light coming through the shards, still honing but not extinguished by the rivers that came. One of his statues, after almost demolishing our house to be held on a word said over a little girl? Not a chance, but that wasn't what I was on about, much unwanted attention came as it was, with the sounds of him smashing, his laugh that most likely echoes throughout the system. And despite sticking inside, I hadn't anything else in mind other than what would happen If I were to fail, alone with my parents at the mercy of whoever's passing by.'So, shall I got first or you?'Wait, I said.'But with a whisper, I still had the decency to do so, even if the situation dictated otherwise.'First, we need to establish some rules.'He stared and waited, his grin almost extended to us.I heard then, the plotting from far away, almost reaching to us, afraid that someone would come, I had to scare them somehow.With nothing particular in mind and after deciding to not call, even more, the answer laid in front of me.'First rule'And he notices how I was scared at the sound of someone deciding to come by.'Don't let anyone come in, other than you, or else the deal falls.'I was ruffled by it, I've never seen, only heard stories about those who lived on the other side.About what happens to them over long exposure with it and living for years, to adapt to such place, to eat what grew inside of them, even on him, despite barely here, it almost came like a web sticking on him from the back.He hadn't known like we did, neither have my parents, standing in-between in all of this.'Fine.'And as he said it, a hand placed itself and covered the gap, everything around now sealed everything but us.I had to be sure that my parents were still with me in all of this as my actions weren't as brave as I let them or him think.'I believe it's my turn then."What?'I was confused after having to look back at him than them, at everything around, hearing the sounds too.Damn that place, if only I were a tad older than what I was.'No touching nor tickling.'Those should've been two rules but I wasn't in the mood, seeing how this was slowly, but at a fast rate too, becoming a race against time, whatever was behind of him now extending past.'Right, let's go then."What's the rush little girl?Can't yo have a laugh?'After seeing what was happening to him from behind, trying to swallow despite his size, I was in no mood.We took turns and done them fast, each of us saying a line or two, followed by another rule as it evolved.'You can't use the word I.'And then something that was supposed to make him laugh, he hasn't so far, doing his best to stop himself from doing so, trying to win despite everything.'And you can't look anywhere else but at me.'That came after an annoyance,quickly covering my mouth but it was too late as he already accepted.'But if he.'Shh, my mother stopped him two, trusting me despite not knowing that it wasn't intended.'You can do this, we both believe in you and the doing of yours.I believe you can do it.'Despite her words, I wasn't sure, it would only get worse from now on, especially if it would come and swallow us both.'Your beard's nest looks quite amazing.'But that didn't really come out right, misspoken loudly and not even recognisable.'No, don't scratch your head.I meant to say another thing."And why exactly wouldn't you want me to do so?'I stopped him but not enough, he questioned my decision but in my thought, I hadn't realised.'You broke a rule."I did?No, I didn't.I did not such a thing, you're a liar!'He was annoyed, filled with rage, what was even close to resembling a smile on his opal face now turned to boiling anger.Even the water that came to the land under us got to the point where it'd crumble.'The time here, spend was wasted.I can't believe I even gave you the benefit of the doubt girl, to think that I'd allow a human to challenge me to this.Despicable in the most of the sorts.'The sooner he started growling and lifting himself out, our house shook and I fell on my back, luckily with some books under that'd prevent the pain from coming through.'Do not say I.'Came to mind and I had realised, it wasn't even long passed since he said it that.But before he'd get the chance, it was the time for me to share some of the anger that was thrown all around of us.'Wait.'And my feet raised high, standing my ground once again.'What?'He asked, most menacingly, with his breath smelling like a hellish fire, propelling the dark smoke aching inside of his belly.'You broke a rule before me.You looked above before deciding to scratch your head!"So?'He asked, again, and I realised by now something that he didn't, not looking at his hands, or other parts of the body of his, without realising what was done, I had only to stall.'You broke the rule first, you weren't supposed to look anywhere else than at me.'But that means.'Yes, giant.You lost.'And that was heard, by everyone in the room.Unfortunately the victory short lived and pointless, he left down his arms and guard, being slowly pulled.It reached his mouth and he now spoke so slowly.He asked me in such a tone, sadly.'Is this.The price.Of your triumph?'It reached his eyes, he couldn't see, his nose now, the plants and the turning thing, malignantly choking his before us.I was pulled back by my parents, just in time to avoid being grabbed by his slow-moving hand, something that I wouldn't have noticed if it wasn't for them and the help they've given.He saw and looked at me, without losing the eye contact, one last grin, the same one that came through when we first encountered, something to now.Something to now is associated with him every time he came to my mind.His life was claimed and it was my fault, the sticking giant suffered because of my distractions and decision to prove them that I could deal with him myself.There, where my wits and strength weren't needed, could've been avoided, the night ending with us standing as we should've, curled and protected by the light of our long passed protector.I still remember and still mourn, the loss of that who gave me a chance despite being so small compared to him.'So what happened after?'She gave a frantic smile and left a note.'Oh, don't tell me this wasn't true at all!Come on, don't give me that smile.'She blew the fire and left out the charred remains to float along the stardust in the sky.

Horse and camp

Peons were resting in the summer, in front of our cottage. It wasn't too far ahead of where we lived that they came to be. Their faces changed when the sun dropped down as it happened with their bodies, their appearance from once normal looking people to fiends. Their jaws dropped to the ground and as they reached to save themselves from their death, all of their hands liquefied and joined the other bodily fluids that ran down. That's how it started, once and all of the sudden, pox sprouting out of their backs to leave an emptiness in their backs, a hollow space for their younglings to be raised inside of. My bigger brother didn't stay nor was he distracted by their transformation, he ran and closed the door, blocking it with anything heavy he could find near him whilst I couldn't do much but see. It was both fascinating and strange, seeing how they were bloating, almost ready to explode and grow inside, before seeing that, though, he grabbed and pulled me to the side. We were the humble children of our parents who used to live their life by making potions of their kind, now to be nowhere to be found. 'What's happening?' He didn't answer me and seemed distressed, from everything he's seen though I did not. We grew on different sides, either that was the reason or some other that I couldn't explain, I felt attracted to them and their forever changing nature. He was scared, refusing so answer and speak to me, as it took him nothing but a glance to retreat and block with everything he could in his nest filled with globes and phials. 'Do not open the door.' He said with a tone breaking chant, one that's slain the silence that's floated around of us, but making sure we wouldn't be heard, the cloth around his mouth made sure of him. One was given to me to use as he told me out of the order. 'Cover your mouth and nose with this little brother. And never let go.' The smell was coming and I could smell its fragrance, the phials were shaking and ready to fall. He immediately went to the other side of the room and threw the pillows and the rest of the soft parts of the bed to the ground so he'd be safe. 'I have to do this.' I said to myself, in front of my little brother that had no idea what was about to happen, those malformities and creatures of the night might've seen us and we had nothing to use against. I needed his help despite not wanting to recognise it, driving me forth to asking him to do this for me. 'The window little brother, cover it with the wooden lead before they get the better of us.' He nodded in his ignorance, smiling still with an awkwardness behind, his clothes still dirty on the white and not even moments ago he was outside, on the same soil they walked upon. Looking so attached to them. 'Stop. Cower before doing so or they will notice.' 'I'm sorry brother.' And he complied, he could see it too, looking at me as I was going mad, making me glance too at him and wonder what was happening to his sanity. I wasn't late in returning to what I was doing, trying to cover and prevent them from hearing what was about to fall and break. No lamp lit and no other light, we were only seeing through the cracks that decided to leave some come in. 'Come here brother.' He came closer and we both stood down, with one of my hands trying to keep him safe and the other one grasping over the table so none of the phials would fall. So fast I acted that the precautions were taken and all we had left was waiting, for some, anything to come. 'What? "Shhh?" He placed his hand and didn't let me speak for some reason. I wish he would let me talk, his hand was holding me too tight. 'Can I speak in whisper then?' 'You already are. Keep it short then.' He was looking around the room but there was no one inside other than the two of us. Was he looking for our parents then? 'They're not here?' 'Who?' As if he didn't know but I knew ahead of his what was in his mind, he probably acted this peculiar because he didn't want them to see the mess that was done. 'Our parents.' 'I know that.' 'Can I go outside now?' But he didn't answer my question, his sweat almost running through my arm despite being on a cold night. 'Knock Knock.'

Citadel

Someone said from the other side of out the door. 'Who could it be so late?' His eyes, though, they didn't wonder what I was, they were almost as cold and the thick blue running through the cracks inside of our room. 'I'll answer then.' 'No!' His voice almost spiked me down, his grip hurt me bad, I almost started crying from his doing as he never did this to me before. 'You're hurting me.' 'Lower your voice, he'll hear us! I did not mean..' 'You're hurting me, brother, stop it.' His voice got louder and I was afraid he'd start shouting, he threw his cloth despite me not telling me what to do or say. The knocks continue and by the second I was afraid he'd hear us and break the door through. 'Stop it.' My little brother's voice sent shivers down my voice, I couldn't control my hands nor my mind as it was getting tense for me to keep him and myself safe. 'I'm sorry little brother.' I grabbed the cloth I've given him off the bottom of the floor and shoved it in front of his mouth. His voice didn't start anymore, fully muffled by the cloth that was shoved, which made me go further, taking my other one from holding him and pushing him by the bed. He struggled a little making some noise, I told him them, in hoped he'd listen. 'Don't make any noise and. Don't. Stop struggling, I'm trying to help.' The knocks continue and someone was about to hear us and they'd break the door. He wouldn't stop, my little brother didn't have any idea what was going to happen if they heard us and went inside. I was afraid, so much that they come in, the sounds outside were hideous and I was unable to keep my thoughts in line, being the next ones after they were done there. My hand shook, seeing tears in his eyes and seeing him flail his tiny arms, I was unable to think straight, getting desperate after hearing the words. 'I know you're in there.' I hadn't any choice, knowing he would've done the same, the wet cloth now reaching his nose, he couldn't breathe and I was ready to go through with it. Such feat I have felt of losing my own life that I was going to trade his. And as my hand reached his neck, my leg firmly close to his smaller body to keep him steady, we looked at each other, both in tears. I was ready to end his life rather than face my fears, the ones of what I saw outside, imagining what they would do to me if their filthy hands got to the point of no return. The same one that I would get to encounter now. My eyes averted after not being able to stare at him and muster everything inside to go on with it. And then it just happened. The door broken, someone kicked it in, catching us both by surprise before I'd get to make my decision. My poor brother dropped to the ground, inhaling and exhaling, at last, pumping through his lungs and not letting go of the breaths that gave him life. As was I, staring at my wet hands, fallen from my hands and his tears, to look upon the visitor that came. 'What the hell happened in here?' He was strapped from the bottom to the top, in black leather and muffled scared to his eyes, he had a light of a torch in his hand and boots covered in muck. Yet he appeared to be normal rather than anything else. I couldn't look behind of him after being found the way I was, the way I acted and after what was done. Disgusted of myself and action I did not dare say anything but rub my forearm, refusing to answer or help my brother that was still standing where he was, still grasping for his life despite of what I've done. 'Come on.' I did not notice and he didn't care what happened before, after turning my eyes to face him I noticed that he already held my brother, passed out under one of his arms. 'But.. "Are you deaf or something? Come one I said!' He grabbed me by the ankle and threw me on the other side, before hitting the wall, I got the idea plain and clear just as some phials fell and broke over my head. I bit my tongue instead of shouting, I did not scream because I did not want to. 'I won't repeat myself any further. I'll wait for you on the horses near the road, with him.' He passed me by and I could merely glance, he scared them with his coming, a pair of horses armoured with up to teeth. I recognised the seal engraved on the metal after my face met the dirt, the balance couldn't be held between my feet yet it was enough for him to understand the idea, I was still going to follow. No other place was safe and the wicked sounds were certainly not out of place now. 'You're almost here, I can see them getting the taste of your scent.' I smelled it too on the way and from outside, though. I didn't know it was mine. 'Before reaching the closest to him he stopped to throw at me a bucket of grass, off the side off one of the horses, he carried it with him from far away place. 'Bleh. Why did you do that?' The boy had no idea but his stench just carried on with him ever since I came into their house, luckily for him that I was prepared and it should last for a few hours at least. But too late for him to change his mind, so was his brother, sitting on my lap and on the horse. 'The other one should suffice. 'It was so close and with no saddle for him to rest on, though the friend of mine was taking the time of the day, whilst being so dark outside. He looked confused at first as if I was speaking another language that he did not understand, that's why I had to pull him over to it. 'I don't have all day boy, and neither does your brother. If we get caught now, we may not arrive to meet with your parents. "You know of my parents?" Of course, I do, who do you think decided to send us here to pick you up. What is the delay here son? Are you so afraid that.' He shivered for a second before going back. 'I don't know how to ride sir.. "You won't do it.' A voice came, colder than his spine, coming from the woods just in time for us to leave. 'Sorry for the delay, I had to take care of something.'She was tall, not scruffy like him, without an ounce of dirt or muck to cover her polished face and clothes.'It's all right, just take him with you, I'm already busy here.'"I can see.'She hopped on from where she stood, right on her horse, I was too busy to stare that I didn't notice that hers had no armour nor saddle, nothing in particular that would protect us if anything had the jump on us.'So you're Oliver, aren't you?The older brother I see.I hope my friend here didn't cause you any trouble.'With one hand she almost grabbed my chin, if it were for him and the shouting coming from withing, enough to disturb us and put us on the run.Sounds of horns being blown upon came from underground.'Don't be afraid.'She said, with her dangling leather stripes, extending a hand that I barely grabbed.I was pulled in an instance, feeling my body strain, she threw me on the back side of the horse immediately with no question nor care.'Hiaaa'The horses started running, I could barely hold on her wait, awkwardly and barely keeping myself from falling, too busy to see the scenery, too dark to see the motion.Though I didn't ask before now I had the chance, with the inability to speak properly, I muttered and hoped he'd understand me despite my poor excuse of an attempt.'How do you know our parents?'I wasn't sure if I could trust them, despite seeming as if their intentions were good, but it was too late to turn back and at the time it seemed the best course of action, after deciding that nowhere else was safe.The dirt was thrown under the hooves and I could see it almost reaching my face, the metal plates seemed to be welded on them after staring for a while, waiting but not being answered.I tried again after letting it passed, just to hear.'I heard you the first time boy.Now it's not the time, we're almost there now.'His words were sprouted out of his mouth, outrunning the wind just to land clear to my ears.I stood in silence afterwards, looking at the sky, something that was broken by her.'No star tonight it seems."Keep your eyes on the road.'They've spoken and I've not notice until then, but as I looked closer to see where they were possibly hiding, I've seen nothing but a cloak of smoke rising from somewhere below.We were headed to that place, one with a fire so strong, it ripped the sky and devoured the stars in its upcoming wake.'Not too long now.'I announced both of them, seeing how the road was clear, though I wasn't sure, not even now about how the boy felt, the smaller one and the one right close.What I've witnessed before, she saw it in my eyes too when we first spoke.She was clear and safe, if something happened, we'd burn them at a stake, along their house instead of having them suffer, being melted for ours, just to end up the same way.It couldn't be a lot worse if I hadn't burst into the house.'What are you thinking about?'She asked me on a deaf year, despite knowing well, it surprised me how she acted near them despite speaking with such cold before, no wonder that her voice coming from the woods felt like daggers in my back. 'Nothing.Wait, stop.'I pulled the reins and couldn't face it well, the fence on my right was broken, penetrated by the sharpest edge of my horse's armour.'Damn it.'I couldn't see them or what they were doing, trying my best to hold him and the horse at the same time, the soil seemed as if it was falling down.Moments and I stopped, we both stopped from falling down, a bit that would've eaten us alive, its teeth sharp and mouth running dry after taking all it.'Easy now horse."Are you all right?'She asked on the other side of the fence, staring at me through a broken part of it, not acting any different and not scared.I was slightly out of breath thinking I saw something on the road.'Come on now, let's go back, girl.'Caressing her on the part unarmoured, making it safe for both of us after having to go through such a distressful situation. 'What was that about?"Did you not see what I saw?There was a..Both of them looked surprised, almost as if no one jumped in front of the road, ready to start a pesticide with the pox filled inside of him.'It doesn't matter, let's continue.'Perhaps the paranoid was getting to me or worse, but I

continued heading to the camp where we were expected to arrive and stay.'Slow down, you'll knock him off if you don't.Listen to me.You've been acting like this ever since we were sent on the trip.'She was faster, the lack of extra weight on it made the horse both nimble and quicker than mine, enough that I was almost immediately reachead and question.Though I had nothing to say to her, nor to him, no explanation was needed for.'I've done nothing wrong, just a misjudgement."One that almost threw you in a hole'We were seen, just in time for me to avoid any explanation, I knew she was lying, all along since we met.Something told me I shouldn't trust her, now I had to pay for it, hearing the lies and trying to put me in a bad spot in front of them.'There."Fine.'We were waves at, our return being welcomed, though only one of us was deserving of the praises as I alone was the one who saved the boys, being riddled with the doubt.Doubting that she'd give me any credit, rather than taking it to herself.'Careful, you'll drop him'She said, intentionally after appearing so closely to them that they'd hear us speak, without showing me any sign of wanting to whisper and avoid it.'Here on girl.'We stopped near, just to be given a distress and distrustful look by everyone in my vicinity.A misguided mistake that I'd better remember, hopping off from my horse with the child in my arms, still feeling well as it was.'Wait.I'd rather carry my brother if you don't mind.'He said, despite the guards waiting.It was too cold for them to do so outside and I had no idea how much was the settlement going to stay that way.We couldn't keep them waiting so I chose to ignore him.'Greetings.'I said to them both, turning my back to the lad and continuing some more.'We return with them, to the request of their parents."We see that, but were you followed?'His rainment seemed to be bigger than him, not to mention he was sweating in a cold night.'What do you think?'I approached so closely that I could feel his breath, still holding the boy by the waist and neck.'That's enough for one night."You don't understand..I couldn't see well past her back but a motion of her fingers shut him up, even more than he did to me.He even let me come close and.'Take him.I don't need to carry extra weight.'He lowered my brother and I came close just in time as I was sure he'd let him drop to the ground.I couldn't hear what he said behind our back but he was let through by the guards who had no intent anymore to keep him waiting.'Are you fine?He didn't hurt your brother or anything, right?"He's fine.Thanks by the way.'I held him, barely despite not feeling right.She asked me so soon despite not seeing nor knowing what happened.'Do you want me to hold him?"Ehm."The guards grunted as their waiting ahead wasn't wanted to be more than it should, neither did we as the horses were left for us to carry them.'Give us a moment, can't you see the boy and his brother had enough to go through?"I'm sorry ma'am.'And the other one didn't apologise , to either of us.'It's fine.How about your brother then?"Here, I trust you.'She held him with an embrace, almost like our mother used to when we were younger, and since her hands were busy, I took the initiative and took a hold on both of the horses and slowly walked forward.'Well done, you might end up being more useful than I thought."Don't mention it, make sure he's safe.I don't want anything to happen to him, especially after.'My tongue bit by my upper lip and teeth, I stopped myself from revealing it with so many ears about, everywhere laid.'Don't worry, whatever it is, I'm sure it's fine, your concern.'I nodded and took control over them, they followed both of my hands, seeming so calm, rather of how I was not.'You may enter.'They said after going aside, to make room for us to go through with our horses, to the camp.I had to admit, my eyes were impressed, for something that didn't seem to be built so long ago, it was amazing."Wow."You could say that again.Actually, if you were here earlier, you would've had a better surprise.'People around, all of them busy, moving sacks of grain and other things, horses were all grabbed and placed in a small group in front of the camp. I was surprised to see so many from the village we used to live in, saluting and talking. Marrow from the water gates that would always visit our parents to bring them the water that was needed for the complicated formulas they used. Robbert, the boy that used to play near the wells, not so far from her, along with his smaller brother, I've always thought they ended up being compared to us. Hopefully without ending to resort to the same thing as we. As I had to. Villagers and other people I hadn't seen before were present too, not looking too approachable from the looks of it but neither did we in their eyes. I didn't notice but before us, the gates were slammed, the wooden raft-like camp we were on was now secured with that, surprisingly it must've been something before our coming. No one could've built it in a small amount of time. 'See anything you like?' An old lady spoke to me, with everyone working so hard, others so harsh looking, it felt refreshing to see and hear such a thing. 'A vendor? Here and in a time like this?' 'Wait, you've got time to sniff around the camp after we're done, remember your parents?' 'Oh sorry.' 'You don't have to be, just my arms getting tired.' She went ahead, the camp looking even bigger, I hadn't realised it but we were on a hill, just above the other side of it. I ignored what she tried selling, just to have my jaw fall off after seeing the sight of the other side. The reins were dropped from my hand and it was confirmed to me at once, it wasn't built now, the fence that encompassed the camp was almost like one of a great city. Going all around it without limits. 'It's.' 'Enormous, I know. Too bad we won't stay for long.' She kept going but I couldn't immediately reach her, bending over to take the reins and follow after. 'There's no need to keep the horses, you can leave them be.' Her voice changed on the way. Everyone was still preparing for a long run, having their difference left aside, working together and united, strange that they'd do that so soon after we barely discovered. Regardless, they acted like that, except her and the companion that abandoned us on the way here. 'So, our parents? Do you know where they are?' I asked her to reveal, despite her sudden change of how she sounded like, I knew that the trust would still fall upon her. 'You don't need to worry about that either.' After getting closer to both her and my brother I saw a smile, quite wicked in nature. She told me. 'I know what you did.' Despite in the light of the moon, she couldn't have known, there was no way. I asked her then and then again. 'What do you know?' I sounded quite scared, not for my life but by what would happen, if she told my parents or anyone else. We kept walking and I avoided looking at everyone else, caught with my hand out red, cried for ages if they found out what I've done. 'What do you know?' 'I know that you had to sacrifice something for your brother in order to come here with us. The risk was high yet you took it.' I coughed nervously, not knowing what to say. If I told her what really happened they'd hang me for such an attempt, or even worse, send me back there with those. 'Wait.' Driven by the guilt, I stopped her, rubbing both my fingers and the wrists, demanding just a small amount for us to speak in private. A corner, dark, in-between tents weren't too far from us, I told her I needed to speak her in private, after not noticing anyone in the vicinity with us. No one that would notice, nor anyone I'd recognise. It sickened me so far for to think what would happen if anyone would've seen through my guise, the real me. 'Fine, but make it snap.' The tent where your parents are shouldn't be too far, and from the looks of it you may only get a few moments before we embarked on the trip out there, in the great beyond.

Citadel

I can almost see it clear, standing so distant from all of them, yet they've got no idea what they're doing, where they're at and what's to be done about them. The glass is sparkling, almost reflecting the shine through the middle of the district we're facing and everyone's just gotten accustomed to it. None of them can see what I'm seeing but only I alone accompanied by no one, seeing how their calculated arrival came to fruition gave me the initiative to send someone to welcome. It should be there any moment now, going through a landless nation of people in the distance, all going in different directions, none have time to stop. They seem so confused, two children that arrived, at the midsts of the darkest hour yet, one that would end with them dead. So much time I wanted to put an end to the lineage of there that I would finally see the. 'Am I disturbing?' 'Wait, I called for no.' I couldn't fully turn my back, my shadow blocking a good part. 'One.' The sirens rang as farther away as possible, their shouts of metal honed by nothing in the sudden awake, still tied to the ground, resting now as sculptures, reminders of what was now gone. And what used to be. 'Christopher, wait.' 'I've already told you that's not my name.' 'So many people and thoughts that were not related to them, it was hard not to drown in their sea.' 'Wait, what's that?' The tallest of them, watching upon us, the glass shattered, stopping the light from cleaning the rest of the people standing under. We barely arrive, just to appear as witnesses to the fall of a man that stood atop of a citadel made of glass, not completely broken but shattered before he slowly fell. Pushed by a dark figured that poisoned the glass itself, it changed the colour of all of it, making it lose even its shine and reflection, everything that gave it life now abandoned. People were scared, running away from the proximity to avoid being cut and hurt by the giant shards that were falling only to make the others feel even worse. 'Careful here.' She came closer and held my hand so we wouldn't get lost from one another, enough that we'd be safe from the repercussions of what was happening. 'Is this my fault?' 'No, it's not.' The discoloured shards, the darkest embrace that the citadel would meet came with a blow, a gust of the wind, the same that threw the man, the shards out on a whim. A tragedy felt like and everyone was in shock, some speechless and other not, as the man hit the ground, the shards impaling him with no doubt, I covered her eyes not to see. People yelled and shouted murder before seeing the figure run away, standing just to see their reactions. In the midsts of what was happening, through the never ending crowd of people that I got to see past them and see the gates being assaulted, doctors rushing to help him. 'I don't know who he is. But it must be my fault.' 'Shh, stop with this nonsense, you'll give people the wrong idea.' My feet were slippery and all of the sudden I saw them crawl, the marks left on the ground by their spines after reaching so and carried away by their bodies. 'There.' 'We were followed.' She noticed it too and it was already getting awkward with everyone around watching our every move and questioning us. 'We need to get close now. Before they reach him, before of us!' She almost gave it away but I was close enough to cover her mouth and reduce her incriminating sentence to a mere whisper, a mere matter that no one cared for. 'Cower your head now and let's go.' And so did I, holding each other and passing through the people, the marks on the bottom of the field was enough for us to understand how they worked. Perhaps even worse knowing what they intended to do once they got their reach onto whoever's done the crime. 'We can't let more of them die.' 'We won't trust me.' And as we rushed to it, running and having to resist, our endurance reaching the limits it had withing, the insults and how worse they started feeling, without the light to refresh and give them feeling. They felt nothing but angst with the fall of the glass citadel, all of them started breaking. 'Come on, faster. Ah.' She could barely breathe and keep us despite the best efforts she tried hiding the wounds left on her body and mind. 'You don't have to do.' 'Get down.' I was pulled and stopped, a hand reached from beyond, so thin and close, it almost decapitated me if it weren't for the warning given by her. My knees were bent so sudden that I almost fell to the ground, she helped me get up in time to avoid staying still. 'You can't stay like that.' We were both left in a distraught, running through and not ceasing our attempts to reach the citadel, two lines of blood that combined, two cuts on our hands that reminded us that. 'We have to reach that tower.' I nodded and pulled her farther away, avoiding the people who started to slowly become angrier, more violent, evil doers at its finest. 'I wouldn't do that if I were you.' A voice came and we hadn't known from where too late as it suddenly appeared and set us back. His crony looks, the crooked neck that almost had an extra pair of ribs in it and the smile that begged for us to suffer, the ones that guarded here didn't seem like any other. 'We've done nothing wrong so far.' We tried to explain, despite him not wearing his uniform now, he used to be someone that we'd met, on a regular or not, a long way from here before deciding to not come back. 'I won't let you pass because I know you.' He attempted too, as we did, but was stopped from grabbing a hold of us by someone else in-between. Citizens that fought amongst one another stopped and grabbed him with no fear of authority, nor that they'd recognise one at this point. 'Let go of me you animals.' He said as he started bleeding, their shattered parts came close and pierced his skin, the worse effect it had, having to deal with those affected by the lack of the sun. 'Wait, we can't let him get mauled like this.' Her consciousness was clean and stopped both of us in our tracks, remind us that there was still some part of morality left, but. 'We can't save him both and reach the citadel before it gets overwhelmed.' I bit my lip before realising, from her golden locks to her face, the expression that faded, her mind was made. 'Fine.' We released our hands and ignored the screaming, each of us pulling with as much strength as we had, trying to remove the two of them that already gone mad with it. 'Just. Let. Go!' As if that wasn't enough, we almost yelled, it scared them off, both knocking us away from him, just to end up at the same level. Kneeling and rubbing his bleeding arms, his coat and jacket ripped with no mercy that should've been had for him, another one like them despite not shattering. 'Will you help us? You can turn us over after.' 'Valery, don't encourage him.' 'I can help you get I can help you get there if you help me.' Two pairs to support him was all he asked for, something that she is not denied, whatever it took for us, we had to reach them at any point and sacrifice made along the way. Marks on the ground became more distinct, I said to her but there weren't words after. I shook my head and understood what she meant when she told him what was to be our fate after. My glare felt bad, looking at her, having to think about it in such a lack of light, of anything that'd get us farther. 'Come on.' And we grabbed and held him still, along the way, now swimming in their sins, men, women and followed by children. 'I cannot help them. Though I hope you know what you're both doing, if you can't stop this. Gah.' And at least that was somehow quiet, the wounds on his arm made him stop the annoyance. 'Left. Right. Take that path.' He used as-as boards, despite in my mind imagining it different with his saying, our captain leading us through it, knowing each and everyone of them and who would get the less affected, of more delayed in the effect. Dark eyes, formatting near the grounds had the tail getting rid of and following where we went, I managed to glance at its general direction but never able to pinpoint where they exactly stood. 'Some.' I didn't continue, she looked distracted as it was, trying to not get cut by the falling shards from our sides, but he didn't. Looking at me almost like a stranger, a strange fear I've felt inside of me, coming because of me and the way he was acting near her, holding her tighter even like that. I tried ignoring, not wanting, but the constant smirk he gave me, slightly sicker by the minute. My mind was getting distracted, having to bend my side too so I wouldn't let him down abandoned.

Chance

'Why?' He asked almost as if he did not know. Standing in front of a restless crowd, all of them pointing and laughing as if they didn't care. Perhaps he didn't either, pitying himself whilst looking at everything he's done. Never knowing where and to what did he belong, all for nothing, effort in vein, a mockery of everyone staring and batting at him. 'Because it's your own damn fault' One man said, keeping the laughter in his pocket, still not realising what it means for him. How could he if there wasn't even a moment taken so he'd explain to them. Nothing was free, for neither one of them, not the rotten fruits that were thrown at him, neither the time spent. 'I've sacrificed so much.' He said at the crowd, yelling at them, thinking they'd understand. No, it was actually an attempt for him to force himself to do so, to make them see what he saw. A poisoned view of the world that didn't bring him anything more than sadness and confusion. 'You've sacrificed nothing. You've done nothing. And nothing you will ever do.' They continued for reasons he didn't understand. He refused the evidence presented and attempted to cover. There was no way for him to run after looking around, the entry from which he came from was gone. He had to turn around and look in shame again, after judging him more out of a failed attempt. 'Would you rather run than face us?' They shouted in a choir, the reason behind of that was something dominating their grasp over him. Thinking of them as enemies of his weren't going to help with what was going on, knowing too well that he'd be crippling himself by doing so. 'So what?' The voice grew somewhat clearer, the sign of disrespect in their eyes without the following intention that grew soon to be dissolved. 'What do you want to me?' 'We want nothing from you. Only to learn from the mistakes you've kept doing. Every single time, repetition after repetition that took far too long for you to notice. To get attached to something that made you feel false hope. "But isn't false hope better than nothing?" With a desperate tone, he couldn't say but think it, stopping before coming out of his mouth. They understood what he was trying to say anyway, regardless of what was happening, he became predictable. Such predictability and inevitability that they'd understand immediately and in fewer than that a response would even accompany it. 'No, you've blinded yourself with it, drowned with such a hopeless desire. You wanted to be good but died along the way. Now, there's not time for you to repent or say you're sorry.' The eyes inside grew tighter from so much avoidance of theirs, without any extra second spent towards that meeting of theirs. 'We're giving you a choice.' Their spit was coming out as they opened their mouths and spoke it. He had to listen carefully despite tears in his eyes, those of self-pitying and lies. 'You've got to keep doing it but you can't just do it the same. The way you've always done it, so far you've grown sick of yourself and displaying it how it's displayed to us. If you keep refusing our help you might as well spend the rest of your life there in your spot, being barred forever without being able to die. And the eternity of being reminded of your mistake. Of what you've done, of what you could've done. It's up to you to make the choice, we won't be able to force you yet.' He didn't know what to say, it hurt thinking about such a punishment. It hurt him to wonder and think if he would deserve to get such a thing, of what he's done. Bound to his legs, parchments of his doing, wrapped around his ankles, going so far that it could've been his entire life work. But, it was short. Even shorter than he thought of. Even more, they threw the key, something that was nothing more than a pair of scissors. 'Release yourself from it and start again. Do it better this time, do it right.' They said. A second look at his ankle and he noticed that they've been bid to him for far too long, something had to be done. 'What if I don't want to give up yet?' He asked, followed by silence. It was more than enough as the time given by them in it, to bathe him so he'd understand. And the eternity of silence, one of constant barrage or release. It was all clenched in his hand, made out of metal, slightly rusted but so were the writings of him. It'd be only right that something is done by him, good or wrong to end the same way. A gust of light and a door opened, revealing something that felt so warm in the cold room he spent so much in. It burned, all of it behind after the end of the scissors reached the lines that were embedded on the papers. For what was worth, he left as the same way he was let, to his decision and doing. Halfway, he stopped on a hollow path. Looking around, he saw desecrated trees, corruption and parasites that swallowed people inside of the ground. He didn't know what to think but realised that, in some place strongly ridden in his heart something happened. Despite that no one liked it and no one would get to see or hear the stories. He looked down for a second at one of them, the people he long seen, the creatures he created and the people who seemed like him. All of them flawed to the bone, down to their actions and how they were made. They didn't stop existing as he was still alive, despite no one else knowing or having long forgotten about them. He was sad before but confused again. On what he's done, the deeds long burned and now, he encountered them again. Going on the same path again wouldn't get him anything, he knew that they helped him see. Even now, the memory of them and the bitter mark left made him sick. But, 'I.' A look-back, before coming to the decision of returning once again. No need anymore for them to be antagonised, they were only trying to help, despite on his original thought about them. His mind changed, his mind confused, everything he's said and done and written now used. Perhaps on or against him but one thing remained to be made clear to them. Something that wasn't spoken by his mouth and he was afraid. Still so, after presenting himself in front of them once again. They still kept the silence and weren't shocked of his remains, throwing the shackles that once held of him. 'You kept them. But.' Finally looking them in their eyes, not so different from his, used to see and understand. Not so much filled with hatred or despise, they had nothing against. 'I won't need them, instead.' Words had a harder time coming to him now, perhaps for the better as it wouldn't have gone by a better way. 'I've.' His lips were bitten there. He realised that there wouldn't be any difference for him to tell them if something had to be changed. If something could change or even needed a chance to do so. He turned his back and never looked back. Finally understanding that if something had to chance, he'd have to do it. Refusing to tell them that, perhaps he's proven to himself that perhaps there was a chance for him to chance for his own good and doing. Not for them as nothing was done for anyone else, nothing. The old creations didn't look back at him either, they cared for nothing more. He wasn't doing for any of them, only for himself. The only joy that came to him came from that and for a while, it was lost. Followed by clouds of confusion that shoved it deeper in his mind, the last thing he would've wanted. With so many distractions of what was wrong. Perhaps he did the good thing, or not. He was the only one to leave that place or at least that's what he thought of it. It's hard to tell, really, if he left it or not, whatever the choice and the final of it. The results, in the case, if they really came. It's up for the future works to tell, if any of them even get to the eyes of them again.

Knight

He finally did it. A circle ridden of all the wood with everything related to that around, burn to crisp in his wake. The knight wasn't dormant any longer as he watched his so-called peers taking jabs from far away and commenting on his presence. It felt like a lot of time has passed for him, he felt that too. 'So. Is it me you're looking for then? Fine, then I shall make an example out of you for those who disturb my sleep.' There were a few of them, watching from the woods, some hiding and other not. Boulder men and women dared get close to his well-endowed staggering might that was impending through them at every moment it passed. An aura that came out of him, not observable nor able to show any spine at all, it made them feel dreary and question it. 'What's happening to us?' One of the men said, watching his fellows acting the same way as he did. A silence came between them as they showed no other sign of wanting to fight. Strange how now, he was not going to easily forget what they've done. 'And such a perfect moment too.' The voice that came from somewhere in his metal armour said. His shoulders muddled too as he expanded his hand to embrace some of the light coming from above, feeding him. Something that he long ached for in his hibernation.'Now.'Now it was the time, just as he said it, the two hands that embrace was now used for another purpose that that, one that'd end up being full of grim.A crack formed across his metal chest, from top to bottom, enough that his hand would fit in the space that was now slightly lit.Eyes widened all around the forest.The many feet that marched along one another came closer but hid behind the trees, with hands to their sides to make their intention clear.Simply watchers in a conflict they didn't ask to be a part of without knowing it wouldn't be happening.The hands now reach and entered the crack, pulling it with a might unwelcomed by the bold, now carried away after seeing the grim that came out of it.He didn't just open his armour as he was no normal warrior.He opened his ribcage, embedded with the armour itself, revealing that there was nothing left out of him, but dust and the organ that kept him alive for so many years.Still beating, the flagrancy that was left out managed to drive way some of them, that if the sight wasn't enough to do the same.A sight came out of him, his mind clear too.After so many battles, he learned not to think but use his swordsmanship as a second nature, to end whatever foe laid forth against him at any cost.'We can still take him.'Said the young lad, despite not understanding what his legs tried communicating with him.But agony came.The strange light from his chest area faded as the hand reached and pulled the puss filled heart of his.Repugnant as sight, even more now, the long cords and veins followed, so strongly looking and nothing that was seen by the people sent to meet him.He squeezed so hard that clearly, they were able to see the liquid coming out of it coming back to what remained to the back, the legs, hands, hand and the rest of the body.Whatever substance his heart held inside, it now ended with the rest of him.The song of the moon started humming, as the wildlife was now blooming at their peril.It was too late now but the temperature around seemed to raise up as it all went.'We need to go now.We can not fight it.'Two voices, twins alerted the so-called captain of the group, yet it fell on deaf ears.Whatever was now left of the group, those that didn't run away were now either scattered or too afraid to act.Defenceless they watched, not even hearing the words said behind their back.'Keep your damn money, it's not worth it.'A bag filled with gold was thrown, bouncing over the back of his.It didn't bother him at all.The ritual of his was now over, after squeezing enough, hands that resembled skeletons came to grab his body.So far, they were blind and didn't see, what they thought to be was not real.His body not empty as he wouldn't have been able to survive.What laid beyond their vision and their deceived eyes were smaller bodies that were protected by the rib cage.They beset the upon him his heart and left him to carry on back.Confusion was a powerful tool he had the best use of but it was about to come to an end.With everything done, he gave his heart back, placing it upon their hands, so in the end, they would embrace it again, the two of them to keep it safe.And after that, he finally placed his hand back and closed his ribs and armour.Almost revitalised by what he's done, a set of glowing eyes emerged from his once hollow helmet, the reflection of which he saw only anger and sorrow.As he went and charged.It was too late for them to scream and run.'Defend their return.'Said one of the ones that.Perhaps it was the only one that had a noble thought inside his mind, nevertheless wasted after a short leap.The blade bent with him, avoiding the other three that haven't even unsheathe theirs.He was slightly below of him with the blade simple and long, with a motion, the damage came close to being unbearable.A could swipe that cut a big part of him, but remarkably he did not bleed.'Swen!'One of the voices called for his friend, but it was too late for him now, falling for his own sake.They were fools thinking they stood a chance against him.Perhaps he wouldn't have attacked but this was never about what could've happened.What did happen is actually the only important thing.Not even a chance for them to go through and they were all stricken and put down by strikes that looked unreal. He can't be that fast. Though one of the men, his last thought being the ones of his family at home and what could have they done without him. How would they survive the coming winter? The other too were confused, thinking about how could they run, having lost the battle before it even started. Strictly forbidden by the rules of combat, a shame that he wouldn't have gotten the chance to use it. A blade, behind one of their backs, if it wasn't for the fear to drive him back, he surely would have used it. The motion that cut through the rest surprised not only them but the ones that were looking, cutting from the side of the fourth one and managing to get the rest in less than seconds. Not even able to deflect it as they should've, seeing how the swords they had were raised in the right position. Of course, lacking the strength needed to push him back with his force. Bent in a way that it somehow managed to get all of the at the same point, despite their different size and forms, their neck chords were removed by the strike even without aiming at them. 'Did he strike another time?' A watcher in the woods asked he was confused by what he saw, before and now. Perhaps he didn't know better, him and the rest that decided to stay. Something told them that he wouldn't come for them next but what was it? There wasn't another voice, nor anyone mad enough to tell them to stay. He stared at them too, using his metal glove to wipe off the blood off his blade, throwing after a small river and balls of blood that floated away. The wind was still striking. He was not appeased. Looking straight at them he waited for a second to clear his throat. 'What are you waiting for?' He asked, never did he strike someone like that, no foe nor traveller that would just stand there like that, glaring as if they stared at a might of a presence. An older one approached, not afraid by the menacing look, nor at the fact that there were already a couple of bodies within his reach. 'Greeting knight. May I?' He asked, down his beard, some of his spit landing by. Though he did make sure none would land him as risking any possible offence would mean the end of his life. Before coming closer, the knight raises his sword, pointing and pushing towards the neck of the old man. But that was as far as it went. 'No need to worry.' Said the old man, clearing his throat as slowly as he could. If there was an apple in there perhaps now it was the time for it to go lower, raising it any further would only be the cause of self-impalement in his cause. Some tried sneaking in the midst of it, thinking they could just plainly take advantage of the small conflict that arises. As slowly as this took, being the stall in front of the old man, he still had some breath in him. Even if the cold breath was visible there, his eyes weren't. 'I never said you could leave.' Relinquished by it, they stopped nicely, as solid as the trees that looked suspiciously amused compared to them. A nice add, he said to himself. Too bad this would be the only derived thought he would get, one of amusement, to be followed by many of scorn. 'As I was about to say. You're trespassing and not only that. Sword was risen against me and you all saw what it lead to.' The old man hadn't much breath to take, the age hasn't left him any break. It wouldn't be long now until he would have to rest his neck. 'Ehm.' He cleared it in the most silent of ways. The knight saw and understood, not being completely lacking of pity, especially when it came out of someone who would so happen to be close to him age. The sword was lowered. 'Thank you for the mercy given sire.' Said the old man as he scuffled himself off the dust risen on him after waiting. He took a short break to look around, merely standing in front of the corpses. Still warm. 'If you may. We meant no harm as we were merely sent here to investigate.' At this point, the sword, as glimmering as it felt being around of it was lowered down. So close to the ground that the runes on it started beign vissible, at least for those not close enough to be taken away by his fever starting gaze. 'Tell me then, should you not have been stricken down for what you've done? Have you not known that these lands belong to lord Cattar?"The knight was stopped with a small backing as he hard the old man continue.'Whatever lord might've ruled over these forest and the castle you've used to serve is long dead.'The knight was moved from what he's heard.His entire life was used, once to serve, and now.It was gone.Each word gave the others a chance to move, as they hurt him more than any other sword would.'You serve no one now knight.Regardless of how many you slay now, how many groups you shatter.'He once had a name, but even that he long forgotten.Without a place to live, without a scope to prolong and abide of, he had nothing left.'What's that?Feeling as if you lost something, is that it?'The old man's given name was Tius, passed down generation but keeping the same wits as his forefathers did.A strange circumstance it would end like, being the same as this one where his wits would actually work so well.'Are you shaking now?That's certainly something strange coming out of someone who just so easily put down four of our men.'His voice ribbed in his armour, he thought he could hear his echo in the hollow armour, as even the old and the wise fell were deceived.No word came as he backed away, his armour itself shaking, the cracks wearing, even with the ribs slightly showing.The light that once made it glow inside was fading and he couldn't even hold his sword straight as he was trying to still.Intimidate him.'I will not be intimidated by this.'The old scrawny legs passed by the dead men as if they meant nothing to him.Being fair, life wasn't that treasured anymore, it wasn't much of a surprise that he wasn't shocked when he saw such an abomination of life standing in front of them.But to become this pathetic at the simple mention of it?Tius held the thought dear, something that he would get to use against of him, even more than so.'Don't come any closer.'It seemed like the voice almost left him, just as his strength, without abiding and using what was left of it.Fading away.Such was the conflict in his mind, would he squeeze his heart again to regain what he lost or was it simply not worth the trouble.Surely now that he had no purpose, his life would have to come to an end, right?"You can stop backing now.Even if I bred any harm against you, there wouldn't physically be a way for an old man such as I am to end your.'The knight abides by his request in shame, dropping his blade into the ground.Even the light from above seemed to move away, fleeing after having a sight of what happened to him.'There's no need for you to surrender, you've already proven yourself to us.'He shoved him, after thoroughly searching inside of his robe for a small token in good faith.'I want you to have this and follow us to the camp.'Given by Tius and covered in blood.'It's not mine in case you were wondering.'It happened so fast that he didn't know how to respond.Never has he had the chance to stand and converse with another human being before, usually it would be just a fight.And even that wouldn't last long enough for more than scorn filled hatred to be spat upon from one another.'But I killed..He tried to finish, his words belong in front of him.A hand laid behind Tius, he signalled the rest that it was safe to approach.'I understand that, but do you?Are you so blinded that you cannot see that I'm offering you something that, with the lack off you'd just be whimpering like a dog?"Strange.Not ever before was he offered a hand, let alone by someone so frail that the hand would get hurt at the simple touch.His confusion and delusion wouldn't work as Tius saw right through him.'You would give a chance to me?After what I've done?"The knight's voice softened up, he sounded, human.'Worry not, you've done only but what you were instructed by your former master.That pact is now ended, now come with us.'Few people, bolder than the ones that dared challenge him before came closer to take and carry his sword.No word was said for them to do otherwise.Tius came even closer, surprising the young in his upcoming.'Here, let me help.'Despite the old age, he still managed to grab his arm and wrap him over his shoulder. Harmony, a hymn played inside his head. The knight had never felt such a thing and never has his ears got a hold on such notes. They walked shoulder to shoulder, being invited to their camp but he had not felt it. What he saw, what was reminded of him. He saw. The sun was so bright in his eyes, the town where he grew up, accompanied not by an old man but by an old friend. Oaks that blossomed without the spring, pink petals flying by him. No armour and no gloves to stop him from grabbing them as they flew by, hearing the song that would clear his mind. His vision not impaired, he has not blinded anymore, seeing people from his town greeting and going by the day. 'Mother, father?' A question came, after seeing them wave back at them, something that he did back. Despite not being able to remember his name, in that moment, after so long, it wasn't possible for such a vision to occur. 'We're going there.' Said his old friend, both hand and in hand, stepping carefully so no pedal would be stepped on. The strings that were played in harmony came from somewhere beyond his gaze, the warmth he felt inside, one that wasn't previously his. He had never thought of everything of that sort, other than having a scope, giving himself for someone who was bigger than him, a lord. One that wasn't present anywhere, the land still away from his lordship's arise. They were all busy, carrying lumber and fruits, yet they did it happily, and the knight. The man saw it in their faces that they could hear the strings played too, enough that they were pushing themselves inside of him. 'Can you hear it too?' The man asked his friend, which he responded with a hum. It made him smile. Someone was playing the harp and it filled him with more emotion, knowing that they'd get to whoever was playing it. Other hummed too, near him, they were happily complying to the wishes to help, and despite the efforts and how hard their task appeared in their eyes, he saw nothing but content. Something he felt too, occupying him and dismissing any previous thoughts he once knew. The townsfolk now looked at him, carried, with knees shaking as the intensity increased. He could feel it inside, as did everyone else. The player of that harp was close. Now the arm that embraced him, the once of his friend let go of him, and he did not fall down as he thought he would, without a pillar to hold him. 'Go to her.' He said, whilst the other whispered to them. A fair number of people around, everyone was preparing for something that did not get his eye, nor his desire to see. 'Her?' He asked, barely glimmering with his eyes, appearing more normal than they once were. The light from there was not taken but merely moved away from once place to another. Warmth now filled his chest, moving away from there after being pointed towards where she played her song. The harp was big as he saw it from where he stood, just standing behind a wall. 'So tall.' He said, with a tone that some of them thought to be one of the whimpers. One said, covered behind the others, knowing he wouldn't be heard if he was silent enough. 'Is he supposed to protect us? Didn't they say he's already taken four of our ranks.' 'Shh, let him be.' Tius blocked their mutter, his decision being purely strategic of what he wanted to achieve. No whisper of bad thought could come back to him, at least not until the meeting was done. He moved his eyes in a manner that they understood not to speak until they were told, it was already a mistake that they did before. Luckily for both cases, the man did not hear. Simply overwhelmed and shy, if the harp was so long and golden, to have hands that would reach that high meant that the woman playing it could've been almost as tall as it. His mind hadn't much time to adjust, after so many years, being devoid of some emotion he did not feel before. 'Go on. She doesn't mind company when she's playing.' The skin was white and perhaps that was the only image that travelled his mind, milk white softly going on the golden strings in motions at times unseen. I'm not sure what I could say to her. Went through his mind, without having an idea of what he looked like. Step followed by step, they watched him go almost like watching an animal being pulled towards something he liked. Although in this came, it wouldn't be that far-fetched. Perhaps my decision wasn't the best, hopefully, it will work. Tius' plan went inside his head over and over again, trying to check if everything was in order, if anything was missed or not. Easy, he thought, just a turn and their eyes would meet. She was announced but at the same time, she wasn't. Not a moment passed with her knowing what or how the one that would appear in front of her appear like. Nor what would he say. Her name was Eclipse and what he did to her best of capabilities was play her harp. String after string, her fingers were not hurt, whatever did she sprinkle on the tips of it worked. Battered salt from the springs, dipped inside the water inside a small plate she held on a table near her. That way, she'd never run out of it and be able to play for hours. People came at her from time to time as the way she played the instrument made others work hard. A tune that not only raised morale but prove to even be able to make someone who didn't even show signs of being able to feel. Her eyes widened as she heard. 'Hi.' For a second distraught but did not stop from playing her harp, as it was still attuned. She cleared her throat as she felt a sudden discomfort inside her stomach after he came to be. 'Hello.' The other direction was now in her sight, as for him, he followed the subtle tone given by her. Many like her and the family she was from were driven from early childhood to train and perform various exercises to be better. And at the same time they were never trained in being able to interact as well as other in the social endeavours. Either it was showing now so well, or perhaps like any other normal human, she didn't know how to respond in such of the situation. He thought he offended her because something he said or done. Perhaps I should've have chosen, but even the sight of it, her finger slipping without watching, the glances that meet. Though she couldn't see inside the helmet, too dark to be. But behind him was the old man's gaze and she knew better than to disobey. 'Would you.' Another second was taken since her neck was stuck, perhaps it was the salt that kept being carried by the wind, landing inside her nostrils, in-between. 'Like to join me?' 'I'm.' But he still hadn't remembered his name. She changed the look on her face, perhaps it was something she thought of what he said. Ignoring an order from Tius wasn't something people would do, especially someone like her who would depend on the well doing of others. An old memory of someone like him, coming from the voice perhaps, ignoring what was over his body and even within? 'Come closer.' She said, the tone of her voice warmed too, enough to rival the one in his chest. Around the camp, they weren't surprised anymore, the small group that gathered went back to their tasks on a whim. 'May I?' 'You may.' He asked and she responded, their voices were blended and tender. Slightly uncomfortable despite her previous attempts, what she did not account for was how disrespectful he was. Of his own size too as the matter called. He did not feel nor see but a fraction of his armour rubber against her arm, causing a slight, if not a measurable discomfort. Nothing more but a huff came out of her, despite what she always felt, this came first to her. I have to focus, just. Pretend he's not there, perhaps it will become more bearable. But he eyes still glared at the old man, slightly moving his chin and scratching it. A subtle message perhaps. 'Do not anger me girl. We need him focused and on our side, so do what you must if you've got to.' His voice echoes to her, passing the notes of music but just a slight over his ears, nor would he hear any of what was sent between the two of them. Charmed like that, he left them, walking towards the ones he had to give his timely lead report. A council he willed, despite not coming out of his own temper, they were nothing more but a bunch of fools. Sent by yet another council to keep him in order, after being demoted so many times. Even more pitiful that the once giant halls with glaring statues, diamond-like and looking back were now laying in a distant dream. He now had to resort to standing in a tent. Unguarded. 'No guard again?' He asked, as the curtains were lead and moved aside by his slimmer arm. Two were eating and another was looking under the table, not to mention that there should've been at least four more that were not present. Tius would've normally had their heads for this, that, if he had the authority to do so. 'Am I disturbing?' His voice rang through their heads like sand through a duster, making their plates hit the ground. No intent was shown that they'd lower themselves to clean themselves, age had it that perhaps they've grown too fat to do their own bindings. Bitter too. 'Oh, if it isn't the old crane, coming back like a lap dog with its tail behind its back. Has your plan went accordingly?' His friend laughed. Tius looked at their pathetic attempt as an attack as he did with everything that came out of their mouths. Not caring much to answer that, thought one thing surprised him. The man was now under the table without any constraint nor wanting to join the bitter conversation they were having. He complied. 'So, I doubt I've missed anything of great importance unless we've suddenly received field reports and you're looking for them under there.' One hand was clenched into a fist which ended up bashing the table, making the collision with the head that laid under it very much possible. A grunt came from there, followed by laughter from their side. 'Are you mad?' The voice resting under his eyes said. 'What was that? It's really hard hearing you there.' 'Then come down to my level so we would converse.' The proposal didn't seem to be too exquisite for him to refuse, and from the sight of it and the other too, he wasn't. Tius would lower himself to the only one he seemed to support and from the likes of it, appease. Not that he had another choice. And unsurprisingly he didn't expect to see, almost a cavern under the table, no wonder why what was he looking for wasn't found yet. Vincent wasn't like the others, especially not the ones from the camp, he was much stronger despite time trying to take that away from him. 'What have you done Vincent?' Despite what was spoken, other wouldn't hear it, muffled by the depths of under the table, nor would the two of them would have any interest to see. Speaking to one another at last. 'Finally alone again.' Two brothers like figures, thinking they'd easily have the advantage over the other, especially since the old for wasn't in the way anymore. 'Damn that Tius, has he not understood that he's not our leader?' 'Give him time my dear Condous, it's not like he can nibble his way with our plans. After all, we have to remember, he's been thrown out of havens for reasons.' 'But, he still had the chance to experience lordship hasn't he?' 'Oh Condous, you still don't understand, do you?' It wasn't like them to be like that in front of other people, speaking only in silence and with a foot out of the tent, that way, they would've felt someone approaching. No ear waxed nor on eavesdropping onto them, measurements for that were taken. 'Could I try then.' But he was quickly thrown away, stroking his golden beard and locket in his hand. 'You wouldn't be able too, Vincent made sure we wouldn't be able to know.' 'Could it be plotting then?' 'Regardless of what it is, we'll make sure they won't get to it, won't we?' A grin came onto his face as they decided to leave the tent. Something was planned against the two of them as they were left alone in the midst of preparing. 'So why are you here? You haven't responded?' Tius' question finally flew to the ears. He looked around, seeing stalactites almost as high as he was, some other broken and laying, barely fallen. Rocks and formations that wouldn't normally be there, the depths of which could've gone for miles, definitely not as far as the table went. 'There's a traitor within the council.' Vincent's words resonated with Tius but he didn't care, making sure that he'd get the message. He hadn't care much for it, as he learned that a long time ago, being so normal from the place he came from. He suddenly found himself staring as a crossroad with someone that he felt closely attached. Neck tied and around him a hand, pulling him closer. 'Listen here, I do not care of what you've grown accustomed from the place you're from. But this concerns all of us.' With an easy flick of the hand, the grasp that taken his neck was removed. Tius told him immediately after he was repelled, with a small burn on his hand too. 'Let there be a trainer, It'd be more amusing that way. I've come here, expecting for everyone into the council to present my findings.' And are they present?' Vincent wasn't dull enough to not get the subtle messages, despite being accustomed to being more direct, hints of something being wrong were immediately taking note of. 'No.' At the sudden word, they were both pulled outside by their will, suddenly awoken in the middle of the fire. Vincent turned to him and told him quick, right before suddenly dodging from falling bits of the tent they were still in. Burning too. 'Is it still not your problem?' Tius was certainly not amused by the grin and the blooming sense of humour he displayed. Surrounded by flames that would rival the sky, they waited, hearing a chance to the tune. It came out of nowhere. A simpleton felt after seeing a sudden burst of flame, a trail of smoke rising up towards the stars from the camp. He ran to account the others, without realising that the position he was, the distance from the single well inside the camp from which they could take water to take down the fire was too far. Too far for them to reach in time. The fire spread as it wasn't normal and the two of them still found the time to converse about it. 'Can we not hide inside your insidious cove?' Tius asked, backing away from the fire slowly coming forth. They couldn't run through and the fire would jump and gnaw at their ankles. Nor did he think much of it, he knew that there'd be a way, even if he'd end up using Vincent's body in order to assure his own escape from the impending inferno. 'It doesn't look that bright for us, does it?' He didn't see his shifty eyes for he was distracted. Someone was shouting outside and they couldn't see. But from a side, he came charging, their knight in armour, bursting through the flaming tent and flames. Another formation of people was made and they were starring, throwing sand and trying to shout the flames out of there. 'Come on, we need the water.' Said a woman, sending a few of them, buckets and everything. A thud came and momentarily they were distracted. Their eyes thought to be deceived when it revealed to be him, denying all flames that would now rabble at his feet, unaffecting. 'Is this the one you went for?' Out of his robe, Vincent grabbed a flagon to drink. 'I thought you did not know. No matter, that can wait, until we're out of this.' The fool wasn't mad at the sound of it, but couldn't hide how happy he was, with the parts of the tent, still of fire and falling by. Despite that, he still managed to find some time to do so. 'Follow me, quickly!' The voice change, at least that's what Tius thought as he heard it.

Fallen maiden

Eroded from not being able to escape, he glanced at her captor. The fingers almost like a prison, the words that were once muttered to her were said and written. 'Cross my finger and you'll die, I'll eat your heart before you fall. You're free to leave at any time.' The words hung on inside her memory, thinking about escaping with every second, as she watched below, seeing the degeneration sleep within itself. 'Am I not going to be granted at least a chance?' Her expression was pale now, all the way from olive, the time she spent near left a mark that she made well to not forget. Perhaps it was because of the substance running through the fingers of his. It burrowed itself, flashes and small flying puffs that flew and entered her skin. With no prior knowledge, she could only try to predict what would happen over a longer exposure of such a thing. 'I'm going to die if I don't leave this place,' she said as she watched the tips of her hands turn whiter in front of her eyes. Softer too as she touched the longer ones that were holding her in the cell. 'I need to go, this won't last for much longer.' She flailed her arms and felt what it's done to her, softer to the very core of her bones. Truth was that if she stood longer in her place, she'd shatter to a white puss that would only find itself moulded to the fingers. That thought kind of ran through her hand. With the corner of her eyes she saw. 'Were those humans once?' The giant hand was holding her up, twisted on the side so she wouldn't easily escape without waking him up. 'Shut Blarg Yer trap.' He said, although accompanied by snoring with nothing else. The only escape as it was told, after pondering on what was left was the one going up. And even with that, she wouldn't survive the fall. Nor will I survive if I stay much longer, they certainly didn't, if they once shared the same situation as I am right now. Two hands followed as she started to scratch, wanting to desperately wake him up. No luck with each try. The skin's too thick, not to mention I'd only get more of those chemicals on my body. 'Can you even hear me you loaf?' She yelled at him but no response, in the small opening that revealed through, part of his body laid rotten and broken. Not many ribs left and no bottom part of the legs, something kept the creature living, yet she had no explanation for it. Two hands, a head, some organs that were revealed, she has seen her fair share along the way here. Which did more than explain why she didn't puke at the immediate sight, but perhaps she thought? 'This puss that's slowly eating me and adding to his hand, perhaps that's the way he's. You're feeding yourself, isn't it?' Curiosity didn't do much to help her at a time like this one. And she did efforts to make herself understand, trying her best to climb, grabbing some parts that were solid, pulling herself further to the above. 'Damn, this will not do.' The concerns left her mouth, and she thought, on the way back down that it wasn't going to be easy. Held captive until her death, she couldn't reach despite her every attempt. A swear each time and with each fall too, her body started to brittle. The once admired complexion of hers started falling off. There's no way out for me, she thought, obsessing over it as she fell to her knees praying to her gods. 'I beg of you, my lord melting, your repugnant body forever swelling.' She did something she wouldn't believe she'd do, praying to a god forbidden too. The latter one of her pantheon, a repugnant friend, perhaps the symbol of it dwelling within the body of the one she was held captive by. In her mind, the future wasn't what she once expected to be, no children to bear, no family to wear her off. Nothing would expect her but fading into the obscurity of a monster that's dying, being tied to it in the final moments of his life. The skull wasn't even placed right, the face breaking off with each snort it took, yet everything it had stood tall and proud, in the form of a hand, sucking her life. 'Is this your doing, if so, I beg you to stop.' Perhaps it's his will to watch me like that, becoming part of what we hated the most, his eyes watching and grinning at my attempts. 'I give me life to you my lord.' The room she was in slightly more lit as the words were spoken, forbidden as they were, perhaps even corrupted in the eyes of others. But she was desperate, especially as she took it as a sign, a library like this one lit, with no one else within? What other explanation could there be? 'I do not want to die my lord, I give you my life to rot and pester in your afterlife, the worsen fates that I deserve.' She muttered but couldn't cry, that's the last thing she could do. Tales told of those who did such mockery while praying in front of him, flies and grubs would find themselves nesting in the eyes from where they came. Desperate yet fearful, she made sure some precautions were taken, the knees spread to the point, exactly as they were needed with no inch farther than they should. Hand crunched like fists and she could feel a pair of grubs forming and held within. She remembered of hearing a ritual of such before, not only for him but others, but never did it cross her mind that she'd get the chance to perform one. 'Roots and stones for the bones, a slicker that's most known to most. But if you fail to gather them for some reason, among the other materials needed, you'd better pray. Pray that you'll know. Pray that you've known pain before and grown accustomed to it. I could hear the voice of the priestess clear in my head, recounting the ritual that one would go through at the age, having it in mind as I underwent through it. The pain came not long, her words hit me like sand bolts shot through my body. As weak as it already was. 'You'll have clenched your hands as for a prayer, that goes without saying. But one thing that we're despised and thought as inhuman, even at such a lower, an insignificant part of our prayer, is because what we're forced to went through. We need to clench our hands as hard as we can, at the point where we risk crushing them to the bone, to blood. Oh and if it only was the pain, that's not the least of the concerns.' Her eyes as she stared at me whilst saying it, knowing that I was near other, many people in the room standing and praying altogether. Expressionless. My neck couldn't move and I wasn't able to swallow my concern, I asked her to continue, wanting to know more. Apparently, she said. 'Grubs will form, inside of them, a known part of the ritual, went by beast and human alike, by anyone doing such for the lord in prayer. They will eat through your hands and go through you bloody, you won't be able to stop them from devouring your body. Well at least if you don't truly believe and not filled with faith, the loss of it will have you dead.' The pain kicked in as I did something I didn't think I'd dare, I felt them, many coming, my hand were already seemed to be pushed from a fist, disgusting pests were railing within. 'I beg of you, you'll use that often.' Her voice rifle and I did as she said, trying my best to fight through the pain, skin and blister would follow if I was rejected, something that couldn't happen if I still wished for an escape. 'I give my soul and won't take back. I'd give anything through pain and suffer. My soul, my body, my only offer.' And I was reminded of what was said, even more now as I prayed, stuffing my fist as hard as I could. 'They won't be crushed, they'll be too hard, but only shoved deeper into your arm, at least the first time you do so you'll be judged. It depends on who takes the ritual and how he ponders, his face within face within the face that boasts on your suffering. So much it will last and you will scream, no one will hear anything, many of the grubs will have momentarily take it from you.' The throat felt filled with them, making sure no sound would leave their bodies, further attempts would only make them grow bigger, which wasn't her intention. Hand in hand with her captor, it felt to her almost as if both of them were praying, even worse now to think that they'd do it for the same one. Push harder, you can do this. She said in her mind, remembering what was to be said next and was to come. 'I'm sure you'll do fine, If. If you decide.' And how badly she was to say if, without realising that in the future she'd get to re-enact what she saw. Her body now sank and she couldn't see but feel concentrate. Now, the only words of prayer that could be heard by the malignant deity were the ones sprouting out of her exposed mind. 'Chanting and saying his words, exactly as they are and how they wore. You laid broken by your brothers, Abandoned like any other, Yet you refused to die and have not stopped, I ask of you to give me the same likes to stop the rot.' The skin decay stopped, that she felt at the point in her mind reached it, the pale white skin lumps weren't floating out of her. But it was not over yet, as it was known, deep inside. She has betrayed one of her past thought about gods, which was a sacrilege. 'They will grow rabid and filled with puss, they will start decaying in your mouth. This is the important girl, you'd better listen. One that prays for the first time must have everything in mind if the disciple is to survive. You must've puke them, despite how ranching they would taste, neither if the taste of blood and them melting inside would invite you to do otherwise.' The act now laid in her mind with no requirements that were needed. Her mind was rotten but it wasn't caused by the grubs, none of them got that far nor would they in any case. She was reluctant, even with her eyes close and half of the battle fought through as she displayed it. The sacrifice laid outside her body but there was no one to witness the act, or so she thought. That monstrosity won't get the best of me, I'll make sure of it, she thought. And in a second of clarity, she realised something that wasn't brought by the witch that once informed her about the ritual, but of another. One that had little chances, not to mention that it was already unstable with everything that went on. She improvised, even with her thoughts shallow, even more as she more than likely already spoken them wrong. But what she did not realise, even as the hand that held her started to break apart, among with the atrocity holding her. Was that she was favoured by the god, a sick, twisted and repulsing desire for her then went on. The eating has stopped as the words were said. 'And now for what is worth, I give you my body, I give you my name, I give everything that holds me inside this plane.' Despite being turned to deeply in her mind, they were heard. Grubs stopped eating through, instead merely walking through the system she had, every vein inside of her contain at least a few of them. Shrunk, not as huge as they were, the skin that was lost, the exposed part, every single part of her regenerated at last. Her sight regains and she felt it, for a second, clarity, her sadness and what made her human fade away. How he once was virtuous, magnificent, a deity of righteousness, before the betrayal, she was now turned to feel a fragment of how he truly was. Radiance of such that the light emitted from her body started melting the skin and what remained of the body of the beast holding her. A jaw that fell, the sound of it cracking in half echoes throughout the room, the ribs that danced and what was left of him within. Her eyes now opened and saw no room, it was almost as if she was somewhere else. 'Am.' Both of her hands reached her mouth and she felt it, the words flying through, she could now speak again. A burning sensation in her chest told her she could do it freely, though it wasn't hurting at all, but warming the insides. No weight under her feet, no pain and no feelings of scorn. 'Is this what it feels like to live among them?' An image of someone not far, he laid alone wearing no armour, turned behind. A grace enveloped her and the scent of insight could be felt coming from him. Compelled, she forgot herself and decided to reach him. A small leap and her feet would never have to reach the ground, hovering, barely, just to get to him at last. With a flicker, she used her right hand to turn him around. 'Who. Are you?' But her heart sank as she has pulled away, a grief and two other that she couldn't see. Others came and started bashing, stabbing and attacking. Blunt weapons and ones sharp, a hammer that would shatter even the planet's crust. Still pulled away, she yelled at him. 'Nooo! Let go.' Struggle but no way to get free, she watched as they made him fall to his knees, despite every blow, breaking through to the point where she could see his skull. His beauty, the form, crushed and broken. She shouted even louder, still in the room, with no company to witness but the mice and other small creatures looming around. His shoulders cracked, she saw one ripped, an arm that wouldn't let go, a life that refused to sink, as she felt. Pushed through the clouds and the land they were on, they forced him to fall, to be broken and still he refused to die. The image you saw. A voice rang in her mind. Is what you imagined, the betrayal of mine was beyond what you could understand. It felt as if one of those hammer stroke her out of it, a fraction of what he felt, of what really happened. Just the mere fragment of it made her cover herself up. Not being able to contain what he felt. Finally, as it was safe, she releases the contents of her stomach, everything that was eaten off the floor. The voice still came, now that she was done speaking inside, afraid not to anger. In the corner of her eye, all that remained were the bones of it, the rest was eaten by the worms that got out of her. She recognised the scent of her blood, knowing that that must've been them. Not as decayed or corrupted as one would think, he allowed her to witness and understand what happened. 'You've given your life and saw what was worth it, live now as a servant of mine.' The voice, as it went, felt not only inside her head but the mouth, the taste, the fragrance, and in her blood. Quickly her hands shuffled around the veins around her arm, noting what she's seen before. Lumps that moved around in the temple where she met that damn witch and others before. 'Are those the grubs inside of me?' She asked, after an awaited period of time, done without her knowing through not immediately punished. He was not one for that as she was just one of many that decided to follow, in no way would he do such an undeserving act. 'You're now mine and I await you below, to rot with me along the others.' She'd take the form after she'd die, becoming a lump in the bigger body of her god. The voice stopped soon after, the judgement and an eternity would be spoken about much later if she was lucky. To be given again the chance to speak with her new lord. Though. She looked the other way before helping herself out. 'Was this worth it?' The place seemed to shatter too, undoubtedly, as smaller blue grubs, the longer that the ones before, eating the dust and stone in front of her. A deal that was struck and all the evidence was about to be erased. The door that was sealed released immediately revealing the light. With her hand, she protected her, even as it was amplified by her reflective milky skin. She has never seen grubs so white, nor would she ever get to see any of them, other than the ones that dwelled within her body. Slowly she went outside with a beating heart, strong ribs and an able body. Her mind shaken but she will recover, all of them prior did, though none of them forgot what happened within. What they sacrificed and how it made them feel, regardless of what fraction and what imaged they've seen. Her feet encountered the feeling of cold stone after finally touching it outside of the vague room she was in. She hadn't known how much it passed nor what waited for her outside. Surely whatever once dwelled inside the catacombs and the verdant hall died a long time ago. No sustenance nor heat, she fell on her knees and passed out, as green puffs of smoke emerged. The first slab she just released after raising her feet for another. A strange occurrence happened, in her mind nothing but a lucid dream, she thought before passing out. How else could she explain the delusion she saw, the things that ripped at her, the given soul to a voice in her head? Luck was still tipped in her favour even now as she wasn't aware, even unconsciousness, left to dream. But luck indeed would have someone other walk around the catacombs as he was sent to find her. It wasn't immediate but following an awaited signal. Alone, a man with a neck that bowed, a scar on his cheek, running up to the chin. He recounted the reflection on the wall, but there weren't mirrors inside. A reflective type of polished substance, used to craft the catacombs and make them last, for what purpose though? 'Bah, I need only payment.' He said out loud, a bold move to leave yourself open in front of a passer. Yet there were none in sight, he thought and surely they wouldn't be hiding and waiting for an ambush. No, this place was too old and ancient to hone such beasts. Then why was I paid to search for a woman, especially in an abandoned place like this one? No information was given to him about the whereabouts of her. Nor what she looked like. 'Bandits that must be it?' He asked out loud again, still as boldly as before, barely bent down and picking at corners, trying to see but hardly as dark as it was after the gates were closed behind his back upon his arrival. It wouldn't surprise me if they actually did make this old thing into their hideout. Small leaps were taken as he thought, there wouldn't really be any traps now. He had some insight gained by generations of his family, a fra yaar indeed, thought the heavy heads wasn't gained from them. That came with time, so did the choosing of the profession, often disregarded by other from his family. Which brought him here, half a mercenary and half dreamer, trying to make out the best of at least one of them. Though, oddly. Perhaps it came from a combination of the both, the nimbleness of a floating child, or one that would be tied so he'd not fall. Whatever it was, he avoided every slab and every bent step, in a way avoiding all traps without a mistake. Neither did the harshness break those traps, as it was crafted by craftsmen of the time before. 'Why am I even wasting my time?' A question to himself which came followed by another, though it came sharp and it came loud. Foolish to do and bear such a thing. 'Are you here girl?' A crevice was open, which he looked into, empty rooms and a lot of dust. 'Nothing to loot.' He had many looks and the time to do it, but the place was as it was left, which made him ask himself. Surprisingly as most of the times before he'd just ignore or not give more than a thought. A place like this and empty-headed, how could this be? Even if there were bandits so to speak, it looked picked clean. Vases laid on tables, inside of them there was no dust nor cobwebs. Too clean for such a place, especially since the edges and corners were dirtier than the room he previously spends the night in. He opened his mouth after approaching the wall and breathe upon it. Dust came for the air released by him and claimed it for its own, no objection there. With his hands, he rubbed it against, leaving the mark of his coming but he realised it soon enough. 'This was placed here recently.' A bad habit now became of it which he also hasn't previously encountered, nor would he notice. Am I getting affected by this place and if so, has my decision been a misjudged one? Though, even if it was so in his thought. He still had to rescue her, he'd not turn his back. Word travels fast across the land, Feryn the runaway, the one that'd be afraid of dusty hallways and placed dust. No, he continued, returning to his search. He stopped in front of the door's tip and made a small leap. 'Hah, I've almost forgotten.' Appearing as it was normal, exactly what he intended. It came to mind that perhaps someone was watching his moves, one that could turn out to be more than a fleeing bandit or a kidnapper. I have to find her fast and carry her out, the poor kid must be scared to death. Even with the mood down a few feet, he still found time to make himself appear as the righteous one, turning the fantasy of him being a coward into one close to a god. The rewards, the renown, surely in the mouth of a kid, my tales would only spring. Fiends, bandits and worse, attacked her and could've done worse. He then stopped. Something felt, barely going down his throat as he tried swallowing. Mid-set as if he was about to have another leap but one of his feet was now slightly lowered. With the turn of the head and with the dim lit corridor, he saw that a slab was slightly lowered. I was wrong. He didn't think there'd be much and there could still be a chance, perhaps the mechanism activated by it would be too old to function. Irony. He looked above and saw a white figure, far but close, only seeing the image of a girl. She laid down, that much he understood, perhaps either resting or passed out. Not in a room nor too far, with no one around to watch or see her now. The problem at hand, he tumbled down, curled into a ball, trying to get as much distance as he could forward ahead. His eyes closed as he did it, as he couldn't look. A second passed after he stopped rolling at the bottom. Have the gods rules in my favour he asked himself? While not hearing any other sounds of something that happened, or any other that'd be stepped into whilst on the way. Dusting himself back up, he saw it well enough and soon realised. 'So you were broken after all.' The image that laid was a slab that was now stuck. What he hasn't seen though and probably wouldn't notice was that it was stuck on a lace, ripped apart from his shoe on the way down. A simple yet strong one, made by his family, one that would rule over the trade, amplified by the finest spider silk, quite fitting for the place. 'Now.' He turned and backed a few steps, being scared. Already was his heart beating since the thought of seeing something that wasn't there, a monster was it? Nothing but the skull of a bull that now ignored, he went for the reason he came, the girl. But slowly as his memory didn't let him. Is this a trick, is she a trap laid for me to come and capture her? Surely she wouldn't just be kidnapped and left there, perhaps evaded? The girl didn't appear as one the closer he got, but a fully grown woman, unexpected. Standing in front of a room that reeked as if someone was long dead in there. The sight and the smell were enough to make him run and grab her. The corners, left and right, he's taken looks, followed by one behind. He had to be sure that he wasn't getting paranoid for no reason, it was important for him to make sure she'd come down safe. 'Here you go.' So light, and slippery. Her touched her waist and placed her on the shoulder. The neck was fine and still breathing, though with no mirror to check, he came closer as if to see. But stopped. 'You're still alive.' His beating heart was now pulsating even more blood and in his mind it rang. No, I must focus, we need to get out so I could get my reward. This place already was swallowing itself from the looks of it. Still with no trust left, he decided to run ahead and take no care of anything that would come in his path, no more jumping and no more leaps. And yet, still no more traps activated at whims. The crackling of a thunder came but it wasn't from outside, that enough was transmitted to him by his trusting ear. Already slowed from the extra weight on his shoulder, he didn't turn. Nor did he risk attempting such a thing and letting go of her. 'It must've come from inside. I knew something was wrong.' 'Aaah.' A moan came but still unconsciousness, the bad condition of the place they were in wasn't the great. The dust must've filled inside her lungs, the darkness of the place must've taken the colour of her skin too. An unnatural tone he thought after having a closer look on the hand that laid just a bit in front of him, flailed with the sudden changes in his movements. Again, he stepped on a slab, the same one he had previously touched, but then. Suddenly released, it made the whole catacomb crawl, the walls changing on the whim of a single slab. It was almost as if, the whole structure was built around a single point that would destabilise the whole structure. And the chance, out of thousand of verdant slabs, to get the precise one, not to mention add another amount of weight over it would be impossible to get. Each slab being tailored for one person, specifically, one, which sounded impossible. He disregarded and hadn't any clue about it being a test, for both of them. Eyes were thrown and looked on sides. Debris was falling from the sky. It was sinking down, slabs were dancing, it would've been easier for him to avoid every single one of them if it weren't for the weight that dragged him down. No more leaps, no more banter, he focused his eyes on getting each right one. The one's rounder aren't good, remember. After almost slipping because of one of them, he took a note. More blunt, with edges uneven, those were the ones he went for, a slim jump from one to another. He looked below as they started to shift away, revealing the mechanism and the rhythm that occurred there. Lots of pipes stored on blocks that were connected with each slab below. A strong light was emitted as the mechanism started to run again, something that would've gotten and wouldn't have let go of his sight if it were in any other situation. But he had to ignore it for now and continue, unevenly measuring and going ahead. She saw in, though. In her dream, a man approached her but didn't speak. A giant stream of roses below of her, being carried by a someone in armour. 'Are you him?' She asked, still confused as if the ritual hasn't ended yet, the gas might've temporarily altered her state. Yet the effect hasn't truly taken care, as the little grubs have granted a strong resistance to most gases and poisons. Another gift that remained untold, a blessing in disguise. And still, she thought. I'm being tested, being held. Should I break free, or would I face unspoken consequences? Unarmed and still frail, she thought to be taken still away from the cage she was in. 'Fine, then get me towards the world outside, I've waited for far too long.' But he didn't hear her as she was still sleeping, having no idea how many close calls laid there. And how many times indeed she would've fallen. Marks of the walls, all made of the insides of those grubs. 'Bah, even worse now.' He was slightly disgusted as they joined the debris, falling from the ceiling too. The smell was much to take and the imagery, perhaps the worse. A few turn and not too far that he'd get to the point where he'd see it. The gates. He yelled, with a gust that knocked away debris and the maggots, travelling at a speed and strength that pushed both gates open. A pay of foot, he had to do it not. He saw some retracting below and the insight he had finally came to fruition. The patterns they went, how some slabs suddenly vanished into the ground just to raise themselves at an ungodly speed and bash the ceiling in their harsh motion. 'If this keeps going, it will collapse everything above of us.' He hadn't much care now to think of anything else, after realising that any room for error would mean the death. Even worse as both of their lives depended on him. One slab suddenly lifted from the right, so the next one immediately after, they followed in pairs. It helped him a lot, now holding her new companion with both of his hands so he'd not flail. Only his feet and ears worked now as the eyes wouldn't do anything else but betray him. He heard in his back how it worked, two pairs, one in front and two in the bottom. A break, where he'd jump as much as he could, trying to get as many slabs possible. The exit wasn't close neither was far. He stopped, after calculating at nothing but an inch. 'Aaaagh.' A sigh was released as the sudden block of iron and stone almost managed to break his nose. He went around after. Not far, concentrate on the sounds, they will reveal. He thought now of himself as no one else was there to do it for him. Still unconscious, the shrubbery started changing colour, in a dark stone red and cold, so much. One that made her remember, as it came from her back, the gust of wind being directed at her spine. 'Where are we going?' She asked, still not realising she'd get no answer. Perhaps I'm supposed to be silent and wait. Wait for a chance, any, though, the witch, that priestess as she'd call herself, she hadn't mentioned a vision or anything like this. Their doing would soon come to an end. He rushed through what seemed to form a wall of raising pillars that would either crush or block their path. Doubt now came to his mind. 'I won't make it in time. No, I can do this.' He looked over his shoulder getting ready to correct himself on the matter. 'No, we can do this.' His breath was held against him so he'd act and notice clearer, less to think of and more on the instinct. It told him clear and he swore to himself that a voice he'd hear. Inside his head, one started speaking, making him confused at first. Is he awake? But as it started forming, slightly distracting from the now mindless trail, the system and the prediction of the slab. The dodging of the falling stone, rocks and grubs became now second nature to him. Thought one thing wasn't, which scared him. A voice that whispered almost in his ears and mind, it couldn't be her, he thought. I can still hear her breath going and nowhere the voice, nor did he know what she sounded like. Floating grubs in front of him by the time that voice manifested. He tried rushing but suddenly it said. 'Follow the light.' The light? He questions it, was he referring to the one that came from outside? 'No.' Again the voice muttered, blocks that now seemed to broke off, the entrance suddenly covered by fallen rocks, giant in size, even bigger than the one he had seen before. He refused to move after. Already pointless, seeing how a wall now raised and blocked what already wasn't there. For him and her, there was already just one thing left to do. 'Down.' Every slab then raised immediately with no delay up to the top of the ceiling, blocking everything at his every dismay. For a second he thought they'd both be crushed, but no. 'So tight.' Said and there was no echo for him to hear, leaving enough room for them to be tightly crammed inside the box that'd be formed. 'Then how am I supposed to go there?' He asked the voice out loud, thinking that it was confirmed. I was sure of it, a trap from the very beginning, now I'm to be tormented and die along her. 'Worry not and you'll be lowered.' Slightly shaken, his feet almost left him. He was afraid of heights. Such a height it was indeed, which made him both anxious and frightened. One wrong step or even tilt and the whole weight would make them fall, toward the place there the stones melted above. It seemed to him that he was lowered inside of a whirlpool made of stone. Many formations of rock seemed to resemble melting wax, perhaps something similar, they stood there almost as pillars to defend the system that laid below. Everything made and controlled, he realised. 'Controlled over here.'He was pulled away by bigger hands, the ones that sorted all the block, every single one that was placed there.But it took a second before they released, they felt motion, recognising it as a sign to stop.'Aaah.'He was about to released a scream as it came unexpectedly to take him.Composure came soon after it was done, making him stop, a bit of a limb and a flicker.The two feet had to stand and they still weren't at a safe height to avoid falling to their deaths.He watched now silently as they kept moving and in his mine, after observing it happen.It was them who went there and shoved them up.Such strength must've had despite not sensing it, yet he saw them manoeuvre the pillars with their slick moves and proper texture.It occurred to him that those weren't normal hands like he had.The distance between them and his was now far enough that he could easily compare them.Bones wouldn't be placed like they'd normally be, a small bent across a narrow tip, they were made to wrap around and be squarish.Just a touch to be able to move the pillars up and down.Under them, he looked too after.'They're sprouting from the ground.'Aah.'Hold on, we'll get to the bottom of this.'Despite unconscious, it reassured him to hear even a fragment of a voice as it didn't fall on deaf ears.Though his shoulder slightly numb, not as his feet felt, making him think that they'd get to the point where they'd have to rest.It was a bad idea, especially with those giant things lurking around.'No, I can pull this out.'But his voice was heard.He saw it but his brain didn't respond fast enough to sent to his legs.The hands came across the air and grabbed both of them, separating the group they held and keeping them tight.At two opposite ends they were being brought and regardless of how hard he tried, he could not.'Let go of me, I've made a promise.'Thought there was something that neither of them knew.Her life wasn't belonging to her anymore, the chamber already decided that a failure he, though.The hands that almost floated through, the ones that wanted to drive her into the deepest hell they've known.'Wait!'He yelled something that did happen previously reminded of what would've happened if yet another vow would be broken.'I'd rather have my own life taken.'He said and the hands stopped.This is insane, his next thought said.Another set of hands pulled out of the ground, filled with a bitter promised, coming from the same place the others were.A quill and paper?How quaint for a pair of hands.The seal that held him slightly lowered itself to give some room to breathe.He cleared his throat next and said.'Bring me the girl I say, or I'll give nothing more today.'Perhaps he had something worth, someone, who was still tied to his mortality and had something to give.The girl would've been thrown away but the man, perhaps a test too.No, this was different, the man thought, something was off.He thought of encounters with demons, pacts to be made, but nothing like at this size.Those hands and their makers clearly controlled the catacombs, surely no hatred filling being would go that far when they'd more easily just devour everything in their path.He recognised the seal but couldn't remember, never has he been tied to the gods, nor did he really believe in their existence.'Bah.'His stomach ached as a hand bashed through the one holding him.'The one with the quill.'A hand was released as one finger lifted itself.'But I don't know what to give.'By this time and hour, it's been some that passed.It was now time for her to regain her sight.A blurry vision followed by the smell of cinder and smoke.The moment she opened her eyes she gasped and was almost shocked to her very core, awakening in the cage that imprisoned her before.Have I given my soul for nothing?She asked herself, soon to realised, after looking around, tightly caught too.There's another one.He had a quill marked with blood and ink ready to write down something.'Wait.'She said, interrupting him from sealing his fate.It wasn't the best timing nor did she planned, in her mind, she knew, though.It was possible that she'd made a false pact with another, tricked by it.No time for this now, I have to prevent it.He was stunned by her, something that happened , neither because of the grasp nor by the previous encounter.'You mustn't.'Pain filled her as the hand started restraining her, no sign shown on the outside as it would only betray her reasoning.Away she looked, away from the alluring gaze as something else than a grim pact wanted his attention.'Sign it.'The voice in his head said.It kept going on and on.'Sign it.Sign it.You must sign it if you want to live.'He tried to throw the quill away but it seemed to have melted, the feather not being one but made of long worms elongated that have inserted themselves in his fingers.But this can't be, worms again, grubs before.Yet those hands were not his, the one that rots, could it be then I have fallen, lowered myself for another.Everything for nothing?At least she'd now get the satisfaction of another chance, to get back at it.'Do not do it, I've already.I've given myself just to be deceived, do you even know which god it is?'Her voice was so passionate, surprisingly as it came to her mind too.It worked like a charm in a way that everything she said would've had the same effect.It was almost as if he was listening and wasn't at the same time.She must be right, I'm mistaken then, but how?How could I tell her and betray what she so momentarily told me?With no idea in her mind, just the two of us being trapped by the hands, I could've been either a foe or worse.'But.'I took a moment to clear my throat, the hands that held me have given that too.Say what you will to her but make your choice, you will sign it nonetheless.He heard the voice again, but this time, he was more than sure, she wasn't hearing it as I was.No expression changed as that was spoken.Feryn continued.'What choice do we have?'He saw through her eyes and in between, a quick flicker as she signalled with a lower eyebrow and the twist of the cheek.They both were aware of the situation and what carried with it.After all, without previously realising it and after she made him aware of it, the hands stopped descending for a while and started ascending.So in case anything would happen, they'd drop to their deaths.That much they knew, a nod of the head at the right time might've helped with it too.'We can still try!'Her breath smelled of sunflowers and it felt to him out of place, as the place they were in, now unattended had a scent of cinnamon.No complain there as he hated it.Now it remained.Would I sign this deed or would I stray?'You must choose now, I'm giving you no time before throwing you into the abyss.'In my mind it ranges, I wasn't given much of a choice for the matter, either would I die by my hand of hers.I didn't want to be heard by her, afraid she'd be scorned by my betrayal.'Don't.'She stopped me again despite my hand not even moving.But the hand was quick and so was the finger, almost like a snake it wrapped itself around her mouth and started being more swollen by the second.It forces the grubs out of her body, back to where they came from.She felt nothing but tingles in part of her and nothing more.She wanted to scream but she couldn't.Out of the depths and the ground it revealed itself, the one that controlled the catacombs they were in.The same one they'd make the pact for.It was no god nor was it a deity.But that didn't mean they were out of danger.A set of extra hands came out of it enormous body, a smaller pair of two heads with mouths that were taken away revealed themselves from the oval form the enveloped them.It was safe for it to come out as no danger was sensed.'You will make a deal with me as she did.'The message came in both of their hands too soon realise what she's done.Dizzy and before, she felt her hands slips and thought of it.Was I even praying or did I sign?Still muffled she couldn't do much to bent on the part but she could swear on her life that there were other pairs of names written there.Only now it came to her and she couldn't warn him.Did he even know my name?Small entrails made of its beard and the neck almost reached the depths of the fingers of his.Now he faced the man as a beast, speaking only through his mind as anything else would be too lower for himself.Green for envy, it covered most of his body, but his skin was too mouldy to discover his true colours. One could even ponder what was the deal of this beast and why he sent for both of them to come here. No pact for a god was made, false visions were implanted. Yet, despite that fact, I still made a deal, deity or not. She thought as one of the heads slightly tilted to face her. It shared only a neck, only slightly splitting at the ends, leaving enough room for some bones, fragmented enough to allow only but the slightest turn. Suffice to say it was enough to make her fear. Again she tried and had a hard time, even biting through the restraints of hers, the aroma and taste were enough anyway. As the mouths weren't able to taste, he'd surely not keep us to kill and feed on us. It sought pacts to make. 'Indeed, now, sign the papers. Give me it and I will give you freedom, for both you and the girl.' 'No, don't trust him. She tried saying, despite knowing that it wouldn't work, it was aimlessly pointless to further attempt. Her eyes now bowed to him and pleasure came in the form of a gloomy grin she couldn't see. 'Fine. But will you keep your promise?' The question came to the fiend's mind, as another hand was raised to scratch his head and ponder. Would I keep my promise he asks me? Should I be questioned of such a thing? If I am to ascent to become such a being? Should I give it freely? Well. 'You've no choice in the matter, do you? Do not worry, I am not without sympathy, if it comes to betrayal, you shall not worry. As you will not be thrown but crushed inside my hands.' This time, he made it clearer, as the voice got louder in both of their heads, eh wasn't playing anymore nor messing with their lives. 'Fine, my. Souls are yours. And with that signature, it was sealed, the twelfth one to give his souls, to a beast that they didn't know. Neither did it know what it was doing, granting and getting souls through deceiver. As soon as it was thrown away, the two of them were cast the same way, at two opposite parts of the depths, without caring if they survived or not. He didn't keep his word nor did he care to recover what he's spent on both of them, grubs or the time that was given. The only thing he desired was twelve signatures and souls to get to the point where the promise of ascension was made. Fools, he thought, while making his way towards the exit through the cavern he's made. Past the machinery and the small hole in the ground, the one dug to make the place for himself. After sealing the document of the souls that were given, he rises through the next chamber in his place of creation. A giant hole that seemed to be rammed from the surface towards the place he's made. I will abandon, now finally after spending so much time inside of it. Never has he thought that he'd wait for such time, in the creation of his, whilst not being able to die. Close to being immortal but not quite, he had lost forgotten even what his race originally was. A deformed body and two heads, they were useless as it hadn't anything to them. Nor could he grab anything with them along the way, bending its body into an arc so it'd more easily fit into the tunnels he built. Now, what? It seemed, with the shake of the land above of him that it would be fitting. A good end for what he's done, the story of an ascension of a god. That the last original champions of his tried betraying him. Stopped in the middle, lost in his own egotistical approach, he took another parchment and more ink to go. It wrote on it the way that was relayed to him. Now to be more than it, a mindless creature. 'And so he's risen from the depths, carrying nothing but his champions' necks. They have sinned in their darkest hour, refusing to give their god the proper tower.' Hmm. Something didn't sound right enough in his mind, he wasn't clear, not god-like sounding in his words. Everything that was written by him, even in appearance was tainted. No one would understand me and if they don't? How could someone believe and give tribute to someone they don't know? I must return. But he then remembered, he had no idea what happened to them, after being thrown at such a distance. And even if they survived the fall, who could tell if they'd willingly trust him and properly bow. Giving him what he wants, even after tearing them so sour. But in his distraction he has not realised, an avalanche of rocks have fallen from beyond. As his head turned to see what was doing, both were crushed along with his body. Torn to pieces while back down, he found himself trapped again with the two he had betrayed. He was now stuck, same as them. 'A cave in.' She said, barely holding an arm over her ribs, watching how the beast fell within. A bigger part of what they were in fell onto him and broke his body in half. A scream of terror came after that echoed in the small room they were. It was a scene that laid in their minds for a while sinking in. But. He did not die. 'A punishment?' A voice said, one that silence him, and removed the thought of wonder why it was still alive. The voice, as it spoken to him overcame and shook the room. Such strength in one's voice that even the two that survived their falls were shaken and sent to the ground. The brain was still intact in the part that wasn't crushed or at least a part of it, so there wouldn't be any trouble functioning. 'You've taken my name but do not know.' The voice spoke again. His hand, the one that tried keeping the parchment safe, the one with the signatures was then lost, flying above and beyond his reach. 'Nooo.' It suddenly burst into an explosion, spreading everything on its every side of the enclosure. The place wasn't going to last, he thought. But am I punished for something I've done? The plan for him to become a deity has fallen, now that word has gotten, more than it. But for it to truly be rubbed into the face of 'His', it should've been the moment where he had the win in its arms. 'But. I was to be a god.' He watched what remained of it finally diminish into the air, dissipating the rest of what was said and written. So much work and it was all for nothing. It pained him, as even someone like him, who desired to be close to a human deity, to be seen the way. All the plans, the constructions, it was almost as if the whole creation of his was destroyed in front of his eyes. Insult to injury indeed as he felt that it was enough to have his body smashed, perhaps that way he'd have a chance with them. No, it wasn't over. 'You will suffer malicious being that dares resemble me. Close to an eternity you shall stand there watching them be stuck with you.' They could feel a harsh node in their necks and couldn't swallow, an eternity spends in an abandoned place. Nothing to eat, nothing to drink and barely and air to breathe. Yet, they knew they couldn't get an end, knowing now the deity that was the same. 'Is this truly you?' She asked, still denying his fender to know her name. They'd spend close to every ounce of sand in an hourglass not knowing each other than doing the latter. He needn't answer but show it to her. A sudden urge arises for her to raise her arms. Close to the air, to the other two's surprise. An entire nest of them was lowered down to her to see, a clearer sign of the god she's given. A nest made of long grubs tied together and combined, their faces almost either melted or sewn together on the side. Almost like a basket, they squirmed at her sign, yet she didn't feel repulsed by it. On the contrary. 'They see me as a mother.' The gift that was given to her, despite doubting it, she managed to fool both the monster, the one that wanted to rescue her and herself at the point of not knowing. But in reality her prayer was heard and the price paid. 'You give her a gift and leave me punished? What kind of justic..' His voice suddenly fell down and it almost came like a thunder, breaking even floating stones that decided to come and go. 'Be silent fool unless you've to see an image to see. To be forever tormented at the sight of me, be glad I've punished you so freely, else I would've done worse.' He abides. No way for him to know but it was because of him and the trap he's set and deluded plans that the god has gotten his most valued servant. The girl was to be her champion, left entrapped until she was ready, next to one that he could use a shell from time and time. To speak to her again. They slept for the night as the voice grew silent, he was tired of having to deal with their pertinent now. At opposite corners, too tired to continue, they felt nothing and dreamed of such. One that had a quiet sleep while the other head had a hard time on its part. A bed of insects surrounded her but she didn't feel pain, they weren't chewing nor infecting her with anything. Instead, they acted as if she was a matriarch of theirs, even consort of such. The night passed, a small hole that wasn't covered by the, relinquished of all titles god let in the light. She tried ignoring both of them, as she had no caring. I need to be alone for a while. The memory of their conversation before going to bed as they night set off still came to mind. He said it clearly, at the voice of anger. It's all because of you, I should've have decided to follow that scum and come for you too. I'm trapped here because I wanted to help. She felt anger and threw him away, saying what, perhaps in the light of day wasn't the best course of action. They both acted rashly in the situation. I never asked for you neither to be kidnapped or have to sacrifice to be alive. So, as it is, I hope I'll never get to see you again. They exchanged nothing more last night and walked away, still not wanting to get the attention of the sleeping beast that wasn't too far from them. By the light that traveled and before the other sights revealed, the insects that travelled, the many species of grubs and worms have either migrated away or crawled underground. A great tonne of deal was spent so her champions would have everything. Though they've all been cursed to not be able to die, nor feel thirst, hunger or even pain. They looked at each other, then at the beast, knowing that a long time was to pass. Twenty years to be more precise. And not a day was shown on their face nor their bodies, thought another thing could be said about their minds. Even the presence of madness would at least suffice, as they desired it so much. A feeling that was present on all three of them. Every single day that went on, where they filled their lives with scorn and gone through hate and love, understanding, and beyond. All of that was then passed on and they were left to nothing. The curse that went through their flesh also manages to find a way closer to the brain and prevent it from degrading. Yet, it wasn't advancing either. It was excruciating having to pass for so many years and be stuck in the same way, having only a short room where they'd remember further than the day it started. They knew something happened and what they've spoken about was exhausted, but they didn't know when. 'Did you say something?' 'But you've said that already.' 'You humans are acting the same as always.' It stopped being amusing as once they felt like it could've been, befriending someone they shared the prison with. They tried finding out but alway forgot its past, same went for the other two. One day the me memory of that was present, then the other faded away. Slowly the god had forgotten its original plan, to speak and shape them, to make her whole again. He wouldn't admit to himself but he was flawed, the blows that once directed at him got him to the state he was in. The plans he had, and his fail-safe implantation was now stuck in them. Forever.

Cult of the first sect

This represents a collection of notes, testimonies, documents and newspaper articles that have glimpsed on the subject of the matter. On the first note, a tape recorder stands on the table, the lamp has a quaint light that throws the shade on the other side of it. The button, unpressed. A note came with the recorder saying nothing more than play me, with a slight spread of ink on the sides. It was intentionally made that way as it wouldn't have naturally gone the course it spread. Someone prepared it well. So was the tape, clean. In the sense that there were no fingerprints visible, yet it had the dust of the sides. On a second glance, one would think that the sender deliberately placed it there. There was a mirror too on the other side, merely standing there. Detective Alan looked at it, knowing that this would be a long night, followed by the extinguishing of his royal cigarets from his pack. From the looks of it, he hasn't had a good sleep. No, at the first sight of it, he turned it in the opposite direction and resumed his inspection. His chin was stroked and it took him a quick flip to find the sign. It seemed to be custom made, coming from no less than a foreign country, or at least one other than his knowing. 'No batteries? How's this blasted thing even powered then?' He spoke freely as there wasn't anyone else in the room to hear him. Seeing that there was nothing more about it, at least nothing worth pinning down, he pressed it. 'Is this on?' A voice came, followed by static, encompassing it. Temporarily stopped. One hand was now firmly pressed against the small box to keep it stopped, with his other, he checked to see if he had any appointments ready. None wrote down. He resumed. 'Am I heard? Come on, I thought I've calibrated you before.' 'You've pressed it already, just say what you've got to say, uncle.' A second voice came to be, to confirm what was happening. Feminine at the first intonation but after hearing a few matters, it was even more clear that it was the voice of a younger man. 'Yes, indeed.' It was obvious, though he felt the need to write down the word uncle on a ripped paper, next to old, presumably. 'So, umm I decided to write this in case well, I misplace my work or lost some of it. As a backup to myself. So, gladly hello there my old self.' A quick tap on the button and a full stop, he dragged a piece of cloth, barely wet but not enough to break the device. He used it to rub off his fingerprints before letting out a mutter. 'Damn thing must be stolen.' A clean consciousness perhaps? No, he merely cleaned before starting again, this time having his hand wrapped around the other side of the cloth. If it was stolen, there wasn't any jurisdiction he had for him to be in the possession of him. There weren't any signs of forced entry either when he came into the office. Nor was anything else missing in any place he could see. Someone, somehow nicked and went to so much trouble just to place a stolen tape on his desk. 'Was it the owner? No, why would he be interested in placing it here on a detec.' Murder? He thought, perhaps the tape revealed everything. As well as, since someone went to so much trouble for him, he might as well just hear him out. 'So, I will start by reading out loud, well, not word by word but a resume of my documentation.' 'That's a stretch.' Silence nephew, you must not interfere, this is for me. Ehm. 'Quite formal for a family. He noted even more static as the recorded man coughed, only strong sounds seemed to be the cause of it. The previous stop had less of that. 'I will start simply, well. It would seem fitting for it to have a title. Well. How about, research of occult. "Of the occult?" "Don't be witty lad. 'The man replied to his nephew so casually. Perhaps it'd be just a nitpick, the detective thought. 'As I was saying, eh. Research on the occult. Not that it matters how it's called since it's probably just going to end up just for me. 'It came to mind and he heard it, the thought of stopping it and dismiss it as a fake, being so obviously planned, with every wordplay at hand. Something played in his hand while rubbing it and hearing those seemingly planted words. He was slightly curious, mostly because of how precise it seemed to have been planned. This wasn't the work of an amateur that wanted something to prove. Alan dismissed the remark this uncle had and kept going, he wouldn't stop now at every turn as he hadn't the entirety of the night to spend. Strange. He noticed that the forward button was stuck, beyond his push and his stance. So was the backwards one, they worked in pairs. 'Well, it came to my attention, after years of research and glances, the secrets of the occult. To be more precise, one cult into particular. The cult of the first sect, a well-protected society that's hidden from the mundane world. It's come to my attention, the name especially, years ago, more than thirty years if I may be more precise. I've dedicated my life from there on, finding and trying to reveal their true intent. 'The sound of a door cracking could be heard, moments short before being accompanied by the sound of distant static. 'Ehm. 'He tried coughing, if it wasn't for the static, it would've been more obvious how dry his neck was. 'I won't give a date as I'll know where to find every extract and every single document I'm currently speaking, that's not the reason I'm doing this. One, since you've left, if for you, my dear nephew. You may not realise it yet but I care deeply about you, and my dear sister. This is why I chose to make this, without realising my true intent as of yet. Well, that and perhaps because you've never been much of a reader yourself. 'He placed the tape down. No, the sound of a burst of static revealed much about it. It fell out of his hand, on a table presumably. 'I will start by reading a few pages, just the information and some pages that are bent, it should make it easier in case you want to find what you're looking for. "Yes. 'Alan said as it occurred to him that he was almost seeing it, standing by his office and staring the old man down, the table in front of the table. The sound of paper after paper being flung filled the room he was in, even the dust particles had vibrant sounds and were distinct. 'Again, no dates, so I'd rather skip that. 'The old man muffled his speech, it was obvious how he backed away from the recorder so he'd not be heard. More of it came after. Alan thought there might've been a second person inside the room, other than the nephew that left. Perhaps the wind? No. 'Here, no more delays. A swear or an oath for newcomers. This note had been given to me by a trusted source. 'At the time, the voice monotone. 'They will have to bring an offering to be accepted, that is a must. It's nothing too short of peculiar, I'll admit and I'm not exaggerating in any way. Half of bottle of sea water that's been fermented with the remains of a familiar that has died. They had a way of knowing, I'm sure of it, records maybe, or the smell, after all. So many years of being passed away give you quite the bad smell and taste. Ehm. They must present and cut themselves, an evisceration of the hand and fill the rest of the bottle with their own blood. It sounds quite painful and pointless but I promise that it will make sense. Or at least I hope it will, given the proper context. Apparently, they're meant to abandon it near a street for a proper occultist to find and accept the offering. It's meaning, a bond, between the dead of the living. And it's said, this mostly by rumours that fly around. That, they've cultivated a method of tracking the one that had spilt the blood, directly to the very tap. By any chance, in case you were wondering, I've not actually tried this, for obvious reason my dear, dear nephew. And I advise you to not do it either. It was easily recognisable, the detective did think that perhaps there was a chance the ritual wasn't that out of the ordinary. At first glance sure, one would think as it grotesque or filled with indecency. Despite that, he saw it more as a test of courage, of how far would one go for the promise of joining the occult. And it wasn't too far long that he heard or rumours of young people that went missing after doing strange acts involving grave robbery and such. 'Is this the reason why this was given to me?' He could remember a case that might've involved some clues of that manner and this might've been the reason why someone came to leave it here. 'Well, now, there are other trials, indeed there are, this being just the beginning. I'm not entirely sure but there might be some other. Wait a second.' Sounds of papers and static were thrown around again, he was searching for something. 'Here, the dearly deceased papers of some of the bodies found, taken be yours truly in not the most discreet or. Legal matter.' A silence came after and again some papers were being looked upon. 'I suspect, well, the punishment for not doing it correctly might've been dead. As the files say, and I quote. Anthony le Fond, male, twenty-five. He was last heard on January, his body found eight months later. The strange thing about the report is that some organs were missing. What you might suspect of being stranger than that is that only half of each was taken, with the precision of a surgeon. The man could've been paranoid, searching clues where there were none. From the description he gave, it seemed to fit more of a profile of a murderer than the occult. A connection there. There might be some inside influences involved into all of this, down to ritualistic and such. You see dear nephew. What they did not tell you and something that I've had to. Dig up myself. Was that there were something left inside of the place of the taken organs. A form of currency I suspect, whenever or not the case, they might be pertinent for the initiation. Oysters in the stomach, they were inserted deep in there. And, before you talk, I checked the body myself and saw it with my own eyes, he didn't eat them. They were planted there precisely to be found and linked. A bottle, oysters, blood of a dead relative and the blood of yours. There's more, a pair of small hooks were also found, presumably both in the bottle as much as they were found in the kidneys. This is where it gets, interesting. Something tells me that, they meant to acquire the blood by the hooks, as , opposite to the oysters, they weren't shoved inside the kidneys. No, but they had skin attached to them and it belongs to him. I've managed to examine the wounds and find the location where they were previously puncturing the skin. It was the fingers. Alan paused for a moment to have the information settle in, the confession was quite sparring. A dark grin along his face has finally settled and died off. Do I have something to do with it? It occurred to Alan that, perhaps at one point his name would be mentioned during his attest. Since there wouldn't be any reason. 'No, I need to hear more.' He wet his lips as he said it, knowing that the answers would come regardless of his attempts of predictions. The wounds on the fingers were long sewn back, it would've made more sense if they were done in January. Now. There's something else. I've thought about sharing, there's another small step I kindly refuse to enclose to you as the nature of it would be most ghastly. Thought nephew, the other two cases that I've got the files on are the exact same way, skin tore apart, revealed, organs precisely chopped in half. The elements shoved aside. What else was there?' His mutters grew even more intensely as he started running on pages. 'You will find that I've arranged everything to be most systematic, articles on the right side, documents on the left. Everything else that's written by hand is directly opposite to the working table. Now, if you may. The reason why I've decided to go on with this is simple. I'm more than certain that you've left and shouldn't be back for at least hours ahead to stop me. With everything in mind, I've decided to attempt to join this cult of the first sect. With everything required now, all that remains is. Well to wait. You may be wondering now, why is that I've got to wait, in no way could I be done so quickly. Here's where you're wrong my dear nephew. You may not have noticed when you came here earlier this evening but, my hand was kept at most of the time away from your gaze so you wouldn't notice. You may also, by now. Heard noises, perhaps in the forms of static, this happens sometimes. The door was tightly locked and I'm certainly sure that. It won't stop them from entering. Now, now, you mustn't be filled with grief as I'm not going to pass away, just go away for a while. That, if I'm certainly sure that you won't follow in my ritual, hence the reason why I've hidden the last step. After all, it took me a fair amount of time to figure it out. Just be sure you've there to water the plants, will you?" The tape suddenly stopped, the button releasing by itself back to its original position. Alan took a few glances at it whilst fiddling his whiskers. His interest now has fully stepped in now, wanting more of it. A strange surprise as he pressed again on it. 'Tape number... I've got a hard time speaking but I will do my best as I am permitted to. I'm both watched as directly opposite of me a man stands there, farther away but enough to read my lips as they move. On the request of a. Fellow.' Alan recognised as the previous voice, the same man that has spoken before, only but a slight lisp that could still be understood. No static. 'Ehm. You may be wondering where I am. That would be a valid concern. Now, you may be wondering what would be the reason of my speaking with such calm and contempt. I was fed with what I speak of now, which is the reason why I must be so secretive about it. Do not worry, though, if I remember correctly what I've told you before, only seconds passed, yes. Which is why I must ask you too. Deny my request. I've decided to long abandon my attempt to wildly chase the occult upon some discoveries. There are quite shocking, both in an amazing way and. 'He was slightly cut off, his tone becoming monotone, followed by even the cut of a lisp. Alan hadn't a name for him, neither for his nephew. Nor a date so he could search for disappearance cases. Clear signs of the tape being tempered with were shown, perhaps the static before? It would explain the lack off, especially now that there was a slight sign of restraint. 'I cannot speak more but what I can say. I've decided to give my life towards a scope that would inherently benefit my fellow humans more than chasing false leads and senseless murderers. This way, perhaps I could even make a difference my dear nephew. And. This is also why. 'The slight tinge of hesitation could be felt across the air, even as it came from a tape. Vagueness, across the whole recording as still, nothing but a name wasn't filled with static. 'I must leave you, my dear nephew. It occurred to me, now? But that's preposterous?' A second voice came but it was hard to recognise which said what. It stopped again, even shorter than the last one. An old model indeed and from how much was spent, there wasn't any more room left, what came after could've. And might've been the last entry in the tape. A tempered item that described a ritual and gave a name, the rest being kept vague. 'Why there, why now? Why me?' Alan asked himself in the confusion, his question still unanswered. It was getting late and it would seem that this would end up being another night spent at the office. Out of the corner of his eyes, he saw a motion through the window atop of the door, stuck into the wall. Though it was none, he'd known if there was someone in the same floor. He had a distance way to know that, to the most precise point. A set of strings laid on the bottom floor, quite an ingenious device made for him by a long dead friend of his. The entire floor was riddled with them, all leading to the same small compact device under one of his desks. A small bell would ring and he'd be alerted, the stronger the sound, the closer the person approaching. It wasn't enough, he remembered that he asked of him long ago to take it even farther away, two bell rings for a lower floor. Three for even lower and one if whoever it was came to his. Quite late, he thought, there was no ringing. 'I'm getting paranoid.' Alan said, with a glare and fiddling the tape. He had something in mind, other than his mild delay. I would finish it and lock every door, no one would get out nor inside. That way it would've been certain for him. I'd hear and rush to the door, he thought. A firearm laid just closer to him, just in case. A third one, followed by a click. IT started with static, even more of it coming despite nothing being said. 'My dear.' The voice spoke again, in a slower manner, the one which one who didn't have his jaw finally working. 'Dear nephew. I don't know if these messages will ever reach to you, at least not in time. I must confess something, that it hasn't been easy, for either of us, with my absence in the months. And now, it's been transmitted to me that. You haven't followed my advice. I could only hope that you'd hear this well, in these few moments where I'm able to freely talk.' He cleared his throat in a sloppy manner, it made enough noise as he spits out what could only be recognised as a concoction of mucus and saliva. 'Not as much as I want, though. You must stop, the reason for which they've cut the organs weren't part of the ritual. Listen carefully if you can. I've been wrong, all this time, what I thought to be. My research, everything, even the bodies. Listen lad.' He stopped, static and noise could be heard, approaching. A combination of both an echo and confinement were duly noted from the voice of the old man as he spoke. Privately, Alan thought. 'Everything, my research, was all for nothing. It's been tempered with.' With a flicker of the hand, he stopped it. A muscle's reflex that went off without his wanting, unasked for. Alan thought for a second on it, the static, his so-called evidence and theories that were false. Someone was messing with him in a grim way that no one deserved to. It went even deeper, knowing that there were signs of a group of thugs that decided to target him next. They've tampered with evidence, that was sure. He checked the bell again, still no ringing. 'They've played us, they've played me. Of all, they're not just occults, they are delusional. Those bodies and documents, the newspapers and rumour, all made up for me to follow. And I well damn fell for it, as did you apparently. This is why I'm asking you to stop, these are dangerous people. Echm.' His throat still embodied the same concoction from his neck, making its way back outside to join the rest of it. 'They will dispatch of you as well as me after I'm no use of them. Those bodies, remember them, only carved so it would fit the narrative that was tried to fit them the most. Burn the tape, burn my lib.' The static interrupted him for the last time before the tape stopped. Not fully clicked. Was there another message? Alain noticed that the button didn't fling itself back to its original position as it did the last two times. A threat most likely, it crossed his mind that this was the point where he'd be obligated. Blackmailed or worse to he'd join their small band of thugs. Yet, once again, why him, a lower detective? He couldn't swallow on his dry throat, hence he went on with it. Another voice came, deeper, close to being monotone. 'Hello. Can you hear me well enough? As you might've already suspected, Alan Pethrichok. Detective if you may, this is an invitation, not to join us but a collaboration.' He kept it short, there was no static, no sounds in the background. He paused after each sentence to do nothing more but show Alan the complete damp silence that wet the room with him. It was almost as silent as the one he was in. Almost. 'See you in two months precise, in the arctic depression.' It finally stopped with an ultimatum. There was nothing more to be said. Alan was going to accept it regardless of the slight infringe of threat. Two months passed, a long journey, with the small tape in the past. Alan wore a coat, having barely arrived at it in time to meet his quota. The ship was expensive and there was a lot paid for. 'Thank you.' Alain gave his final regards and left his boat, having the understanding between the two of them, as it was a. In his words, a fisher's boat, gone far. He kept utmost discretion. The small village he landed in seemed pleasant. He had no time for pleasantries. Despite the awful weather, Alan was sweating, unable to swallow on his parched throat. He had a small talk with some locals that were looking way too deeply into him, studying. No suspicion, he thought. It wasn't far now, only a few pieces were traded and he had acquired a sled, with a few dogs to match it. Along the way, a small accident occurred and it crashed, killing all the dogs and leaving nothing but the owner alive. Fitting, Alan thought, after making sure it was an accident. Whatever happened in the last months changed him, in neither other occurrence would he go too far to slay such innocent animals. He was faced with a man wearing a long hood, dressed to appear as a reaper. Alan now finally came into. The great depression.

Dream

I was accompanied by three other people if my memory recalls it correctly. They were stronger, older, experienced in their trade. The trade of blades, that is. A lot has passed but that's not important, at least not for now. It's not important how we met, as it just happened. But we were acquaintances for enough to get them well. Out of them, I believe I was the youngest, followed by Jorgmund, a tall blond haired and green eyes man. Then, there were two other that I've grown attached. Both old enough to be in their late years, grey hair and everything. None of us were mercenaries nor would it happen for them to normally work with new people, though this was different. I was recruited, as one would say. 'We're almost there. Just keep in mind.' Jorgmund was placed in charge of me to make sure I wouldn't get myself killed. A dangerous time to live in, especially if you decided to live by the will of the forest. Thorny bushes and a hollow ground, the closer we approached the place we had to come into, the more it got easier to understand what was happening. And at the same time I remained clueless. He placed a hand on my shoulder. 'Are you troubled, my friend?' I didn't think much of him, though there was a charm, something that made me feel safe. That, and the fact that he was the ablest swordfighter I ever knew. Someone to have my back. It was clear where we were going towards. A small fort that wasn't far from our location, and all around of it, a growth of forest that came out of nowhere. Perhaps that's what kept me on edge, being afraid of what awaited us. I decided to respond, though giving him the time. 'I'm fine.' And cleared my throat. I had to pay attention to them and see, they were in the service of the king after all. Or at least they once been like that, guards. Though one nodded and understood. There was nothing else but the fauna, which I was the only one to notice. For them, it was so ever familiar for some reason unknown to me. Either they've encountered it before, or simply did not care, though, no animals and certainly no other travellers. One would think at least another searching party would be sent to see and check what happened with the sudden growth. 'Hold on.' We were stopped. The fort was clear in sight and just a few steps. Trees laid on the said, adding more to the forest, rocks that once accompanied slabs were covered in grass with vines on the side. Extensions like that didn't come for any reason. Though there was another, small cliffs in front that had three bridges extended to pass. Between them, any other path was blocked by a small garden that lifted itself to appear as one, though there was none. A deceivery maybe? They kept the calm but I got anxious, afraid. Not by that, nor by what we were going to do. But a figure that was slowly approaching. She was as tall as I was at my young age. Resembling a nymph, I thought she dragged vines from the ground, though at second look they tried not letting go. Dressed in leaves and plants, with green tormented eyes, a clear hair that complemented her. I tried my best swallowing but couldn't do it. From her tips to her head, she was covered in them, approaching to speak with my companions as they were the first to come and talk to her. I didn't listen nor head, just rushing through and jumping onto one of the floating bridges. A strange sensation filled me as I touched the floating bridge with my feet, walking and watching back through the moving raised shrubbery. She looked back with a twisted smile. And I thought about it for a moment, for some reason, it forced itself into me. The toll hasn't been paid for me. I came to my senses immediately so I wouldn't fall and jumped towards the section of the ground. I kept running and saw only Jorg following and trying to speak. The other two stayed with the nymph. What I remembered, that happened after is still shaking me. The only blame that could come to mind is a combination of fear and trust. I was jumped upon, four thugs, bearing weapons and ready to slash. Defenceless with no sword but a small blade, still seated inside and hidden from their sides. I thought I'd died and I would've probably done if it weren't for him. The first man was ready but Jorg followed and unsheathed his sword, stabbing him in the neck. Immediately I was pushed, walking on the stairs that were placed right next to the fort, getting both more distance and a difference in height. He was fighting and slashing, parrying with one. Still not holding a knife and unattended, I kept being close and seeing when to come. Another parry and a clash of blades, then I saw the other one from his back running and another taking out his sword. He was ready to stab him from behind and I couldn't warn him at all, this is when I jumped and grabbed him. Too late but not. Jorg shouted out of pain as the blade came into his shoulder after merely grabbing him and preventing a full slash. I pushed with my might and removed the blade, leaving an opening for his enemy was surprised. He fought through pain and cut through his guard. Both him and I released, another man fell to the ground. Jorgmund turned at his attacker and another surprise, as I followed to make sure I'd stop him. The thuggish man, wearing his broad leather vest turned back after realising there was no escape. I took out my knife and threw it at his raised hand. A dark grin came as the knife bounced and was ready to fall straight to the ground. With a foul swoop, I grabbed but he did too, fighting with me for its ownership, though. 'Jorg.' I yelled, as we were fighting, biting his hand and letting his shout and his ranting. He blasted me away with his strong hand, having a face full of rage. Straightened to the ground, I was ready to cry in shock at the face of my killer. If it weren't for my saviour, coming for his final blow. He fell to the ground even faster than then as the angle from which he was taken out left him with a clean cut of the heart. 'Are you all right?' 'Yes. I think. Wait, your shoulder, I did not mean to.' I was interrupted, just after being pulled off the ground. 'Just a flesh wound.' My gaze flickered as I saw them approached, with her in lead, coming for the toll.

Death of a Varristoff

Grand Duchess Varristoff Fylerr, the last head of a family that bore no heir nor have any male suitor of the liking of hers. A line of blood that ran thick on the copper floors, almost as thick as the tartar pits used in the wars. Knowingly, after the death of her parents, she was set on a path that wasn't chosen by her alone. One of self-obliteration that'd result in what's implied. She laid there, in front of her mansion for many days. Dressed in tattered rags that had bits of it carried away in the ashes. The giant corpse landed and already broken, half of the mansion dragged into the dirt. For nothing now that they've left. Her whole family, servants and friends, all dead. In front, their grave was now covered, grief threatening to swallow her whole. And in her mind, she told herself, as clear as the day. Why have I not been taken yet? But it was a question no more, as her glance answered the question for her. A knife was thrown, the only one to survive and not be destroyed by the humungous conqueror of the citadel she lived in. Not even that could survive the giant fall of a siege so dense and strong. A leap and the blade was in her hand, straightened at her head that was lifted up. No thought so far, after thinking she'd have enough for that. An eternity, she knew that it awaited her in the depths of the inferno, to be dragged forever and slashed and slashed. Be ate by the creatures that ruined her life. Grief enforced the reminder of the religion she was raised into, all for something that she couldn't help. Her eyes closed immediately at the sound of a hum. The blade slashed. Though the mark was far off after opening her eyes, she saw the blade fade into dust after cutting through a hand. She turned to see one of the servants that fell to his knees on his last breath. The man she had known to be more than a servant, hence the reason why he'd give his life to a knife with poise. 'No, Hallber.' She yelled as she reached the back and held the body of her old majordomo Hallber, the last man she'd get to witness alive. The back was aching and with a second of repayment after so many years of servitude, she allowed him to take in the last breath. 'Why did you do it Hallber?' Tears ran across the face as she said it, a twist of muscles and of joints followed as she drew in. His breath was colder than she presumed. With a flick, she removed the clothes that were preventing him from properly breathing, removing some buttons from the short. The fashioned collar around his neck too and even the belt that was strangling his belly over the button. 'Thank you milady.' And she picked on the subtle hint from his voice. The moustache he had, almost as grey as his hair was slightly lit with happiness as she did it. He was happy at least that he ended like that, after so many years of loyalty, despite the grim end of the family he swore to. At least, this moment would count. The purple glare inside of his eyes faded away as he passed to the next life, with nothing more to be done. She released her old friend and placed him to rest, caressing the hair and with the other pressing his eyes closed. A final embrace came, making it even worse for her, knowing too what expected her outside. The world was already harsh and she was abruptly forced to let go of her last friend. 'Look, there, a surviving servant.' A voice, young from the tone came from a short distance. It would be reachable by foot, exactly where he stood and she knew that the period of silence was over. The owner of the voice came, almost at an immediate pace and grabbed her by the wrist, refusing to let go. Fylerr was no older than fifteen and the young man was barely older than her, yet it was still enough to overpower her and pull her. No word. But fear ran through and desperation, it was something that ran through her head unwanted, though. It wasn't long ago that she was ready to end her own, now to refuse it all because of the servant who died for her. A prudent man was waiting too, he yelled after for his younger fellow to come faster. 'Come on Jacob, we've got not enough time, put her on the back and let's be done with it.' The lad seemed to be properly dressed, not in the sense that he'd be a lord, but a citizen, middle nonetheless. A glare not far and an older man had a small cart filled with barrels, pulled by a white horse with no ears. 'Wait.' 'So she can talk? Hah. Easier of her lad.' And at the sound of it, the strength of the muscles could be felt as the voice travelled to the lad. Jacob, how he was called, lowered his grip and wasn't rough anymore.'Sharp tongue I presume, that could come with that mouth of yers.'He saw through the guise, under ragged clothes, there was a softness of the skin, purple eyes and a black hair, undisputedly too fair to be a maiden.They'd disguise their lord and queen like that to walk among the common folk, ey?Well, she'll get more than what she bargained for.Though, there wasn't a lack of compassion in the thoughts of his, watching his son drag the lady.Rich or poor, he saw the situation clearly, the citadel house she had laid in ruin, with no survivors other than her.She now became a commoner like them, for better or worse.'Now you can let go of her, she may speak for herself.'Front of one another, despite not daring more than a few glances when she thought he wasn't noticing, she had noted of some features of his.A big belly and clothes that weren't far from hers.The lad went away.A few better could be bought with copper but he seemed the cautious type, wearing a strapped belt and nothing more.His eyes were blue with only a sparkles of purple, a big nose and wolfish grin.There was something that yields both untrustworthiness and the opposite of it, yet she couldn't find herself pointing what it was.'What is it I can do for you, my lady?'She found herself surprised at how she was addressed as.Did he know that?"I can you were wondering, I'm not thick headed so you may not dare."I understood.'She said it whilst looking away.I mustn't underestimate him any longer, nor anger him.Before he gaze could wander off and find the son, Jacob, searching the body that wasn't even cold yet, she was stopped.'So.What can you do?"My pardon?"The blue and the purple met, their eyes hold together in conflict.Reluctantly she asked again, reforming the sentence.'My pardon sir?"You heard me if we were to give you a chance to come with us, what could you provide for the ride?The fee if you will."So I am not your servant then."You're not, but don't take too long or you'll be left here to fend on your own."I..'.She stopped to ponder as she was asked off.They were no smuggler nor had any wish to kidnap her, or that's what she thought.Scavengers or travellers from the looks of it, but I couldn't look inside of the barrels.The idea of being sold into slavery wasn't far fetched, at least she'd get more of a chance.After all, she couldn't risk waiting, soldiers might come and execute her.'Wait, before you pass your judgement.'She stopped and tried rethinking what she was about to say.The last thing that wasn't destroyed, from her knowing anyway.'My legacy, help me to the nearest town, or even village.Perhaps that's too much.'Fylerr whispered to herself, though despite the best of trying and the hushed tone, she failed to do so.He saw the sincerity in her eyes but it still sounded quite stretched.'What legacy have you, girl?Your citadel lays in ruin and your servants dead.Are any family members of yours at least alive?"No."Any hidden treasure or currency for times like these?"Nothing but the legacy sir.'It was getting cold and the time for them to leave was approaching.Whilst rubbing his chin, marvelling how round her cheeks were for a second, he saw past, to his son, Jacob.Jacob nodded and a frown came to wave his face.Damn it, the servant must've had nothing on him and more than like she doesn't either.Such a waste too, that we'd have to rely on this.'Fine, girl, you walk with us, but make any attempt to run and we'll send the hound.'His finger pointed back at the car.From the front seat, out of a cloth popped out the head of the hound.Her eyes widened.It was almost half of the size the horse had, probably even faster.A dullishly rock face but she couldn't judge, especially if it came to outrunning it.'So, is it a deal?"Yes.'She said it immediately, desperate to get off.John noted of that.And certainly, this noble spawn doesn't expect any better.Very well, we shall see what we'll make of the legacy.They came to that and lifted themselves onto the cart.Each in a different spot, between the barrels, laid a pair of pillows and something to cover.Though now at different sides, still shaken she would have to stare at one of her captors.'Jacob, was it?"The boy stared for a while. For a long amount of time, whilst his father was checking the provisions and if all was ready, he took the time to stare at the girl. Not far from my age, huh? It felt strange, now that he realised that his only interaction with her, the previous one was just him dragging her away. A bitter taste, perhaps, even more, was added as they stared at each other. 'Yes.' He muffled as he said, pulling away the cloth he'd be using to cover himself up through the night. It was just as his, the one next to her, three others alike, even as they planned for a few refugee looking servants to survive. 'A disappointment my lady.' John said mockingly to the girl in the back. Standing near his hound and barely glancing over his shoulder. She wasn't sobbing nor was she capable of a response. 'Cheer up, it could've been worse. It could've been you up there.' He pointed at the giant lump that was attached to the giant body that crushed the citadel in its charge. A pillar of smoke arises from it, with the beast long dead and the siege fire breeders it used to carry stopped working. She wasn't expecting nor could she think of it, but John knew it. So did his son. They've both seen giant behemoths like the one there, used for siege then left for dead. Once there, the cinder would be given birth to the body and melt everything around, leaving no trace of any building or town, if it was the case. Only ashes and a black skeleton would remain, and judging from the weather. 'We'll get to see more of them where we're going. You'd better brace yourself girl.' 'It's Fylerr.' 'Fyl, it's good to know. Hiew!' They were on their way immediately, the storm, not so far on their tracks. And not a normal one either, one that would spread the fire. 'Jacob, the coats.' 'Yes, father.' The son complied and pulled two pairs out of a barrel. 'One for her too, it's a big one coming.' 'But.' 'Do as I say.' She did nothing but watching, holding on one side and another, two barrels that were on her side. Occasionally she'd get slightly thrown into the air, to feel the cold reach it. The features were now lit but not by the fire, they were long gone from that. And from the likes of where they were located, it wouldn't spread. The rain reached her face as they dashed through the night. Her reflection, soft, came through the water running down her cheekbones down to the neck. Jacob didn't know how to respond nor what to do say. At one side he was curious about her though it was hard for him, looking at his father middle the horse. At the surrounding, that was dashed, though, indescribable at most. How should I feel about it then? Jacob asked himself, now basking in her presence. It was the first human being, other than his father that he'd get to interact with. Never was he thought how to act, or to feel, a scavenger of bodies as his father, deep within. 'Will you keep staring at me?' Suddenly he opened his mouth but closed it just as such. Should I apologise or not? Am I even supposed to think like that? Or to stare. Pointlessly he asked himself, since no one would answer. But then, he realised, that. And in exchange he used it just as such. He came back and stared but asked her well. 'Do you mind me staring?' It was a frightening sound, just as a lightning strike, cutting through the sky from somewhere close. 'I don't.' She answered but a blank expression on her face remained. There was an abrupt turn on which the barrels were almost thrown overboard. They both watched on the sides, seeing the water splash, having a feeling as if they were driven through the sea. Fishes were jumping on the sides as they walked, driven to fly. Driven to jump through the mid-air frozen drops from the rain. They'd use them as gateways to achieve further distances from where they came from, winking at both of them. She saw and thought. I've never seen such a thing. Since never had she had the opportunity to get past the citadel, a prison and at the same time a castle. Protected from everything, even for small animals that would attempt come in the general direction. Despite both of them being amazed of it, she reminded herself. It had to be done. Far too long the reason has refrained. Under the coat laid the ragged clothes she used, or she was going to use. It was a pure coincidence that it happened, stealing them to venture into the world. For this, I've traded it and now? Perhaps I've gotten to the point of regretting my decision to do so. I should. Banished from thinking, the boy's stare intensified as he approached. It wasn't something entirely unnerving to happen, but enough to disturb her line of reasoning with herself. 'What now?' She asked, taking long breaks, allowing moisture from the air and drops of water to land on her tongue. 'What were you thinking of?' 'What is it to you to know?' It perplexed Jacob to her that, especially since he knew they both spoke the same question. A slight intonation perhaps, or the mispronunciation of the words, maybe? 'Do you have an accent then?' 'I presume that. Why are you asking then?' 'Because you speak funny and you look the same way. Too much has happened for her to be offended by such a minor thing, to which she shrugged. He changed the subject, perhaps he didn't want to know. Still, though. 'You still have not answered Jacob. 'Answered what?' 'Why do you care about what I think? What is it so fancy to you knowing what I do?' 'I was merely curious you know, we don't meet many folks around on our travels. And, well. I'm not sure how other people than me and pa think when they're silent. 'With a glance, she tried figuring what was he on, why would he be so interested in such nonsense. 'Surely you can't know what anyone's thinking, it's rubbish. You can't read minds, no one can. 'The sound of leashes being thrown stopped their matter. Another turn and one of the flying fish landed in front of them, bouncing from barrel to barrel then on the side. 'Should we throw him?' Jacob asked. Again, he changed the subject, but this time, she dares, asking him of it. Quickly with a jab, which threw the fish closer to her side of the cart. 'I've not changed the subject. 'Then what have I asked you?' It morphed into a game of their liking, throwing the fish from one another. A riposte and another throw. 'You haven't asked me anything and I. 'Well, what?' 'I know I can't read mind, that's not what I wanted to know. 'Then what is it, Jacob? Why do you so desperately need to direct me so? Is there something you want to know?' A final slap threw the fish bouncing off their raft then back to the sea. He took a moment before he spoke, looking over her shoulder. His father, that he was aware of, wouldn't be able to hear it. Nor would his hound. A whisper, close to it as he signed to her with the help of his hands, to approach. When they were both in reach, her trust given freely, he was able to speak. Finally, I'd get my answer, she thought. If I'm lucky, at least. Jacob had a hard time resisting the soft features that seemed shaped when they got closer, her lips merely centimetres from his. 'I wanted to know if others think the same way as I do, or not. If I'm normal or not. 'What is it then? What could it be that you're thinking that you might think others don't? You can trust me with that. 'The slight glow of the purple flames in her eyes signalled him and a gain of trust was emitted. 'Do you think of it?' Her eyes widened as did her expression, unknowing of what he was talking about. She asked then, with a slight glance and shake off the mouth to cover up the fear she felt in the seconds to come. 'Of what?' 'The headless goat man. He keeps coming and whispering in my head. Shh. Don't tell father. 'Fylerr stopped, right as she was ready to turn around and check it. 'Who. What is the headless goat man?' 'He said he tainted my dreams and thoughts. He said he did that to everyone else. With the long scratches and vents, he inserts tadpoles in your brain. 'What are you talking about? There's no such thing. 'At first she thought, perhaps a joke, normally she'd hear them. The rain seemed to be stopping too, as did the flying fish on her sides. Perhaps another sign too? Her mind was ready to collapse as the night was already too much to take. 'No, this is why I asked. I'm not sure. I'm not sure whenever or not what he said is real or not. If he tainted your thoughts too. 'What does he look like?' 'What?' 'What does he look like Jacob? Tell me so I may judge by myself if he's real or not. 'He scratched his forehead, removing the top side of the coat that was now wet and cold. 'Do you have any proof of his existence?' Her expression changed, as did his. It was blank, after seeing the water splashed continue. Though they were red as something was fast enough to outrun the car and slash every piece of the flying fishes into pieces. His throat was too parched to swallow, it was a mistake he's done since he saw her do it too. Thought stubborn as made it too dry to warn his father. It happened in seconds, and a long monotone sound baffled his ears. Almost like the beating of a small bell with an even smaller iron rod, continuously distracting him from the speech she gave. Flye hasn't noted yet, she was made curious, not even at the sound of two slit throats. Neither the hound nor its owner could shot or bark, it happened in a second after the presence was told. No, father. Jacob lifted and tried reaching with his hand despite being pointless, it would take seconds for the horses to realise and see. Even then, the chances were that they'd be dead in the following seconds. A struggle occurred as the thoughts tried their best to fight their tainted counterpart. Father, father, father! In his mind, he bit his lips, he fought withing, he had to shout and attempt to escape with his father and her. He can't be dead, he. Though the cart started rumbling, barely kept straight, Flye understood what he meant. She reached to cover her mouth, after seeing, through the gust of wind and ground, the body of John fell by the side. Blood came and reached her as the body bounced, left. A scream rises as she tasted the blood, spitting it out with the remaining air out of her lungs. 'Noooo.' Quickly turned, as the cart started being straightened. They watched the back of the driver, both distraught. It had no head and a furry back, no word spoken and it kept driving as if nothing happened. If so, it started going even faster than before. The barrels remained as their only barrier between then and the headless man. Flye turned to comfort him but she knew there was nothing she could say. After having dealt with the death of her entire family, in her own way, she knew that it was better if she kept silent. Though there was an immediate danger, to which she came closer. Way closer for his personal comfort, even in a situation like the one they were presented in. She asked, docile looking. 'Is he the one you've spoken about?' 'I am.' A voice came from behind and she was well aware of who it came from. No movement so far, the boy remained in shock. Immediately, after realising that she was alone in this, she turned towards the emptiness where normally there would have been a head. A glance, cut short, as she tried lifting her head to see, if the head was indeed absent or tuck down in a fur suit. As was said, cut short it was, as she stumbled back on her arse, the cart gaining more speed. Not completely unnoticed, he said. 'You won't find anything there youngling.' 'Who are you? Why did you kill Jacob's father and..' 'One question at the time unless you want to join them. And choose them carefully, or I'll increase the speed of the cart.' They both caught the barrels that were now aligned on their sides and did their best not to get flipped outside. One way remained out of there and she had a bad feeling about it. As trees, then stone started bashing and crushing their cart to sunder, they were closing in a stone passing. Tight, enough that only one horse was left, the other got released and immediately decapitated as it fell behind. 'You may ask unless you want to keep going.' The headless man said, filled with uneasiness from the lack of a mouth. 'What do you want from us?' A shout came, as the constant bounce of barrels almost dislocated her shoulder. 'I don't want anything from him, only from you girl.' Before she could turn, the gaze of Jacob fell too, behind with three barrels, quick enough to not be seen again. Left alone, with more questions, she was already ready to accept her fate. It was obvious for her that there wouldn't be a chance for escape, ever since she saw the father. 'Then will you kill me now?' 'Not yet, I still desire something from you.' A fairly calm stature filled Flye as they passed the stone way, crude, with a horse and with a cart that was a bare hole. 'What?' The question that sprung his curiosity and made the cart stop. Perhaps a made choice or not, the entire cart cracked to pieces as did the barrels. It took a moment for her to pull out the moisture and dust off her eyes. And when she did, she found herself facing him. Hooves and hair covering his entire body, though no fingers on his hands. 'I want your thoughts, to be impure. I desire to taint them with my presence in them and breed misery and despair. I wish to haunt you and your descendants and breed through you one of my own.' The thought of it disgusted her, in every meaning possible. And even if it didn't, she asked herself. 'Why would I want that?' And she had to stare, the hands expand, going through to reach the sky. No hole from where the sound would come from, yet she still heard it clear. 'My body is dead and vanquished. I only wish to granted access, back into your world, a rebirth. A descendant is all I need, so I wouldn't be forced to possess bodies of humans, animals or broken corpses.' Then why did you taint others? "You've no idea of how it actually works so say no more about my methods. I need only this and I shall free you, one son or daughter, be no choosing of mine. And in return. I give you purity of thought." To which, the answer remained unknown. The covers closed, remains eaten, and the family remained almost as if they never existed. The name of Varristoff died that day and in death, it became anew. Yet the fate of the last wearer remains unknown to this date.

Little wooden man

Little, little, wooden man. He could not accommodate. Regardless of how much he tried fitting, none of the others would stop screaming. His skin was pale, fell off, his body broken, not by his side, and enough of it remained to be stuffed in a box of wood. It was by the mere kindness that the box had wheels, pinned down on it, the hands didn't remain either, so he had only wooden sticks. The voice still remained, as he screamed to his parents. 'Don't leave me, don't leave me!' But they ran and left him behind. Blind, as his eyes were shattered, in front of everyone else, he was just a monster. As far as he went, he passed, unknowingly along, near three or four in a pair of the whole. Voices could be heard on streets as they started screaming. 'Freak, just look at him, how it stopped. It cannot even pass that rock.' 'Come on, let's move along before we get caught.' One of them came, as the others were busy laughing, turning the box on its back so it wouldn't be able to turn around. 'Lift me up. I can't do it. Please, I need to see my parents!' The boy scream but the laughs and the malicious insults could be heard, farther away from him. They made fun of what he was, how he remained, in a wooden box, without any means to get back. 'Please!' He pleads again, it was a miracle he managed to find the latch and previously escape, though, even then he was too far from his parents who were already gone too far. 'Why?' Said the boy, barely followed by a tone. Someone else was approaching, whistling and riding a bicycle. The sounds of splashes coming over from the pools were clear. It was so sudden that it crashed, flying inches over the box. The boy asked. 'Who's there?' And he heard some noise. Not a second did he think otherwise, being concerned. A girl, barely older than him came closer and pushed him over. 'What are you?' She first asked, at which, if the child still had cheeks, he would've blushed. 'I can't find my parents, do you know where they went?' Dismissing what she asked, he had no idea, why he was blind, why were his legs unable to lift him forth. 'I don't know why you are, or who they are. I'm sorry. Perhaps.. 'I'm Thomas. I can't remember my first name very well, but. My mother used to say it rhymed with bell rang. Or the sort. 'I'm Elisabeth. Never seen something like you before.' 'What do you mean? I can't see but I know what other kids look like.' She rubbed her fingers, trying to look for a device, Thomas didn't really know what she was doing, unable to feel anything through the guise. After being tired of waiting and the silence that was passed, he asked. So sudden. 'Why are you silent?' And she almost jumped to her feet, away from the box. 'Nothing, I was just looking for a device, that's all.' 'Can you help me or not?' But the girl wasn't fairly convinced, the fact that it sounded alive, a moving wooden box with sticks, speaking to her was already a surprise, nothing more. 'I know, who might be able to help. Follow me!' She rushed to her bicycle and hasn't realised. It was when he said to her then she stopped. 'Stop, I'm blind.' Again, the sound of it made her wonder. It came out so real, could it be that he's a boy? Inside that small wooden box? Properly looking at the box, she saw that there wasn't really a cap where he could've entered, not that the size was possible. With her bike on one hand and the other on the box, they both started going, on the sidewalk, away from any sight. Suddenly, she grew closer to him and said. 'Shh, don't speak until we get there, we need no unwanted attention.' But, 'I said shh. We can talk after, just wait for a while. And after, we can search for your parents.' 'Promise?' 'Promise!' The stick came to her hand and they both shook on it, with spit from her mouth, and the stick slightly dipped into the puddle, the promised was already on the way. And both of them walked, trying to appear as casual as she was, going around the town, on a route that no one dared to come. Of a sudden, she grabbed the box and held it to a stop. 'Emily!' A voice said it came from an older woman. It was the shop in her right, that she didn't notice, nor did she think they'd get caught so early. 'Greeting miss Oliver. How are you doing?' 'Elisabeth?' It was a hushed tone that came from the box that said her voice, the boy was silenced, but a glimpse was already taken by miss Olivier. 'Did you say something?' 'Nothing miss Oliver. Oh, this? I need to take it to the tinkerer, he may be able to repair it.' The woman nodded as she turned back to her business. 'Very well Emily, just go on with it. Don't spend too much with that crazed old geezer.' 'I won't, bye!' They walked faster, both, alas. But the boy wondered, after not hearing anyone speak for a while, the sign of being safe to say. 'You lied about your name.' 'I didn't do such a thing. I merely just, chose to not tell you my name since I couldn't trust you.' 'And now you do?' 'The tinkerer might tell, both of us.' 'And, then my parents.' 'Then, your parents.' It was a clear path after, as she leads the blind box walking along, side by side, the semi-abandoned town. The thinker's shop there, glowing with a spark. What he had in his shop, leading outside made a snap, which got both of their attention. Both audible, the sounds of two pots being melted together was clear. The sound of which kind of made the small box fear. 'Is it safe?' Thomas asked, whilst Emily looked around, to be sure no one would see her get near with the box. Nonetheless, they went on and over the border, they crossed the fence. No knock, as she made it a usual thing, walking over, pushing Thomas first. 'Morning Hammath.' Her voice changed, he listened in awe. How the cold wind brushed her hair. 'Greetings.' She said, once again, but she saw now, the man on the table, using the various machined over a large metal shell. With the few steps, she managed to sneak behind him and then yell. 'I said greetings!' After being yelled in the ear, the only part unprotected by the metal helmet with a visor, the man almost bounced around the room and hit the floor. Thomas heard the shout and a thud, as he started moving forth and asked. 'What was that?' 'Oh no, I think I overdid it.' They stood near the body, looking forth, the stick going around his body, trying to feel a beat. 'I can't feel his heart!' 'It's because you've got no hands to feel with.' Despite her naysay, as he thought, he kept pointing and rubbing the stick against the skin, though not malicious it was used. 'Stop it.' A grunt came, and by the power of it, the stick repelled. Eyes wide open, his face dirty, still unwashed, the remains from the last week, she saw, still remained on the face. 'Didn't you wash since the last time?' She asked. 'No, of course not, I've kept my hands busy.' The mask was no longer one, it was a miracle it wasn't broken from the fall, but he took it back and placed upon his face, then, before he was ready to resume his work, he started at the small box, remembered how he was poke. 'What's that?' 'You mean me?' Before the girl could've stopped, she was stuck mid-way, unconsciously trying to cover a mouth that wasn't there. 'This is why we came here, he claims he's looking for his parents. Also that he's a child.' 'What are you doing? It's tickling me.' The tinker was reluctant, he thought it was only a machine, but then, he thought of asking. 'Can you hear? Can you think?' 'Yes, why wouldn't I? All the other children of my age are doing the same.' 'But you're a.' He saw Emily shake her head back and forth, scratching the slightly elongated area under his neck. It was covered though by his old clothes, and he figured, only after, that what he tried doing remained pointless. 'Ah, the old age.' 'You're old?' 'Can you not see me? I see no eyes, nor ears, but you can hear me, of that, I'm sure. 'The box was silent, in his eyes, but he broke it, lighting it, immediately. I cannot open this, what if it's real, the content could kill it if I break it loose. The man scratched the moisture on his face. 'Do you know where his parents are, Emily?' 'He hasn't told me about anything, just that.' 'Listen.' Thoma's voice broken through both of them. 'I can't feel my hands and everyone's been acting weird. Am I even a boy? Was that all a dream?' 'You listen here boy. We're both going to go in search for your parents. Let's go.' The backpack was already on the side, by the time he stopped the machines, making sure, a second after that all the cogs were stored as well. Both stood outside just waiting for him to come, though Emily made it clear as daylight. 'If you're going I'm coming too, after all, I'm the one who found him.' She said, privately between her and the tinker, which made him admit, that perhaps she really was responsible for the little box boy. 'Fine. Though I must warn you, and relax, it may be dangerous for all of us. From what we know, we may find out that his parents, if he really is what he's claiming to be, could be a pair of other boxes.' Though they both agreed that they'd go and as soon as the shop was close, they went on the journey, through the gate from behind. 'Is this a secret door?' 'You've been in the back alley before Emily.' He held Thomas in his arms, the small wheels under him were already broken and wouldn't go that far anymore, especially since the effort. Guided only by the memory of the steps. A left, a right, he remembered stopping, tracking to the point where she found him. 'The place where you said you were left, is this it?' After a larger pair of steps, they arrived, a well laid there, in the middle of nowhere. Emily said in shock, without thinking, unable to grasp. 'Were you thrown in a well? By your own parents?' 'No, I mean I don't recall it.' 'Do you recall splashes then?' He was placed down, as he approached, seeing then how empty it was. 'Abandoned in an empty well, where no one could find you if it were a search.' 'No, this can't place, I. 'Don't worry, we've got the time. Even though the clouds gathering atop of them at a fast rate. Hammath sighed. They went back and tracked again, though this time, they ended up in a different way. Still, in front of the well, all three of them found themselves on the opposite path, but in front of them, it was sunny above. The well in front of them had an opening, other than the one above. It resembled a door and it was big enough to grant passage for all three of them. 'I didn't see any door the first time I turned around the well, how could this be?' 'Emily, in case you haven't noticed, the rain stopped here, evenly to the other side. None of this makes sense and the door is the lease of our problems.' 'Then, should we go in? Perhaps his parents went there too and left him.' Emily said, her lips were already swelling from the combination of sweat, heat and cold. In the middle, between the cold area and the heat, the closer they approached the well, the easier it was to get sick. Ham coughed, but couldn't put his hand over. 'Are we going in then?' Thomas felt like he was approaching something, making a thick sound, a mask inside. Before turning the knob, the sticks started moving, left and right, unable to control them, he tried spinning the wheels, but the box was held firmly by the tinker's hands. 'What's wrong?' 'I've got a bad feeling about this.' 'Don't worry, we're here with you Thomas, all the way.' Emily said, going ahead and opening the door. A gust of wind, filled with the scent of ashes, pulled all three of them into another gust of darkness. For a second they felt the ground under them, but the gust of grim blackness devoured both their light, along with their sight. 'Emily, hold on to me!' With only a hand, he kept the box as close to his chest, guiding his shoulder for a full embrace, while holding Emily by the hand. At which she grabbed and held as tight as she could. 'What's happening? I can't feel the ground.' 'Were the last words she said outside before they were all pulled, the gate shutting, even before noon. It felt like a tornado, inside of the well, a dark one without water to go as the lit was covered above, preventing even the smallest amount to come. Even the sound was taken by their fall, and regardless of how further away they tried reaching with their hands, they felt no walls. Not even an embrace and definitely no holding hands. They were thrust into the other side, landing as if merely let down by a carpet, grim and dark coloured. Laying on their back in a field, luscious with flowers of sand. 'Is this?' Before she could speak, they all sat there and looked at the sky, too amazed and stunned, seeing a giant floating box, even further above the giant flowers of sand. It was red, even more than the sky, darker and at the same time, it felt. It felt, to them. 'Perfect!' As Emily said, noticing the reflections bouncing against it, as it then flew away, changing angles, though none of their glances. 'Emily, we need to get out, this is way over our heads!' 'Where are we? I still cannot see anything. And I can't really remember stepping on such slopes.' Thomas was already going on a slope. Emily right behind before he could fall and break against the sand flower's bases. Damn those children, or so he thought. How come I've allowed myself to be dragged along with them, after so much work done, and there's no way back. And he was right, after a glance, he noticed that there wasn't any well, nor any door, nothing above nor below. Could it be then that, whatever drew is in took itself out? Are we trapped forever? 'Come on Ham, we've got to go.' It was almost as if the simplest shout of the child got him safely through a great depression, as he went through the rough grass, cutting through the shoes, almost as if they were nothing. 'What's with the grass? Are you two all right?' 'Yes, come on!' He stood frozen, looking at the shoes and small wooden wheel, no marks, no cuts, nothing that would suggest otherwise. Yet, I'm the only one affected. His mind alert, he jumped from side to side, trying to get as few cuts as he could. The various needles came in and snapped the ankles, making him fall in front of them. 'Ham!' She yelled, but she couldn't move either, nor could the wheels. They looked behind and the tallest of flowers was lowering itself by the roots, creating a small area of shifting sand, pulling them under. 'Hammath, help!' She shouted again, Thomas was confused, finding himself trapped too, with his hands already sunk. 'Emily, I can't feel my hands, what's happening?' But she was too distracted from seeing the tinker hands and feet, being impaled, spears made of grass, propelled by sand. He screamed and before he could do anything else, Emily closed her eyes and looked away. The man was impaled through the throat, then pulled under, his grave of sand, under the hill. It was the moment the sand got to her waist, to half of the box when she finally opened her eyes, unable to see her friend anywhere. 'Hammath!' She yelled, a third time, though with the last remains of the air inside of her lungs. The name was spoken again, seconds after, as the sand drew closer. It was a lot more silent, close to being monotone, but she spoke it nonetheless, ready to give up, as she closed her eyes. And then, she heard her name said. 'Emily!' Again, repeating the same action, opening her eyes to see, a burst of sand as the wheels spun out of control, Thomas came from the edge of the grave and turned to face her. It was almost as if he could feel her presence through the ground, that he knew, instinctively to extend the stick and let her grab on. 'Pull, Emily!' He said, and she was already half way there, using what she had, the frail strength of a child to take herself out of there. 'I'm afraid Thomas, I'm so afraid. Hammath, he.' 'I know.' The voice, almost sank its wooden pair of teeth inside, though, she wasn't distracted, she grabbed and pushed on, the pulled. 'We need more friction.' A desperate cry, as she wanted to push out the sand away. 'He died there, and we couldn't help him.' It was getting harder for Thomas to push, and all of the sudden, the stick she holds onto broke. Almost like a shock, it pushed the wooden box farther behind, whilst Emily fell on her back. As did the box, turned aside, unable to push with the broken stick and the other one near him. 'Emily, where are you? Emily, I fell on my back again and can't get up.' But it was silence then. The small area where the box landed was located between the small root channel of sand and the grass, making for a single safe path one would take to avoid both traps. Though, none of them managed, until now. 'Emily, please!' He pleads to the sky, but there was no one there to hear, but the flowers of sand, none of which were alive. A moment of silence came soon after, he decided not to say her name ever again. It must've been hours, when the wheels stopped turning as did he, in the middle of nowhere, among no one else. Hours, maybe days, who could tell how the time went there, especially since he felt no hunger, no thirst. Only sorrow, that he felt, perhaps for the first time, thinking why. Thomas remembered hearing a scream before, long ago when he was with his parents and they almost ran over an animal on the streets. It was such a vivid memory, the light, the face it had, pure fear. Finally, the memory pushed him to say: 'Is that what Emily was like and is that what she felt?' It was so clear now, that she wasn't any longer there, else she would've said something along time ago. 'You're dead Emily and It's all my fault! It's all my fault! It's all my fault!' A dose amount more times, that was repeated, with no echo, without an interruption. He laid there until he heard the beating heart of a bird. It came through not so far, and somehow he felt, stopping from his chant-like banter. The sound came closer and closer, as both the heart beat and the hushed song of the bird came closer. It was barely audible, making it seem that it held something in its beak. 'What's that?' Thomas was curious, as he suddenly stopped himself from saying even a word, or making any sound, not to scare the bird away. Beat, beat, a sudden stop, another beat followed by another beat. Still no clear sound, and so many breaks, it was something heavy that was carried by the bird. Instead of scaring it away, he waited, only, so close, a little friend to make it less worse. Closely, it approached and stopped, a few leaps away from the box. Thomas felt like saying the simplest of words but reconsidered again that he might scare. The bird suddenly leapt and landed on top of him, laying the object on before heading away in flight. 'Don't go. What this?' He bit his words, once he realised that it was his own hand left there, out of it, tickling his side, a liquid started flowing then landing aside. It wasn't his, he would've known when the stick was first broken, now to be left like this. He waited. Coping with what was happening, whose blood was the one running dry. Sand particles were sprinkled, making the skin clog inside the box feel their touch bounce against the wood, transferring heat, to an already overheating box. And for the first time, not being abandoned and thrown away, not from what seemed to be a broken arm, Thomas felt pain. Time passed and he endured, always thinking of his parents and the times before. But, in the time where it seemed to give in and let his own mind let go, a shimmering light came from above. He felt his hands moving, both of them repaired, on their own. The wheels suddenly spun out of control as he ran across, stairs of light, shimmering with brightness, strong enough for him to see again. Under hear and under the stairs of light, an entire sea of flowers of sand, all of which cowered in fear, as he was pulled inside the perfect structure. Floating in the sky. A perfectly fit hole laid, square in form, in which he entered, though it did not come without a price, managing to cut and break both the four wheels and the freshly repaired hands. On the other side, before the opening close, he felt like moving with no hands at all. If he had them, he would've used, since the wheels already gone, as did the shell of his box, floated away, leaving the piece of meat, hovering around the pristine ground. The room was enormous, as he saw, empty, though a perfect emptiness of the likeness he hasn't seen before. 'Amazing?' 'Isn't it?' A voice asked Thomas, though when he turned he saw nothing else but the walls around. 'Who.' 'I said it, the prism in which you were drawn upon.' The throat muscles were visibly extending for Thomas to speak, as he only felt, tired as he was, asking only: 'Are we going home, to see my parents, that is?' 'Of course.'And that is all he needed to know, though not forgetting that his friends were now gone, the chance was, that his parents were still alive. So he went, closer to the stars, inside a perfect prism, flying further way from the stars.

Nhiialaag, the witch of the sea

It was clear, fifteen years ago when the police records came that it was going to be a most peculiar case. Still ongoing, up to this day and perhaps the only criminal that wasn't found yet and incarcerated. Or that's at least what the official records said, the statement given to the rest of the world, so young, unprepared to hear and witness the truth. It was under a dim light, over a shady desk, in a room hidden inside the library inside the town of Burghington, The New Republic, that one of the original men met with a reporter and with her partner. 'Now, that we met each other, and accustomed to one another!' The man was young, mid-twenties, retired despite being in the force, though, neither were the reporter, still just as young or perhaps younger, with her assistant, thrice as less than both of them to the side. 'So, I can trust you two that you'd keep it this way! Ehm!' The young man became alerted on the notice that two others came. 'We did not agree to this. You said you'd bring only one man, not three!' 'Relax, they're here to help me with the writing, nothing more. Nothing changed, your identity will remain unchanged, and perhaps.' She was quickly interrupted by the clash of the young man who aggressively almost jumped the dust off the table and broke the chair off. 'You do not understand, she.' He realised, as the four of them had a look in their eyes, almost as if they were staring at a madman, and rightfully so. Nervous twitches and scratches, needle marks on the neck. How did this scum even become an officer? One of the acolytes thought, but he reminded herself what his boss said earlier, let her do all of the talking. You're here to write. 'So I'm to understand that coming here was a mistake?' Her voice pierced him despite not being necessary for it. He took a break, the back pain from standing up already took its toll, leaving him on the seat, sitting alone and nervously shaking still. 'We can go on with our appointment Miss. And I'm sorry for my outburst!' She nodded and signalled for each of them to take their notes out. It wasn't a mere choice, that she called for four of them, as they weren't reporters, though the man wasn't aware. And how could he know that he was in the same room with a psychologist, Frederick in the name. A veteran, Barnadock, in case the man tried to get violent, or anything else. With the last person being a doctor, for all in case, if something was to happen. All being paid a great amount of money to keep their mouths shut and pretend they're something they weren't. 'May we go in already, mister...' 'I'm Jonathan Bustgon. Again, are you sure that none will be able to find out, are you indeed?' 'I am sure of it, now go on. We wasted enough time already.' As Barnadock was getting anxious, fiddling the notes in the dark, covered in the purplish light, he started intently at the man. Jonathan noted only a glare and avoided all contact, a flare of the colour in his eyes quickly dissipated into the air, though none noticed but the veteran, who already didn't care. He went on, seeing that there wasn't much of a choice, the door behind all of them being locked and smacked above of that. 'If I recall it, we were called to go, I was merely a rookie then, still they decided to take me with them. Our commanding officer, you see, he thought it would be good practice for me to come and observe how they take care of things, this not being a dangerous came, or so they said. "And what was the case again?" Jonathan tried to swallow. He couldn't. "We were called to investigate a series of murders, close to the seaside, apparently, or so were the records, more than twenty bodies were found there floating and being in a condition." "Condition?" "Yes, they were unnaturally bloated, like. Like the Tetraodontidae, if you are aware of the species." "The puffer fish?" The doctor asked from the back, he duly noted how he knew precisely, how, even the pronunciation was used. A nudge in the dark, Frederick observed it too. Fabricated maybe? "Bloated with what?" "Ink, like the one, found into an octopus, and that wasn't the only peculiar part. They resembled the puffer fish, in the fact that they were pierced by spikes and all of them, gruesomely had symbols and texts carved in their chests. 'It was a disgusting image set in all of their minds, though they stood there to endure. 'Let's proceed, tell us everything down to the single most detail and evidence, if there is any. "Well, there is, plenty, though a lot is inaccessible at the moment. What I can tell you is that. Well. The text that was carved, my guts are still turning at the thought of that, that I was forced by my colleges to sit there and document all of them, write down. They had to be analysed, they said. Giving it nothing more than the work of a cult. After we evacuated the area and made sure they were no danger to come into contact, we had to wait for the carts to take the bodies, so we can furtherly analyse them, side by side, doing our best to translate as much as we could out of it. It was a creepiness tied to their expression that made me remember them so vividly, the ink having blackened their pupils, as the skin, long sharp needles and spikes coming out of either orifice of other organs. Everything had to be written and asked around, making sure that no one got out to see and talk about it. We rounded them up and placed them there, having to wait and touch each and every one of them with care, after being deemed as safe to interact with. There wasn't any problem with the bodies. "The man paused for a second, looking around at them. Seeing how none wanted to interact with him, he decided to continue. She remained just as silent. His throat was already aching, just at the mere thought of it, so he started his inner thighs, almost piercing them with his sharp uncut nails. "We should've noticed it but we haven't. One of the bodies was still alive, out of the possible serial murders. It came as a shock and a surprise for us, as me and one of my fellows were in the process of carrying a body to be placed inside of a cart. We immediately dropped it in front of the medics who were still trying to figure out to do with the extra ones found near side. 'A light chuckle was left before stopping, realising how awkward it appeared. The intensity of his scratches grew as he went on. 'It was a man, mid-twenties I think. "The reporter then decided to stop being silent and asked, in a sudden change of manner of tone, denoting her intention 'Was he called Rober Oliver by any chance?" "Yes, I think, it's been so long since then!" His face brightened for a second after hearing his name, it was almost as if a deep connection, a grasp of light came to be. For a moment at least, until she spoke again. 'I've got some bad news for you then. He died a few months ago, heart attack. That's why I decided to come here, as something didn't add up in that story. "I see.!" The grin was shattered immediately, as the man came back to the twitching. He died, it must've been her. His body, repulsed by itself and what flew through his blood made its point quickly, the pain unable to be denied anymore. 'It's been a few months for me too, pain-killer, medicine and other. But, I can't anymore, it's just too much to take.' 'Hold yourself together man, grow a damn spine, you were a police officer for 'sake.' The veteran spat on the ground as he said it, leaving no place for rebuttal. He had no problem hitting a man that was already down. Though none were safe. 'I need to finish this, so could you please tell them to leave? I can't finish it without. Without. I can't finish my story with them around watching and judging me like that.' Before the man got angered again, she signalled all three to stop. 'It's okay now, you can stay outside, he won't trouble me.' 'But madame.' Said the ever silent man. 'I said be gone. Ehm.' Their notes were gone just as they were, she'd been planning this all along, to intimidate him into getting every information. 'Now you may continue!' Her voice accompanied with a slightly wicked smile. 'Oh and don't avoid any detail, I'd hate to, well. Have to call them back here.' He was shocked by what she said, to be blackmailed like that, after everything he went. A nutjob, though perhaps he'd do a good story, even if it would not turn to be true at all. 'And don't be tear eyed now, come on.' 'The man, he survived, you know what he yelled? Over and over again.' 'I am well aware of it Jonathan. We found him in an insane asylum after all. I've managed to see both his condition and his file, and if I manage to recall correctly, the word he kept repeating, over and over again. It was Nhiia. Now, I just assumed that he simply lost his mind.' 'No, that's not his word.' As he slammed both his hands against the table, he stopped and quickly retreated in a whimper, seeing the room slightly shaken. He was in a much worse condition than before. 'It wasn't a word. Nhiialaag. Nhiialaag. Nhiialaag!' The voice came to a shout, at which the door was slammed, the veteran ready to flank and break his jaw even at the slightest command. 'I told you not to enter.' 'But ma'am' 'Leave now!' With a fury even more intense than the short, he left, with hopes, given by a signal of the hand, that it wouldn't happen again. 'A curious thing, Nhiialaag, you say? What happened then?' 'They were fishermen, all of them, on a giant ship, apparently, they were off by the storms and all caught off in it.' 'Were there any signs of the wreckage?' 'None, not even the wood.' 'Clothes to show that they were fishermen?' 'More than a hat, here and there, not at all.' 'Then how do you know?' 'When we inspected them, other than those sharp things that popped out, they had all the hooks, buried inside their mouth and throats.' 'Everyone?' 'Yes, ma'am. Well, not all of them, Oliver hadn't. Perhaps.' 'Are you trying to say that he was purposely left alive to yell the name in front of all of you? An entire ship gone missing without a trace and only a pile of corpses with their equipment shoved inside their mouth are left as proof? Do you have any idea how ridiculous that sounds? No wonder the story was denied.' She placed the note inside her pack and got herself up from the cosy seat she was inside of. 'Wait, I saw her!' With a small sentence, she was immediately stopped, just as a quick thought, a wonder at the problem. Perhaps there was something to it, perhaps not. 'I've wasted enough time and I've heard nothing.' 'Hear only this, before it's too late, I promise you I.' His arm fidgeted from side to side as he spoke softly. By a longshot miracle, he managed to calm himself and keep his composure, at least for the time being. He knew something was coming, as inside his pocket laid a napkin, full of sea ink. 'I saw her!' He said it again. The eyes were flushed with a bigger iris, full of black, enlarging by itself at the mere thought of her. 'They infected every single one of us who came into contact with the bodies. Even the medics who were, originally there to pick up the bodies befell in the same fate as we did. It was horrible, nightmare, both at night at the day. I still see her and can feel her sea salt as well, deep inside my nostrils and eyes. She haunted every single one of us as she.' The reporter suddenly stepped away. But she assured. 'It's not a virus, we were tested, how else do you think you've managed to go to the asylum and still be fine?"Then how do you explain, what you've said?All of them dying, all but you!"I don't know entirely but I have thought of it.Perhaps for the same reason, he was kept alive.Perhaps I was kept alive for that reason too, who's to say otherwise.She wanted to.She said it herself, in a dream."So you don't know if it really happened or not."No, that's why I said that I've thought of it.Real or not, I will tell you what I've seen, then you may leave with the information, do with it whatever you may.I was drowning in the sea, seeing my fellows drowning there too, caught in traps that penetrated their bodies, impaling them from somewhere in the ground.She came from the depths and revealed herself to me, the only one conscious and aware of her presence.Even thinking about her makes me feel sick inside my stomach, so I'll describe the appearance to be short.But a mishap spine that popped out of her back, with shapes like, something to resemble barrels.Her hair was the most prominent feature in her fish-like appearance, other than the spine of course and the dull look of transparent scales, her hair.Her hair.It resembled eels in a way, that it was almost as long and shaking as them, inside the prolapsing water, yet they seemed to be moving independently from the body, all bearing the face of each of my friend, gut alive before I knew it.I was both furious and frightened that I looked around to see the faces that were located where they belong.In my stupidity, at the time.'He paused for a moment as spasm came, followed by twitches of the hand and a violent series of coughs.The lady stepped even further away from him as he did it.'She.She came closer.I'm sorry for that, it's her, she's doing this to me and my body.She's tormenting my dreams, my day and night, she called to me.Closer, that I could hear myself from within her.My voice, my head down to my neck and spine was prolonged over one of her hair strains.It frightened me even more as I thought it was real, I felt the water come in my lungs, I felt the bodies of my friends hanging around.I felt myself trapped there, talking to her despite being in front of her, trembling in fear.My deepest fears and secrets were laid on her, it was me, how else could he know everything about me?And what she told me was even grimmer.She said that I was called by the sailors a witch, you see?I spared one of their lives, to get a message across, through you and another and another and another.So it might reach them once you're done.'It seemed like the man was ready to tell more, though he stopped at a sudden pain inside his chest, piercing through like a bitter knife.Before he could extend, the woman backed away, he was drowned in the blackest ink she'd even seen, right in front of her.Unknown to her, all the ink was stored in his heart, and at that moment, it exploded all over and inside his body.His eyelids became black, it came out of his mouth, lungs, nose and ears, dripping through the floor, devouring even the lower amount of blood he had in the body.An eerie feeling filled the room as the ink reached the bottom of her feet and tried reaching her.'Barnadock!'As she yelled the name, the old dog slammed the door and pulled her out.His eyes were old but reflexes were just as well as they once were, closing the door immediately and hiding it from public sight.Comforting by the wasn't enough as her body entered a state of shock, the chemicals released in the air, that were deeply ingrained in the ink now managed to reach her.In a deep dream state, she has carried away, thought to be safe by everyone else.Though, she bit her lip after finding herself in front of the witch.It was more than described, there were no fish resembles but pale white, lizard features, the coils that floated above the water were prolonged to exit the sea and reach for above.Again, her mind went on what she thought of expecting, and yet again he was wrong, harsher scaled, it was almost as if out of her head exited the Kraken from the old stories she recalled as a child.'You..'.She said and quickly greeted.Her image, deep down on the land under the sea, quickly shifted to a temple made of sea rocks and bones of creatures that seemed to be dead long before prerecorded history. Water seemed to be pulled just as the Kraken did too inside what now were holes in her head. Out of the water was pulled the skin, covering the skulls and bones, fragments that were laying on the floor and all-around of her, blinking at her with each chance. Is this what he truly saw? Her mind was too distracted though to think of anything else. Unable to control her eyes, they tried, desperately to search in the crowd of heads for her own. Seeing them squirm and try to whisper from her every side, she almost forgot who laid in front of her, who did that. Every side said a different thing, all of them confused and sick, lacking a body, being concerned. She silenced them all in a shout. 'I will bring you where it started and when I arrived here for the first time!' Her voice penetrated her ears, as she took the heads, pulling them even deeper into the head, along with the sand, leaving nothing but land. The expressions the witch made changed along the land. The form that resembled anything earthly was now gone, leaving nothing else but monstrous features that impregnated her mind, her eyes being forced into a dark grey. What she saw in front of her eyes was visible bones turning into a substance, almost aquatic, then into a gas. The body that resembled anything, in particular, became a cloud of darkness, a gust of stars, floating with no shape of form, having no core of its own. She said then, directly imprinted into the woman's mind as she had no mouth to speak through, no vocal cords to use. 'This is where it began, from nothing you insects became. Slowly you dared tempt all of us for you to care. Though that damned us all, now I curse you to die!' It was a sudden shock that her mind was gone, falling to the floor. Three men stood there, a dead body in a room, and a woman that was shaking on the floor in deep pain. Filled with ink, her spine exploded and infected them too. It happened too fast and in horror, two of them ran away, though not before they were touched and infected by the same thing she was. Impregnated again so she'd spread everywhere she'd get the chance to. And now, two more were on the loose. The veteran alone held her hands, too old and honourable to leave her, he stood and watched as the light was drowned in ink, all inside of her eyes. He was spared by his mere action of seeing. The witch has pondered. As in the eyes, he stared into, he saw a kingdom of ink where creatures tall and lengthy, devouring themselves along cities they resided. Fear, after so many things he's seen, though never such a thing as the one in front of his eyes. Creatures such as this shouldn't have existed in his mind. Yet they have. He stumbled as she was gargling with ink, and at a sudden moment in time, her head burst, skull broke in front of his eyes, ink splattered all around without any mark or notice. The eyes widened even more, as she left her sign, the witch of the sea, splattered a text on all the walls around, in something that was seemingly indescribable, perhaps even more indecipherable. He gasped and ran away, not to be believed by anyone sitting there. As he arrived and looked around, the library, a part of his body now permanently covered in words written with the ink of her blood. They were gone. A crowd laid there, it was a busy day, quite the rare occurrence such as it was, so many people filling it. They started, a giant majority as the man had a solid build, covered with ink on his body, grasping for air and shaking just as well. The veteran gave up that day, retired from anything else he'd do. Days later his body found, with a shot across the floor, falling from the recoil. The doctor that was once said to have been having up did as well, it's said that the pain he felt bypassed the painkillers he desperately took. The psychiatrist, on the other hand, remained alive. His whereabouts are unknown and so are his actions. But, a report came to the police after his disappearance came, along with his two daughters, young and. Well, it's said that he went mad and wanted to use both of them as sacrifices. Though the neighbours may believe what they want to. Same goes for those who read the reports on everything told so far, truth be, they may not know. Nor will they be able to, fully be sure, if the ink managed to find even more hosts.

Alkorn

One of the contamination areas had been squared off from the rest of the complex. Eight large blocks of stone lay carved and runed, separating what should've been an empty region into an array of walkable nodes. Drawing enough power from the outstretch of I'll Dagher, the crowds were dissatisfied of the great outdoors and what the arcs of lightning had done to the planet. In the Archived of I'ssh Ilt Rogan, by the Muhars, the documentation had brought to the light of the fading struts of air that life was approach stagnation. Eight generations had been born and bred with a coefficient of knowledge which was far beneath that of an acceptable citizen of Irn. There was the mundane which inheretely pushed through and definitely removed whatever kind of insolence or rebellion there might come, pushing it so far towards any kind of resistance to be completely if not thoroughly being stampeded out. Eighteen thousand years since the coception of the oratory point marked the last sings of affliction, to which, in the end of it, there came one feasible entry into the mind of the least deranged officers of Tharn. For they had sold their planets and their people to the last outside landers, bringing in the last sings of the broken world. The sickening sickles of the alders pushed on. They spoke to me as if I wasn't even there. To look from either side while not even being closely related had been damning. I could not be bothered by the constant interruptions any longer. A pair of eyes were following, drooling as if from the least concernable pair there. In so far I only managed to take a few notes of the event before I had to go again. 'Man killed on the street near the St. Nicholas's vigil. Hit in the head, the culprit ran away.'But I saw his wine leaving the area, following the man who took it out. I could not even believe that the man was dry when I found him, let alone realise what went on inside my head. I had been a wreck for so long, that I started doubting what I saw that night. I've received close to no attention from the police station, over the fact that I hadn't my mind set in the right place. They were a fraud, lost to something I couldn't even find the right way of expressing. I was not even content on trying to get away from what there, for some reason the thought of giving myself in for a crime I did not commit tessed in my mind.As the guttural noises came to me, I seem to have lost a good amount of interest. Something came over me as soon as I realised that no one from the station had been living, at least not in the same way I had been going at it. I shouldn't have been there. They were approach me from around every place I could come to see, not here, in the station but there. I felt like I left a pair of imprints on some wall, the blood clots only tying themselves, attaching to the least appropriate traps.Ctian tonguesI could see where the failure had come from. We, as servants of the mules could only bastardise ourselves in order to keep up with the influx of traitors which got wrapped inside the veil of the ship. As long as eight hundreds meters spanned over two hundred eighty times on various long which account for the entirety of the ship, at least on one side. For the opposite reflection appeared to have been completely encompassed in as much as a weary mask, made out of the space dilemma, a filthy cursing, desolator pair of tendons which formed themselves around every few paces of free space in which it reigned. Going as much as at the span they bore, in it they left nothing for no one to come and touch. Regardless of the freezing factor which began adhering to them there, they found a way to draw in the warm from the inside of the ship despite the lack of visible entry point. Long tongues emerged. Castrated by the self-sealing acidic rain which came into the form of bolts, they remained inside of them, beheaded in their long and beating warmish parts. Somehow they extracted the heat despite there being no attachment whatsoever, which only left them with the least incongruous of manners. At the span of a century, they could feel themselves drawing in. Punctured as they would begin to grow into strange beings of their own, as the fat rubbery tongue came finally about three paces away from the likes another one of their own, he felt repelled. Both of them were, spread in either direction they could take, unable to handle the fact that they would suffer one another's presences for as much as it would take them to reach the other life forms on the ship.By the second millennium, their presence, or as it might be said, their occupation has consolidated itself without leaving in any certainty that they might go away. From a feign side, one could draw the fact that the Ctnian celerity that came gave them horns and wings and claws and fist-like chests that pushed out again and again until their abdomens had been properly formed. Without as much as their delirious anchoring methods to the ground, they had been forced to be proudly exposed. From their backs came out the means of infections so they could make the insides such as their homes would be.In their strange-replicable minds they only saw the desire to recreate the mouths in which they stood. It was perilous to proceed this way, as their mere deception would somehow drag the wills and the mad lack of proper ill-nature of the inhabitants of the ship. They were there. Still trying to figure out the best way a contact could be stricken between them. Without any kind of method, the only way which remained would be some sing-language in forms they could see.'How did they perform the rituals? Could it be that they're able to communicate somehow after all?'I doubt that's the case. If it was, we would've been in danger a longer time ago. For now, I think it would be better to wait and see how it turns out.'No, they're dripping the semiotic fluid again. And I don't think it's just them. The cadet Conroy.'To his name, there were a few symbiotic cans which missed from the medic bay. Those would be used for any kind of discernible disease or any sign of an infection which had been left untreated for too long. It was unnecessary to believe that it was the right thing to let him slip. But the cameras went off just when he had approached the bay. 'We lost a few good minutes there.' 'Convenient, wouldn't you say? I think he's onto us. That's no dumb kid, I truly think he found a way to do us over, and this isn't going to end up right if I get my hands on him.' 'Settle down, buck, I think the kid isn't at fault for is, nor them. And, in case you haven't noticed, most of the citizens aren't even disturbed by their new colleagues.' 'That's because most of them had their brains taken out and replaced. I don't think any normal human would risk approaching them.' And it wasn't likely to be supposed that they could be left alone. It was their rituals and practices which couldn't be taken away from them. They had adopted something close to the old religions of old in terms of prayer and the fashioning of worship. Two altars so far, inside the gums of the mouths which appeared on at least a few of the long tunnels. It shouldn't even be conceived, the fact that they would change again, but neither of the men even dare stare too much in the ether. 'I want a closer look, right over one of their heads, that should be fine.' It wasn't. At least, for as long as it could be seen, there were a good few distinguishable pairs, types, whatever could be registered, or noted for their type of work. 'They act like a hive now, I see that they haven't fully reconstructed their shrines, or their mouths. Did you notice it?' Even their asked constructors shied away from the holes in which the tongues were supposed to grow. At least, if anything, one would have to admit that they were somewhat highly aware of one another, enough that they could fantasize about what ought to be. Even if it wasn't like them, those shrubs that went out moved the half-an inch in which they were. Within a few strikes, one could pursue crushing them for about five of eight times until properly set into a slithering of poppy cots. Blue blood emerged out of nowhere, which turned slowly into a whitish flayed amount of forming cells that shouldn't have been there. 'I believe they established prior contact with some other human beings.' 'What gave it away?' 'The obvious conclusion was the fact that it wasn't supposed to be there. I think they've taken themselves far beyond the limits of what might've been their only way out. From this point I'm afraid they'll simply die because of the pure isolation to the human material on the ship, which will immediately activate the antibodies which will kill the rest of them.' 'A pity, isn't it? I thought I could almost grow to like the fellows. There's something about them I've come to like.' 'And what would that be? You'd enjoy ripping out their heads wouldn't you?' The colonel almost gave a chuckle, for a good reason as well, as much as he could see, he had been interested in taking in those long-deceased faced. Something of him could be seen as a projection, even though its unnatural look only betrayed what he feared most. By those cheekbones, he could see that they were drawing past the beak, past the mouth below the beak and the cord which ended up in the neck which had been the remnants of what used to be a tongue. He saw tiny bloated eyes which pushed onward on the cheek, using them as platforms if anything, but never giving away at any order. Soon they'd start realizing what was in for them. 'Are you listening, colonel?' 'I am, what was that?' 'We were identifying their types, if you would be so kind to come back to us, you would've found out about something similar to you. 'What do you similar? That thing isn't me.' 'Of course it isn't. We were just underlining the point that's close to you in terms of both of you being blunt-headed.' 'And that's supposed to be an insult? What's that thing?' The second type appeared, just them. Past the projector, it only came in the form of some strange derelict, which had no concern for the walls through which it simply walked, as a matter of fact, this was by no means solid.

Its arms had been lost momentarily, but one could count on them being lost somewhere in the walls. From what could be taken, one quick addition brought some resolve to mind. 'These are the inflammatory type, I see. So far, they've been responsible for pumping their muscle mass inside any kind of solid beam they would lay their hands on. Careful not to anger it unless you want to crush the room with us in it.' 'Let's test that, doc, shall we?' With a single nod of the head, they decided what would be better. It shouldn't have been this. Everything shook around them. It was at least fascinating to undermine the doc in such a way, especially since the others were trying to figure out whether or not they were indeed trying to take her away from the position she held amidst the rest of the crew. One blunt strike on the nearest side and he would start shaking. His head bobbed in what looked like a helmet, or a rest. A pair of respirator masks which were formed just like tinier version of his face came on, drawing with its eight goggles. Most of the soft part had been occupied by the suit that emerged, even those arms which had been lost beyond reach. It began shaking violently only for a few moments. Then one wall changed, so thoroughly, as violently as one could push himself through that there wasn't any sound left for a few minutes it came in. Some memories would have dictated the images of a few of the past wards in which no one dared think of the comfort of the masses. They felt like victims, the soldiers felt the calling of the war. Other strikes came in as quickly as the first one, leaving the battering still going on. Every single one of the walls had become his giant face. All except the floor, in which it carried on drawing ahead. It would push it down a few steps beyond the rims of his touch, until nothing could come about him. Spared of the agony, he started pushing on the same Ctnian words that brought him there. 'What does it want for us?' The colonel asked, unable to contain the vibrations which pushed him on the ground. Eight of his teeth went out. From each side, after which he drew back and left them to deal with the cadet who had failed to get away. 'Get away from her, I need to stop the bleeding' 'What happened?' 'Look around you, you dumb-headed helot, look around.' As long as spears fell, there had played a game of chance, from which only a few of them managed to get out unscathed. For the likes of what haunted them there, none could think of it as if it was any better. The girl had died, in her prime age of twenty, impaled by one of the falling teeth which permeated a disease of the lung. A piece of it had been impaled, while the other had crawled only in a few seconds and rested inside her cheek worm, where all of her heat was stored. It was agonizing to look, after all they went through. Insomnia would keep them together for the few days they would spend in the ante-chambers. All the while, they looked for signs, alerting the others of the general presence of the Ctnian minds which infiltrated and brought only desolation there. In them, there lay the last remnants of morbidity that lacked luster. Slowly, they would attain fat which wasn't theirs. That's how he kept track of them, just to feel his lumps being carried and fed by them was something close to being orgiastic in nature. They'd nurture them as if they were their own children, even the men. And sooner or later, one of them would be impaled again. The waiting only made their suffering worse. It was no commodity. What were they up to? No amount of questioning worked. On chamber Armock Ellyias, Eight-five, one of the Ctnian tongues had been rightfully imprisoned and forced to stay until a satisfactory change would be brought to their report. Until then, they were merely skipping sea, unable to determine just what the culprit ought to do with the set of tools he'd been given. For now, he only touched the Omnium, pulling ahead some kind of tertiary usage which began drawing in a piece of his own eyes, in order so he could see through the humans on the other side of the room. What reason could they have given him for using it was highly questionable. To think that it would only work on those that had functioning brains was a hindrance to their task. 'Can you feel him now?' 'He's inside of my head, isn't he, I feel a shock and.' It worked both ways. Looking through the eyes of the Ctnian creature served as a simple way to take in the fact that they weren't right. What they were seeing didn't add up with the way they were acting.

First, the blurring scope which went over their eyes revealed the fact that they were still inside their mouths. She could feel the cold of space as well, replicated to an indistinguishable amount. Her breathe, if it could be seen by him, meant she was there as well now. 'I could step in and take it from it.' But she didn't convulse, nor had she given anything else other than a jerk to her mind. There were things in the mouth she wanted to draw near and figure out for her own what they were. In a greater sense, she felt like she pulled from it too much. Her bottom half hadn't been the tail in any sense, but only the least accessible side, that would unpleasantly draw deeper in. She felt rightfully frightened by the fact that she had earned herself a place there, deeper inside the regurgitation area. For a representation of herself met her there, embed, created like a perfect mold, which saddened her just as she approached. 'Leave me be, I think you've done a lot for me now. I'm waiting for my husband to join me at any point.' 'He won't, he's been dead for twenty years.' 'My memory of him isn't. Here I may be able to recreate him so I may pass the time.' The father she looked, the wider the area. It looked like the wider trunk of an elephant, if he had been beaten from inside, or if a shock grenade had been thrown inside of it. The various fiercely strapped molecules which were there couldn't even fathom to feel of the wretch which spread. As a mild result of their Ctnian prayers, the thing they had endured the most stroked back at them, much worse than anything her mind could've hoped to imagine. Instead of trying to draw them in, they were pushing them out, forming various contagions which started reeling the skin out, from the various battrichal pouches which forced themselves inside of it. For them to even spare themselves a touch would be divine. For this would be their last chance to reel back in and enjoy the fruits of the lice. Some sourdough boughs inside of the outer layers started falling down and she felt like at any time it could plow itself out. 'Dear me, what do you think it might happen if it leaves with the two of us here? Our bodies are lost and this isn't the last ship which is lost out there. I may be inquired to think that soon we will be met by them.' A leviathan mark aaczheloh, which was approaching from the distance. In the vast law of the spatial-travel, there had been no mention of the ships which had been affected by this strange compulsory thing. This disease, as nothing else could do for it to be called, it spread and mocked them. Even during the first meeting between them, the two ships anchored one another and in a strange twist, the cameras recorded the grin which came out of it. 'I saw a face on one of the ships today.' Written in the diary of Puhloy, right as it happened a few hours ago. Ctnian be set aside, the ultra-men came out and greeted them. 'But it had not been even comparable to the other crew, which should've been like us. They were not even remotely close to their original appearance, as I may even add that there was something which spread them between one another in terms of who bore what inside of them. No suits despite the decompression being activated. That one I could let slide. But I could not fathom the emptiness presented beneath their bellies in which they stored their real heads. I saw them with my own eyes. One came to me and opened it to show me that he was in no longer in need of it. And there was a brain inside, real and functioning. An electrical impulse revealed it. What they had brought it as our two ships started boiling inside one another's forms had been the complete alternative. Wrong one to life, I have been defiled then. My body became more anthropomorphic, to the very point where I've lost too much of my self among the run towards my room. Daniel, Hert, both of them ignored me, but they did draw some of the things which fell inside of me for some examination. I could hear them knocking inside of me but I'm afraid I won't be able to write any longer. From now on I should only come to rely on written material and nothing else. Puhloy's change had been precise. It wasn't his body after all, but something else's, which had carried its own code over through the ship. That had been their delivery for the time being and it could not be fought against any longer. I saw how everyone looked, I could imagine it, or so I believed. It's hard to say when my paranoia took over, but I would constantly try looking for a way out. Many of them tried getting in. Both of them were disgusted by what I had become, or what the creature was. I was a prude thing, one which grew shaped itself how it was supposed to be prior to the travel. My eyes were no longer needed, henceforth they had been abandoned and lay in rest. But I have been given another way of seeing. From the poking grates present from just about every spot imaginable around my body, a swarm of bad-like broods came out. Of course they were nothing like the planetary things, but mere intruders who fashioned themselves vaguely so they wouldn't be missed. Each of them carried a piece of a string-like pair of nerves which had once been connected to my eyes. They were in leash and I could see through them. My nostrils were missing as well, but thankfully, I have taken Kent into my room. I dragged him, almost understandingly of the touch. Perhaps my mind was his after all, as this impulse of taking him with me had almost been planetary distant, or it had been needed. Otherwise, I could not explain why I planted them inside of him. And the two of us managed to breathe, even if he hadn't been alive. I would live for both of us.

Tonight we will dine as well. As soon as they stopped knocking on the door with such a constant haze, the disturbing thing being the fact that I couldn't reenact that exact moment when I lost it. Perhaps it was my growing body, which occupied my entire room. Damned be that thing from their strange world. This wasn't meant for them to get through. I couldn't fathom listening to it sing for as long as I could help it. It wanted me to look like I was no longer of one piece. My lower body had been made to look as if it missed being alive. On some night, to which I might say that they took turns in order to make sure I would get no sleep or rest, just so I would let them in, I thought I would let them through. But I hadn't given up yet. No one is allowed in here, no one other than me. The pain in the back wouldn't reside from the mere encompassing nature of the muscle that formed there. I saw something move in it. A lack of proper hygiene resulted in the humble clutches that drew in. Just what else was missing from me? I could not even bother to sink my teeth deeper in before I could think of it again. I was starving, and I could hear them, even from the distance. My senses grew wild, and I could feel the Ctnian call of their chants.

If I were to take my chances and open the door, it would be pointless. So much of me was gone, I had been laid down with a cut across the front of my belly, from which came the many arms which had replaced my ribs. Fortunately they had crossed themselves and almost gave the vague impression that I had been exposed for a reason. But they actually bore something between each set of two arms, smaller mouths, the cavities and most importantly, the tongues. 'My conclusion is that they're the ones who were producing the chants all along. They heard one another and I heard them too. Sooner or later they would find me and I won't be able to hide nor wait here any longer.' A dirge of sweat came onto me. They were drawing near which each second I let them to whatever went through their heads. I would be found. I would be strung. Exterminated was an unkind word which dropped inside my head. Sooner or later they will know what I've become. And as the last piece of this new body-suit came, his head had turned into oblong pyramids which ended not in one but two heads, a few other peeling spikes running from around the mark, all of which ended into a flat points. More than a few bricks looked as if the pyramids were the point where the creature's cognition started. Unknown to him now was the fact that he had no mouth to yell. Instead of his, a telepathic insight had spared the others from a recording to be had. Only a slight jerk of the body was recorded before they finally entered the room to find. 'No one inside. But he should've been there, the cameras still say he's here.' 'And we're inside as well. I'm waving at you.' It was no corruption and no illusion either. This had been a savage way of looking into his dissatisfaction as they chose to leave the room. 'Seal it and don't let anyone enter in, on my order.' 'Yes ma'am. I'll see that's it's done.' Least likely to be reassuring, they had left the perimeter and swore that they would return. To admit the fact that one of them would be tempted to cross the line and see for him if he would appear crossed the mind of a few of the members residing the crew table. Shrunk by the head, instead of trying to get ahead of the others, I swore that I would get myself killed by one of them. Just so I could prove how dangerous they were. Not the ones walking through the walls, but the loyalists, if anyone would have to cross them, it would be I, Cromsswrend. To my surprise, they couldn't even surmount the use of light which had changed. Someone wanted to keep them warm, someone in the higher levels made sure of the necessary arrangements. Twenty days passed at least since the feast of those unscrupulous eaters had returned. By now, their chanting stopped, and a few more soldiers had been convinced to join the made enclave, so they might be able to do something of it, in order to remove the mad Ctnian infestation. Twenty more hours in the same position had turned all of their stationary ends inward. No more writhing in confusion would force them to submerge inside the ones who would draw forwards. Two steps would eat at one another, drawing forward, as if it would be unlikely for them to be seen. First they'd eat pieces of the lost tongues, drawing them near until they had obtained the head of one. 'This is the obscure type I've heard about, I think I know the reason for which it belongs here. If you look beneath its strange doming head you'll see a missing neck. Not the one we cut through, but another one which should've been there instead of it. It's a way through which they found the means to reproduce the dead tongues. They won't be satisfied with only doing it once.' And thrice already they were sprouting wings in pairs. They bonded in flight. And all the space above them had only appeared because of their sudden realization that their need to misshapen the ceiling came into their minds. Not it lay domed in a strange and peculiar manner which begged for them to grow again. Though this hadn't been taken lightly, as one could not even hope to do so, they also pressured themselves from both sides of their bodies, leaving themselves exposed to the outside forced. All the meat which had been removed only added to the strange confusion that was there. 'Could I even hope to bring myself nearer to them? I cannot help it, but feel as if we're kindred spirit.' 'You lay in awe, let them be and leave them alone there. Can't you see?' That they themselves were unaware. Everyone on the ship was of the fact that the entire quadrant of space had been completely overtaken by their kind. And to make things worse, this growth-embed parasites could only force themselves to pay tribute to one another in order to allow entry in the rest of it. By their own admission and punishment which be enabled as soon as they would approach, they began eating their spawns, and changing pieces of straggle between them. Only from the likes of a giant wall of femoral forms did the restless ship find a way to traverse. But as the giant maw of the universe opened, which had been taken by them, their entry had only been facilitated by decrepit words which weren't theirs. It couldn't be conceived any longer, that they would suffer so much pain enabled by their own. That even as soon as they pushed through the navel they found a space commentary where they were met by those members of old. Old civilization laid to rest, the kind of space-apparitions only confessed to the worst kind of unsanitary regards. Dead, dead, and laid to rest, how could they craft another empire if not for the fact that they were put to the test? 'I am Illcalciphrot, maker of weapons, forger of the space-bade by the name of Thronpsk.' Twilight and light came into it, one thousand dead stars beckoned at the fact that this blade had been forged out of a billion spines taken from the bodies of Thronks, who battled in mad elegances, shouting at one another in their invisible wars. A petty patch of blood would make them all shudder at the fact that neither of them could even face the fact that they were no longer mortals. Which meant that soon they would be forgotten, cursed with immortality, which would only be wasted on them. And the mad spirit with his squired sprouted their malignant hopeless horns and tails. Neither of them could forget that a thousand years ago, there had come the first man. Abraham, the one who bore, three eyes, though one lay missing. Dreadfully paranoid and hissing over the fact that he had been a relic of the past. His sudden appearance gave in the way for the true rulers, the ones who embodied the lost gazes of broken paths. Bridges lay around, in musty receding fluid anks which had appeared to torment him. Out of his very lungs, he shouted. 'Leave me be, can't you see that I've got no quarrel with any of you? I cannot even see the fiends I'm facing so why should I waste my eternity here?' He had attempted to speak with the derelict, the terms being stricken in his back, where he saw them as what they were, tiny living, long and erected, many dotted spheres inside of them, they looked like spear-shafts which grew at that as their blood-encrusted balls started popping inside no more. And as the blood scourged, no longer had it worked, their will died as one could beckon them to stop. This man's humanity had been driven away, he acted like a robot, unintelligent as well. He acted on their accord and did what they would tell him. 'Summon him, the one we want. Make him come and follow us about, for in our path, we shall devour him for just as long as it shall take us to recede. Otherwise, we shall end ourselves and our bodies, and we will grow thin with the will of the lack of gravity and defiance.' A malignant quiet could only get them this far. Alas, it was decided that they would force themselves to sit apart and cruelly meet one another as far as they would go. No wonder none may speak with them, no one wanted to know what was going in their minds. The blind had known the man and he would shatter himself then. But enough of the crude behavior which affected them now, it could not be conceived, it wouldn't be liked, the strike and the shallow, the madness and the grand hollow remains would be joined together, none the better, none the matter. One will have to serve and that had been only the word. The word of their chants, the words which were stricken in the Ctnian tongue of theirs, the crewmen could not think. In their madness they would sink below the likes and drown each other, lest it be called into action. A reactionless approach came as the mindless members of the crew began taking their lives thoroughly, unable to defend themselves any longer from the blossoming quiet of the mad. They had lost their minds, they had lost the things which made them want to be alive in the first place. It was dreadful, the way through which they would want to be presented there. As one came with a blade and opened a piece of him to see, that there were moth beings inside of them, hissing in the reveal that they had planted their stalks atop of the ceiling, where the greater moth-like horned monstrosities could leap from. They merely bore the appearance of their great heads, which had grown ever-presently wide and high, spreading their dying wings, and promoting the growth of a mass of lobes which inserted themselves in their heads. By no question and no direction would they be seen as anything but that within, a cruel mark, the likes of woe, one would have to cripple away, in order to find his way back home. Prone to disillusion, they had done it, the affliction had met them in full force. Their bodies had been picked up from the ground and as soon as they had, their bodies united with that of the head moth. Together they danced with the macabre, along a made fire made on the deck. The ceiling raised even more to accommodate for their flight, as one would leap in another's tarnished antlers, he would see the animosity and the disease promoted from their loathsome dance. Their songs could not fashion themselves and one could see him rise.

One bottom leg, one fashioned bone, one throne of the unloving and everyone would die. That their finality had been stricken with, a Ctnian who had achieved an act so vile that he killed his own, stricken by jealousy that they wouldn't even invite him to their pleasurable celebration while he was there stroke him as the worst act possible, only the kind of which it may be achieved. He had stricken all of them immediately, crushing them to a quick defeat. No one would survive the likes of such a malignant feast of sorrows. Soon, and stricken and lost, and blasted, they had been cast out of their heaven as their celebration abruptly stopped. Every single flat surface had been blunted and immediately, as soon as the faces appeared again, they had realized what was to happen. All of them had been cruelly defeated and impaled in those mad dances, and spear-lances which had been spat at them. No survivor had come to be out of the mere fact that not a single one of them tried escaping. LyioknAn unsatisfactory image emerged as soon as there was a way to look into through the curtain. It had been pulled, drawn and fashioned into a quick-look neck holder, placed on both sides as a noose, as it acted in the repulsive manner a life would be treated. The next step had been getting it wet with some laudanum, which had been kept by Aldrich in his pocket. It was intoxicating, the way in which it made his nostrils turn to a spread of turned skin-lighted hairs which started floating off. This was the last chance he had to set everything in place. One of the few arid men who had called himself the slinger of populous, bringer of a kind of meticulously strung hedges, to which, his head tilted, and all up the the bitter song of owls, he faced his destiny which lay towards the moon. Frightened by what he saw, as he realised how unworthy he had been, with a sudden him of never-ending grimness he found himself looking at it again. Most of the surface had been encompassed in the numbing silence that enfolded him the more he started at the laughter of the moon. He could not hear it but could see the trifle coming up to him. It wasn't likely that I would ever come to return. Things had been said, and to say the least, I could not even bother to look back at what I've abandoned. I've been too afraid to choose, whether or not I would have the right to touch the tablets again. My fingers still feel numb from trying too scotch around the edges of it. They're not what they used to be. I feel like I started cutting too much from them. One nail was missing. At least that I could be certain of, there wasn't even a way. Too many losses had been gone unattended. Down the distant vale of gloating herd, there were the few wonders coming from the herds gotten from the farther plains, where the clutch of unnerving ends started. A segmented crow appeared from one of the poltergeists. As it began spreading its strangely cashion crow lips from his distant arms, the song of crows began to jitter, as he may. For he, of all, was the unfathomable terror which crept and brought only the last terror from the plains. His crow bore the knowledge of deep crevices and the word of the nest. For in that servant of the Crow-lord Stechh, could only bring in power what he adamantly belived to be the only right amount of peers mattered. They could only stay there for so long, sleeping as they watched each other. He had drawn near their nests, unthinking, to say that they started breeding and cheering would be attuned.

Cards

One servant of the shallow, never-ending piece of hallow, drew in to the bridge. Inside of it hid the mad snitch of black cards, each of them revealing, larvae. He pushed the sole of his foot through the plank only to come down and reveal that this servant, in his obscure happening had been stealing and messing with his dreadful card. He had plenty of his weird packs, and it had been revealed how he had hid them inside the bodies of tiny dead rats.

Ship

One of the construction field lay amidst the fallen ship. It had domed a quarter of the valley in its most malign formless quarter. The machines which only now came into contact with it had scratched what appeared to be the surface of the monolith of a conveyer. 'It seems like this ship had struck an asteroid on its way here. Can you see those long waves of metal there?' Iron formations had come as they shaped themselves in some kind of centric esoteric prods of steel. In semblance of fingers, which may have looked somewhat erect, they seemed to have been dulled by their own senses. Living through the small drops of steel which would soon come to melt, there came another heat wave. 'Drop down to your senses, we need to avoid another one.' Their attentions missed on the fact that the head had only guaranteed the return of the seas of iron which could only set back the constructions then. It seemed like the entities stored in the steel deposits could only be sparse as to say and deal with one another in the very few moments they could get through to one another. It ended quickly. 'We need to clean up the area ASAP and make sure we prevent the destruction of the mineral data before another heat wave comes.' 'What about the side of it? If we try now, we may be able to get through the monolith.' 'Not now, the sensors are tracking on another set of waves. There will be another one coming shortly and I shall not risk it if it can be avoided.'

Dark breeds

The perdition came to cause more damage than it had been intended to. For its own sake, there was one who'd watch while attempting to creep into the graces of that smoldering hole from which the many atrocities lay in their archaic form. It was in them that they looked down upon. Those wretched and foul precursory which lead to what one may a human emerged. Most of their bodies hadn't been fully formed. And in a complete dire need to look down upon them, the citizens of the civilized world chose to lock them into locked area that kept changing locations in order for a prevention to be kept in store. Within their poorly-developed eyes, they couldn't see anything but the lies of the world. Cortexes smaller, brains undeveloped, yet they had something the others hadn't. That being a good image of what truly happened in the world. With all the sustained brain-damage from the various blows which had been given and taken from the outsider, they had come to understanding, that even in their most vulgar form, somehow this gift carried on. Farther in the back, a head which had been spread, on a body which had been dead but had taken the position of a sinking bird of prey which had the bulk of a strong men suddenly opened its eyes as the static position in which it stood made forced him to fly farther amongst them. It looked like some levitating statue had made its way through some invisible field before it got dragged over. As it approached and turned, every single one of those malformed progressively featured creature had only come to realize who that was. Why, it had been so strange to look upon him, especially since they knew him to be one of their very own. Even though it had no lips to speak through but some large beak which only appeared to draw inwardly from a hole, they all knew what it had meant to tell them. Communication had been lacking, in more than one aspect, though its brain had been much stronger than anything there had even been. It managed to communicate with every single one of them in part and only then, at that moment, had it brought them to become aware of what was going on out there. Images had manifested in their minds. Though he may evolve far beyond them by any comprehension those thing had, it still brought something so their acknowledgement might be done. After it, they would be expurgated to the point of never having been formed. In their cities, the men had fallen under some infection which had caused a sudden lack of eyes, and from inside their heads, giant spider legs emerged. The legs had proceeded to continuously scratch their cheeks, until nothing but stings remained there. Marks of pink, bitter chills now ran on the streets crying because they couldn't deal with the pain. For that reason it had come here, in order to prevent its own kind from suffering such a fate as they had. They were reluctant to do anything which may even remotely provoke any kind of distillation. Their bodies were in part liquid after all. One could simply push out of them, with just enough effort that nothing may come out of them. It could see that something was about to happen to them. As their tiny bottle-cap eyes started changing, it had become clear that it was time. They had been crushed and as their bodies spilled in the pile in which no living thing should've been, it seemed like out of it there came the body of a man. Twilight fiends It couldn't be conceived, the very facet of guts which had formed itself in the air. Its degeneracy started throwing some kind of engulfing strength. What had been basked underneath the twilight had been a light as wide spread as that of an eclipse. Blisters, blue, pushed through the throat and into the skin-cloth of a tiny observer. He could pay little attention to the forming small blotches that opened in a field of dark. No man who watched what was going on there seemed to mind that the child had been affected, ever drinking from the blue disease. But the child hadn't died, instead his teeth turned inwardly, darkened by the lack of light. As soon as he had gone away from within the cover of the Twilight and into the dark, he had found out that pieces of him had darkened, much more so petrified. Behind, lost and lack of any living limb, he limped back into the twilight, met by the sight of his own lost limbs. To say the least, a piece of his mind had remained there, as he wanted to say something to the rest of them. But everyone else appeared to be mesmerized by what was going on. From one of the many blotches, the Twilight came to collect, returning nothing to an end. Some kind of despair had been felt only by the child as he had seen small jumping horse-like legs triumphantly running erect towards the shadow. Their hooves were like erroneously-inducing sights which had belonged to the delight of seeing them rise from the ground while they prepared for the extraction. That blue in them only revealed the entire mass of their bodies as they came from below. Morbidly unaware of them, it looked like they had been caught off in the act as they revealed their giant body formation. A big blotched formed in the size of a ship, torn apart by the sheer size it had produced; there came the rattling creature, progenitor of Twilight. As the child basked in its magnificent form, the thing which had come out of it had been but a play of the creatures it had previously observed. Within its grasp, though it may have had no limbs and no means to grab what had lain in front of it, there came the girth of the mad. It pushed itself like a giant globe into the air, leaning forwardly, devouring inwardly what had been pulled away from the child. It had appeared that all of those people were marked for consumption and it was only a matter of time until they would leave the light. 'Step away from it, can't you see what it does to you?' Much more than its insides were there, out there in the open. An apparent gaze had shown her how this creature flung itself across the area in a desperate frenzy to feed itself. In such a blinding need to eat, it had forgotten that it couldn't eat those things affected by the blue horizon ahead of it. Its brain mass stood there exposed to the light. It would seem like it had revealed itself far too much so that it wouldn't be able to handle itself any longer. The mass of grey had been enveloped by its own light and there it felt prey to another one of those devourers. Within its grasp came another one of them who had drawn near, pulling it by the exposed opening and pushing it in the dark. Its body had been able to deal with the exposure to the dark radioactive engulfance of the shadow, its brain hadn't. A meal such as this couldn't have been forgiven or abandoned, left alone, pushed to the side or left to rot. Most of its remains then started sinking as those creatures were only held on the physical plains of Earth's world by their minds alone. They had observed and took a liking in human beings for so long that they tempted them with imitation. A trick of the moody in which their bodies took so many forms which only served as a lure for the brain haze in which the people had been set in. Sooner or later, after every attempt, they would have to take in the bait and give in. It was either that or who knew what may happen afterwards. It waited in the dark there, only pushing the dark image of men simply shaking, thrown before them. That thing had crawled underneath the corpse belonging to the same species as it had been, trying its best to push it forward. One lack of comprehension came to be, as soon as a man had drawn himself near. He would look and spoil no less of an extraction of himself as soon as he came into the dark. The shadows fell beneath him. Then he simply vanished in there. With anything less remaining in his mind, he appeared to be struck by the fact that there wasn't any way of knowing what was going on there. He must be dead, like the creature. It must be that. Near him, the remaining open skin which had remained of that creature got immediately thrown in his direction. Unnervingly observed by the lack of anything but the kin, there had been a way of pushing through, drawing forth, never knowing what had been observed in its small tent of dark. No bones had there remained and it was time to wonder, just how deep had that blue light come to be. Without a way of looking near, out of its very fear, one may seek some kind of disturbance which may not be so. They had looked for way to escape but it was impossible, at least, not without the proper help. Obviously the haze wouldn't last forever and as soon as it would be that they would step out of it, they would've been made aware of the boy's warning, as soon as it was to happen.

Chaotic universe

Clear windows, grazed by the upcoming ship, standing at the metal frontier to the board on the side. An old message from the archive kept being repeated time after time on it. Someone's private code had been broken as it was torn apart and mixed into twenty exact copies. Every single one of them corrupted. Either some virus spread some misinformation or whoever the owner of those messages was must've been some sociopath of some kind. Reading or even working through those had been disturbing. To be clear, many of those messages contained leaked meeting point where cadets were supposed to meet. On a loop there had been an interview with some old writer, or some speaker of the kind. His appearance had been obscured by the folder. Many of his facial features couldn't be seen. But whoever he had been interviewed by lacked any kind of awareness of the kind. Fingers slipped, hands shaking, it was some intern. Folders with name by her hands, it was clear that between the two, those who remained from the crew had little interest in what was going on there. An unworthy amount of insignificant moves came again. Still, without a way to access the interface, the board had only served as a way for those things to be projected upon. It would be useless to try anything then. By two, there had come the food. Just around the board, over the counter, where once open clad of the empty space where the seat were, stood the door to the cafeteria. That door had been nigh-permanently close. Opposite to it there was the view outside the station. Inside, it was clear enough that neither of the crewmen could deal with the tension. Not since everything, out there at least seemed to be so occupied. A few planets lay too near one another, but they hadn't been affected by any gravitational pull. But that wasn't true. To them, it only seemed like it, though most of the planets had been forced to some stillness, the universe was forced into some movement which couldn't have been forgiven. Things just happened there for some reason. Sometimes a planet would disappear. Now, the station was inside the core of one of the planets, only that it seemed to be empty.

Some backup systems had detected the fact that there was some atmosphere present and the lights came out. For now, nothing from inside the planet fell on them, for now at least. Though it seemed like Stall had caught himself off guard. He moved someday last week and it felt like it's been a year since then. His head was gone, simply cut off the chase. And the weird thing about it, what the crew had looked up at was the fact that in one of those folders on the screen, there had been pictures of the screen. A slide-show came to be, moving through picture after picture, set to go off just then. Before the feeding out, someone had revealed how they stalked, hit, pushed Stall down and did what they wanted with him. Afterwards, the head was out there, hanging around the core. Tough atmosphere was supposed to be present and everything was somewhat affected by the gravity inside the empty planet core, there was a floating head belonging to Stall. He was very much alive. Indeed he was staring, floating, trying to flee from sight.

For some reason, the crewmen's eyes widened at a simpleton's act which had made Stall rather ashamed of what he had done. It would be a fool's act to think otherwise. But someone had attempted to kill them, even though they were locked in the same section for some time now. It couldn't have been one of them, could it? The pictures from the slideshow hadn't gone into detail. One may start to wonder, after seeing things like no blood being there, that they were trying to trick them. Imitations made out of machines didn't bring on the risk after the case. No matter how hard one may try, he couldn't force it inside. 'Did you see that? We're out there, out here, in space again.' But this time, the planets had been out of sight, and the stars hadn't been properly aligned. The cafeteria door opened and there came the robot. A general announcement came in. The board's display appeared to have changed before there had been a chance for anything to be made out of it. With a flash of a surge, there it came. If there was one man who looked at it, for more than one second without having immediately instant to the food plates, that had been George. 'Immediate landing incoming, please proceed to the safest area possible.' They had come to a full stop, and suddenly they landed. Something had been of the matter. Without a way of looking out there, one would have to default to give in to the fact that they were stranded. The fermentations-council from Cloghe. There had been a defect in the way and manner through which one could look into what went wrong with their escapade so far. Not one but two members of the marked cover had survived the crash. Some of their cloaks had stopped proving the much desired layer of camouflage which was needed in order to help one survive in such a harsh environment as the planet they had been stranded on. Everywhere around them seemed to give in to the coming storms. There could be no denying that it wasn't safe to go out there without means of protection. As fumbled visions came to be stricken away, there had come the dust from just about, heading that way. 'What was that?' 'I said, it's heading that way.' 'From the opposite direction, can you see it? I believe it's that flashing dot from one spot in the sky. There can't be any denying in it, from the unnatural way in which it moves and. Well, that configuration that's being picked up by its signal. The radar started going on its own again. If there was something to it, the radar would have to pick on in. 'Go, wake up Pierre. He should have a look on this.' Plenty of space shrapnel would've been enough. But this had been something else. It was a space station, rushing through the atmosphere, going on that way, without giving any kind of direction from the push-over light. A sphere of distrust came over the men. Two reasons remained there, with one being insignificant, enough that it would be ignored and the other one having been the fact that for each light-pane which had been laid on the station, there had been a cloned head attached to it. 'Am I seeing this right? Are they talking to one another?' More than that, they seemed to have been living in a state of constant falling. Their hair had been drawn back and it looked like, instead of falling in the same direction as the station, they were stuck in a state of almost hitting its sides. As the heads had lain, there couldn't be anything taken from it, without a doubt, and to and end' shout, there was no one standing over there. 'They must've been some projections. Yes.' 'They're here, they're here, look.' A pile of heads stood in the corners, near their crashed ship. It seemed like they weren't animated this time and if anything, it looked like they just fell. Not a single one had resisted the crash and it turned out that they were released from the state they had been in. 'It's not safe, you know? There's no need for you to touch them.’ ‘Just one second, I know what I am doing, just allow me to try this, one single.’ This wasn’t supposed to happen, and that Pierre had learned it on his own skin. His entire arm disappeared then, and with a single turn or a flicker of the body, the exchange had been done as well. He turned, with a head attached to his body. A space-pioneer left there with a new head on his shoulders. This one was sad. Without general directions, it couldn’t have been thought off that there was a hand out there with a bunch of heads attached to it. Perhaps if one were to look at the cafeteria inside the station, one would serve heads or a hand. Plenty of unused machines lay there. But one peculiar sight seemed to be set at display. On a freshly spread wall of turquoise, the image of a particle-like spread hand stood there like a painting, holding those heads in a spread position. It attempted to get as many hands in its lap as it could. That had been a mad quest for the living-machine. Before long, it approached, spreading its long metallic claws and started getting near every corner. It pulled the flat surface, with its fleshy flat remains. Socketless and without an iris, the eyes moved only with a slightly observable transparency. And those things had been spread all across the station. Without a mention of the fact that there was a sudden consequence to this sudden retrieval, the command of search and reconstruction had come to be. Those heads would be rebuilt, while the hand could be abandoned. ‘Please go on with the transaction.’ A mad machine had been struck by this. Its operating device hanged upside down. Below it there stood a head staring at it. There was a look of boredom which had come over it. Its eyes sparked. From an inward pulled, this head couldn’t have made it through the sudden burst of engine in which it had been caught there. Just one tiny bit of its eyes were somewhere else, watching and following through something of a quarrel. Four hours already out of the way. Down on the planet, the crew found themselves locked in their static-placed locked-room. They were showered by the sounds this man who had died seemed to make. He would simply not leave them alone. ‘If this goes down for ten more minutes, I’ll lose it. I’ll head right out there and grab the first thing that comes in my hands. And I’ll simply.’ Wait. ‘We’ll wait until it clears. He’s human, he has to get tired just like the rest of us.’ ‘His body may be but I don’t know about that head. There’s no sign. Get some cover I say!’ For the top head of a stranger who seemed to look dumb, with its ravenous hair and clamps in the neck, it certainly knew how to get creative. With a grasp, to himself, he threw a rock and almost got to break one of the glass covers of the ship. ‘That was close.’ ‘No, it wasn’t. He needs more than a simple.’ Head, he threw it, away. The crew had been reluctant, even though they had went away and had opened the door. Looking down at it seemed to have helped everything stay clear of what was going on. But they seemed to be less reluctant once they had used the camera attached to the top area of the side-seat outside by the hanged cradles which kept their equipment. ‘It ran out of things to throw, it seems.’ Everyone tuned in to Dolquoise. ‘Don’t touch it. You know what happened to him the last time he attempted to do it.’ ‘I know but that had been a pile. I know it won’t happen to me. There’s no way it could. Plus, look.’ The head melted. It lay in a pool. It looked like one of the machines in the station had accidentally spilled boiled water over the head. Without it, there had been nothing down on the planet either. And the station only stood there in waiting. Enough hours passed for the men stuck in their section to get bored. It had been ever so-reluctantly boring to be there. It didn’t feel like there would be much of a change there. If there was something to stare out, as they gathered about the board, it was the fact that there wasn’t anything to be seen at that. The old footage of the interview had been paused and now, it only looked like the slideshow and the folders had been drawn back. Without knowledge of what was happening, it seemed like the machines had stopped trying to experiment of the crew. Now they had been busy with something far more important and more useful, which was the fact that those sheets of skin and bone could not be forced together. Why, they had picked them and placed them neatly only to see how little could be done about it. These strips would still not go to any waste. One could still eat them after all, and they were getting close to running off supplies. 'What have you expected? Logical fallacies aside, I would abide and observe that there was no possible way of putting them together.' Obviously something which had to have been known, but those things had defied the laws of physics by simply appearing there. It was to be held to the contempt of a machine that stood recording the obscenities and the mere fact had lain itself this way. 'We're located in a universe so chaotic that we've fallen prey to our own game.' And it was true, it had to be true, the fact that the cold machines had become so vile in their desire to mess with the men those they themselves were stricken down. It felt like the station wouldn't work any longer, because it was now set forth inside the ship. Woe, for the cafeteria door had been broken by the mere entry which lay formed by the ship. Momentarily startled by the single head which had rolled inside of their room, they stared. 'Look, our crewman had returned, and. He's brought guests.' 'Wait, where are we? What happened?' Both of those groups looked rather confused at one another there. More so, the door sprouting of the cafeteria malfunctioned as well. The men were met by the machines who looked curiously in their direction. It was strange. The men who had been in isolation appeared simple, in ways which one may come to exploit. 'Don't even think about it. Whatever we stumbled upon let it be.' 'This is what happens when there's no cloak hiding us.' 'Wait, there are machines in here.' He pointed just about his shoulder. They stood like a bunch of boxes with small rotating wheels which held each other in place with the held electrical bands that didn't seem to move but absorb the kinetic energy they produced. When they were done bringing all that energy to form, the bands would draw back as to completely encompass the metal wheels. Small metal legs would expand from the wheels only to reveal a feel holes in them. Sleeping gas came out. Way too effective, especially for the people who were around a ship that had a means of closing their door. Both crews fell immediately on their knees. The metal boxes opened to reveal the androids hiding inside. 'You've got something on you.' Between the two metal boxes which had been shared, in likens of the fact that they rotated with the help of solid metal elastic bands which had been pinned down on both sides of those shifting mechanical cores, there was a head which prevented that from happening. It couldn't be but one of them had been punished again, and by the looks of it, this had been recent. Of course the head wasn't living, as its brain had been destroyed, being caught in many circuits and many pushing wires, but there's been something else in it. From inside, it looked like the brain had been turned inward, turning into a mechanical creation, which only pushed its ambiguity aside. In that machine now stood the head, much more so aroused by the fact that it had immediately been encased by the metal shell which had been drawn back. That action was quick and well thought out, as the machine approached in order to smash its sides. 'Open yourself up.' 'Allow me to open it, I shall begin the procedure of acquired forgery elements and begin cutting it apart.' There wasn't any way of knowing just how much damage the device would do. 'Wait, are you certain this would go on well? Logic dictates that this will fail, immeasurably so, to the point of doing irreparable damage to function.' 'Then cut the chase and cut its power cord, look, beneath the engine, near its wheels.' They've done it, with undoubtedly high-remark to the fact that it didn't stop. 'Restrain, immediately.' A waiting period came to mind. There had to be some way to shut it down. It wasn't going to happen. All of those tubes powering the machine haven't worked properly to begin with. Now, they'd work no longer. A wait had been instilled. For every second spent there, drops of oil kept dripping off their sides. They could only look and wait. It was unnerving, even for them. 'Should we open it?' 'Wait for it.' There couldn't have been a second more to pass until the question had been asked again. 'Problem needs acknowledgement. Gas had been replaced with toxin. No human left alive.' It felt like there was some anger there, especially since the compartments of the station had been sealed off, the men killed, the heads thrown displaced so they wouldn't be living either and now this. Despite the lack of powering, the machine continued working. It looked like this rude inhumanity had ended up with them giving up. Behind them, the torment had begun, as they would be defiled by this human head as its vile speech kept pressing on.

Dead ends

'One more thing, before you leave.' The butt of her cigar only slouched over that bastard ran away. 'Stop him, stop him right away, he took something with him, I saw it.' Thrice already since it happened, it had been a mere miracle that the man could barely help himself that way. It wasn't just the fact that he found himself lost in the confines of the city, but he also came at a loss of words once he found himself being waited for at a rook's crook post formation. 'Hand those pieces you've taken. You know the man won't be able to live without them.' If memory served him right, he's done something downright unforgivable. He's stolen the back bone, the collar, a few toes as well. And the man veins attached and hidden in those parts, in which he had been in a dire need of in order to survive. If else would fail, there would be nothing left in his madly-induced despair. His bag had been filled with many such trinkets, as he called them, taken from the insides of the men he had robbed them from. In their memories, there had been one embrace of many kinds of bone-formed rattle snaked which took shape from the bone-pieces he had collected. They bit him right then. 'Those bones are important, don't let them get away.' As soon as they spread on the ground, the rattle snakes passed themselves off. Dead things gloating at one another, feeling repulsed by the presence of that one globular tendor in the middle of the room, stood. Still, none would mutter a word, as obscure as one may be. It could be seen as something near some disagreement to be had between them. One spare, fourth inch of a man, who stood there, patriotic to no cause. His damsel in distress had been shot in the head but spoke no word, as opposed to the rest of them, she had been truly dead. An introverted creature hid, inside its prison, locked inside with only wit. What had remained of it, seemed be, only that may he be looked upon by his own self. Against one mirror in his room, stood the image of him, caught in static in its need to hide itself in order to avoid capture from the hole behind. Without much need of interaction, he saw that hole appear. It couldn't be explain, not because there was no hole in the room but the fact that the hole acted as if the wall on which it supposedly stood came to approach. No remorse to felt. In contrast to it, his lungs were missing. They were there, in that hole, he knew it, inside the mirror. An opalescent poignant strider parked on the airshaft. There was no air in, supplied had been caught off immediately. It looked like that had been an immediate-death trap for the bandits who thought of using it as an exit. Though it hadn't cut the air supply from within it, no, what happened is that it would increase it until the flow kept pushing onward towards having intruder's veins be forcefully shrivel up into small clots. The air had been alive. Many of the remains had been taken out of the bodies as they would be thrown out or lead into the wind lair above and out of the shaft. Such a pack of wild airs often met and discuss about what they had taken. A strange system had been set in place, rather simple. Though now they fancied themselves playing with nasty streams of blood and various picked up parts, they also carried small wind catcher, tubes of old, with which they forced the sounds of clicks and clangs. Inside air nests, they stored just about everything their deranged air-leashes had gotten into. Then, the entry to their kingdom had been opened. It wasn't for their likes that they would be invited, as there had been revealed that a mighty dark cloud, sought for in the degenerate mark had pushed and thrown those winds apart. Now, this dark wind, of which tiny molecules had not only managed to cut through the sky, but it had also managed to throw itself into the most repulsive manner against the ground. Many trees which had been placed below the tundra now came into being. There had been hope in the high planes of Nevorghr. Harboursing there, the sea were filled with ransacked stools of ded fish that swam no longer. Yet they produced their dirty oil which had contaminated the sea, which only coiled at the touch of skin. It had been so nervous being there. Within the lair of air and that of oil, there was just enough space for the basin to emerge. From it only a couple of those pricks and needle pointers could be there. The retrieval of the damaged wing had undergone serious problems. Now it waited bleeding underneath the belt of the rock's stave from which they stood watching like sedentary beings of evil. Many wore their garments holding off some kind of ill-defined predatory cloak. For each a color, neither other man would hope. To get peak at what they looked like underneath their veils had been strictly forbidden for such a sight could only disturb the natural order which governed over their bodies. Whatever force held their insides together would soon vanish to release them underneath the cloak. In time, a strong wind would simply throw that cloak somewhere where it may never be found, lost in time mostly thrown in some kind of blindness of the eye. 'Bartholomew, what is it?' 'My eye, I think there's something wrong with it.' He had not only lost vision, but a piece of cloth appeared to be sticking out of him. 'What is it, my dear? I appear to have lost my vision.' Not only that, but the wind had carried some of the organs with it, storing them inside the man's skull. It had been irrelevant how that one single member of the gathering had died, but far more important had it been that he had managed to survive. Behind the eye, it looked like the cloak had twisted, turned and spread the remains like some kind of wide net. Though it may not grow any longer there, this had to be some kind of existence of its own. When ready to depart from the piece which had brought it there, it seemed like there couldn't be a thing to be said. 'The blindness must've been temporary. Dear Josephine, I would say that.' Something was indeed growing, a malformation and modification of no kind which had been given form by the fact that the one creature which had been killed was crushed by the damaged wing. One single feather seemed to have been lodged inside the man's head and without it there could be no way for him to get away. To look upon a man suffering and never to ask why had been the reason for which many of the ships died in that place. From the gap of an empty sea, where nothing drew inwardly into the ground there raised a great coral reef of spiked pyramids which pushed inwardly from their own insides. Their many tiny servants came out, wearing their headless robes, walking in lines which had been inscribed against their torsos. Every single one of them placed their hands against their chests in an attempt to follow. It was in that moment that their malignant petrubator had called them in. He had been trapped from within his caged, near the sea's edge. Whatever had it done to earn such a well being retort? In the plane from which one cruel word may twist the insatiable hunger of each starving man, there would be none to speak it ever again. Not any longer, for the time spent there had made everyone so strong that there'd be no way for anyone there to speak of such vulgar trivialities. 'They have returned.' The unneriving method through which the cargo landed had been way too rough. It managed to throw everything aside, pushing some of the standing long pyro-planes to the side. An equipno-sonic reaction had immediately altered the way in which their arms had folded. It had been unsatisfactory to be looked upon. One couldn't look past the desert in hopes that he may see the atrocities of war at large. The land had been affected, its likes pushed through ruin after ruin like some urgent woe which had happened. Not a single soldier had been left to fight, as widespread the battlefield, there could be no way to scour for any kind of survivor. No stranger, yet the deranged would come out of the dark with hopes of getting out alive. Some darkness lay. Amidst the graves there stood the entrance leading to the catacomb. From it sprouted the dead, lain as if towards some task, at which handle no normal man may grasp. Many lay there, forlorn as they piled and moved together like some uniformly lain degenerate rhombus. It floated like a symbol legacy the dead ones had managed to spread across the world. In them stood something so vile, to have formed the means of expulsion. In a hidden den, just then, died the last one bearing them. A man with a body formed out of many long pegs had himself be drawn towards the ground by them. In their attached form, in that world, where none may suffer another of their own kind, there, his twin had appeared. He had been tall and light, eyes which had been green and dark, bearing the mark of a long uncurled, executioner's suit which managed to spread to his knees brokenly stopped. This man looked like a duplicate without a face, for in it lay many of the pegs. Every time one of the many attached pegs drew inside the ground, it somehow ended up being drawn inside his head. Regardless of how big and wide his head would've become, he would still find himself unnervingly erect like that. Without thinking, he emerged from the places where the pegs shot, right in that spot beneath the ground, where his mightily unruffled body had been set forwardly like some kind of effigy to burn. The man's body stood like that, seeing how he would be left to some weakness which never went away, one would have to say. Doom has come. A burst had ignited from underneath him. Beneath him it looked, like on the other side, there had been nothing but emptiness separated by a thin wall of dirt. Those pegs which had been short as well as they had lain attached to one another started bursting into flames as well. Fire spread and at each connecting end an engulfing eye had shot it, projecting in the empty space. Soon they would be released from their prison and be set free. In their kinds of liking, there would be some mad atrocity to behold. Each eye had been saddened that they would no longer be imprisoned, as they had lost much inside their meat prisons. Not just themselves, but those tiny bodies which had remained in their ashen prison, very much unaffected by the fire. And the eyes soon faded, leaving nothing to themselves in that world. Instead, it looked like those pegs chained themselves, dragging both his effigy and the man towards the ground. But that had been a trap of the man. It couldn't be that he could go through it unnerved and felt. He would be sick, from being picked on by the many time he had been forced through it. He hadn't the strength to break through dirt, like that effigy which had been madly alert at what was going on. The paradise of the dark, unnerved at last. A trickster, jester's shallowly coloured face lay as the entrance to the play. His mouth had been filled with many defiled fingers which had been ripped and dragged from sight, into the many hidden rooms permitted by the type of candles which had been there. In each of them there stood the actors, many of which had been dead. The world had been stricken by a famine unlike any other. Many plots of the land stood there, with the servants and the plowers waiting in the same fields they had buried themselves in. A sight like this couldn't be conceived of, not for someone who's break any wove like they had. Their echoes still reflected words. "I shall leave this place alive, with my job done, I shall not starve at all." But they had been driven by that image in the sight which had haunted every single worker, dreadful deceiver, even that one who hid from sight. Exactly-shaped like some mark of the grave, there stood an empty kind of vestibular bone with which they had scoped their insides and fed their demise. For, as soon as their hands scoped and pulled and showed them to their empty image in the sky, that torment made of many large stagnating beetle crags came to show how much of it had been alive. They spread like some morbid comers, pushing through the stride, ate everything they had been served with before every single one had died. Before implanting themselves in the ground so they may grow those pieces they had eaten again, the one who had sent them there appeared. It held the shape of a man, who had a piece of himself empty in the cavity as well. To tell of such a creature would do nothing to no one other than himself, as no one would believe what those men saw before dying on the fields. But they had seen themselves floating there, like some madly possessed mirror which only drew to them. In such an abundance of desire, they had come to admire themselves down there; so much more that they had flown below as they'd begin digging their own graves. Such a task wouldn't do for any other man than himself, especially since the beetles had prodded and buried themselves in the same small patches of lands. There was a the pool where life had originated inside the back of a kneeling fool. His madness reigned, he would prevail, but never would he be seen again. In his peculiar suit, he leaped out of it, wide-spread like some generously forced contractor, trying to chop, brought to a stop by the one who had been present there. Clearly, his guts, the bile, had been marked by the shots left in by the artillery at large. They had been given life through means of seething distribution, the life which had pulled in the dread, the lesser words which had never been spoken instead. Two gates stood opposite to one another, waiting for a blind man to arrive. There had been spirited chains which had been dragged all the way from both directions, and shove inside his sockets. He had been punished for his dark sins and the unspeakable crimes against the dark people below who had lost their minds because of him. In the wake of their shallow tormented candles, there had been some kind of mission to be taken into mad consideration. Not a single sin coming from man could make it so they thought themselves the same. But the prisons had been set in that dark chamber in which the gates stood. And he had been in it, forced to feel and to reel in the panic which had been set aside for his coming. Unlikely as it had been, there had been a desire from within him, to see again. They'd give anything to see the faces of those who were mocking him and where they stood. He could only hear their voices and the sound of metal being knocked over. Each strike appeared likely to be pushing and cutting through. One would likely have to set aside the fact that the long fingers of that big brained fiend, which had been its mind thinking over, likening its long hands to the chains, in order to draw him closer to them. If this uniformly-cut creature, grey and stinger, tongue emerging from its back, wrapping itself as its two giant hands held everything in place. Within its face there stood some emptiness, a gap of features which couldn't be seen at all, but instead one could dig for something deeper and find many of them. In the mushroom-like body its head held, there was just enough space for an adult man to hide inside. And one of them did so. That's what angered this jailor and cruel one. He had ripped the man soul outside his body, forcing it to endure the suffering his body had caused on him. Long ago, this man had been a prisoner there. Now he was out there, seen by his fellow inmates, looked down upon like a frail old senile who had no idea what had been happening there. They saw no gates and no other creature there. It was obvious that they didn't see anything either, just some kind of decay which happened to be flinged from the top of their bars. Their food had been brought not by wardens or by other inmates but from small openings beneath their very cells. Without a day of release, this seemed to be going forever. If anything, they could sit and wonder how he had survived for so long. But they would see him lunging soon after at the first cockroach which had made itself be there. It had appeared out of nowhere, bringing with it plenty of eggs and more than enough dead ones. It wasn't fair. There would be at least one quarter of a billion stored body essences in that jar. Without a proper way of counting them, one could ever so slowly dwell with nothing but his own. If there had been a way of knowing that the Empire would fall, it was the fact that the servants had already transplanted their bodies inside the veils of each one of the walls. They had, for a fact, basked in the appearance of the city, giving it some sort of feeling of ever-living stone. Various monstrosities had sprouted from inside that dreadful marked spots where they stood, trying to escape their prisons, as they formed their malicious limbs which were needed in order to throw themselves forward as the invaders. Not only could it be thought off like some kind of deceitful method of approach, but it had been a loyal woe through which he couldn't help it but show his true nature. This one strange who had come there to grab as many of the bodily-infused bricks out there faded away from sight. He couldn't help it, regardless of hard he had tried mastering his own need or trying to get through. The malignant fields stood erect from the end of a spade and the maddening gaze from which the unclothed parasitical remains of their ancestors slowly faded away. Each one of them carried their parents on their back, who, in turn, carried their own, so on and so forth, until the men formed sharp spires. Those long spires appeared as if they had been tall, bearing marks on them, which lead to their weird inclined posture. At a single point, those spires had been made out of metal. Without someone to look after his dementia-encumbered man-inflicted blow, his mother fell prey to them. And they ganged on her like a pack of small pest-infected ticks only to draw on the succulence of her essence. Her son had been missing in war, it seemed. What had come to nib at her body were pieces of the room which had spread, seeking for ways to enter her and get to her head. Candles stood forward burning and stretching on the carpet, ink following just not far beyond. An entity had arrived. One flame would guide itself through the pins which had fallen. The old lady would stop and turn at the entity. As much as it stood there, guiding itself by the small heed it had formed in its chest, though the room looked as if it was looked at through distorted lens, this entity simply cut through it with its simple movement. And it looked rather flaccid in comparisons which the objects she drew in her eyes. With each step, a pair of entrances would appear on its behind. Small in size and unseen by her, all of them lead to some empty space, where there'd be no embrace. Its dark body turned as to hide the stroke which had encompassed its entire body, many of its spread wings abided as they pushed forward from its shall hole, just beneath the entry hole. From it came a grub unlike anything which had ever been seen, as it's been cremated by some strange other being which it had argued against. That ashen-like appearance had only been its skin, as this winged organ presented itself like a flaccid small tower which had pulled the entire being aside. Such a creature couldn't merely turn, no, it needed that organ to steer itself into the grove. That's what lay outside the pulled room, the high-groove, the maddening refuge. Red and orange leaves aside, the entity presented itself. From one such room, a light came into her sight. People stood inside of there. Though she had been in pain for all of those sharp stuff entered her body but never pierced her, she couldn't help but feel bad for those people inside those rooms. Not a single man with hug one of the many small pups inside. Put this way, the dogs missed their legs. And it was obvious that one single man in that crowd had done it. Everyone but one man felt remorse for the action, yet no one could see and no one would know who the man who'd done it was. She had this ability, to look and know what a strange was really like. It's always been something she had taken a liking into doing. Out of that group of people, she spotted the one that had done it, the one who hid the dog's limbs inside his pocked. What had this entity wanted from her? Though her ability may have worked on those she knew and there were a few people she had recognized, she couldn't put her finger on what was it about this creature. Never had she seen such a creature.

Filthy urchin

Near the likes of a near-sighted fellow, toward which I had come, Cromwell, found himself waiting, staring. He wondered whether or not that man had actually been blind, or by some means, couldn't avoid the fact that he was filled with the malign feeling of woe he had so thoroughly felt. It wasn't likely that he would find himself in such a confrontation, but he had to face it, one way or the other. Something struck him, of the fellow who had been near him. Though he may not have been as disturbed by the clothes he wore, as old and peculiar as they had been, he had found something about the way in which he kept messing with the tiny button on his shirt. His alone had been a way of looking at dark paintings, leaping frogs, tiny grasshoppers eaten after dark. And in that moment, he could not distinguish reality from the mere fact that there had been something in-grown, inside of it. The button which had been in his hand, it was man-made. By the likes of a man, as he had been one, it seemed that there couldn't have been anything of the like. It wasn't the craftsmanship of someone who knew what he was doing, but rather, the sight of the deprave, that of which he had so well known himself to adhere to. A button made of tiny critters, insects he himself must've picked laid there. Against that reflection, he had given himself the kicks and the filthy pleasure of messing with the frogs around him who desperately attempted to eat at it, to devour what they could and might. He had been disposed of as so as the tall man came out of his stationary unit, quite annoyed by this vagrant person. 'Out, I said, I have had it enough with you, go take a hike and don't come back until you're clean and washed.' That's about the last he had been seen. Of course, the man hadn't taken it lightly, so to speak, he was anything but pleased by the fact that he had a chance at getting away. What he's been doing now, what had come to be shed into light was the fact that he had his back formed into a bulk, just like the hunchback. Why was that important for him to know? 'Don't throw that match into that puddle.' Cromwell turned up to look at the man. He looked in the opposite direction. Something had been bloated inside those damned frogs, to the point where something popped out of their backs, small bubbles which appeared to be filled with liquids. It couldn't be thought off as anything less of a huge misunderstanding, in which he could tell no longer what his intention had been. 'What will happen if I drop the match after I lit?' 'I think you know very well, perhaps more so, now, after I'm performing my duty as a citizen, not as a guard, to inform you, all right? Nothing out of the ordinary, but that thing is highly volatile, do you understand? I've seen what it can do, that's what happens when something eats it. First, it desperately tries to escape through whatever means it can. There's nothing piercing through that frog, see? It turned into gas.' The man had done a proper job explaining, or distracting me. He got way too close for any comfort to be had on my side. 'That's about as far as you'll go.' But it wasn't, then, it was. It had come into contact with his body, through his shoelace, through which, in turn, made a hole for itself which was so greatly needed in order to get past him and make it so he would threaten him no longer. What a mess had it come. Cromwell couldn't take the sight of the magnetic pulse which pulled the bloated frog against the man's face. It spread across his face like some splatter, growing, twisting and suddenly becoming engraved by the same type of gaseous thing which had previously formed on the frog's back. Now, inside of that laid the skull of the man, revealed with the meat and skin. He moved no longer and had remained stationary. Still, Cromwell thought of dropping that match on him. It wasn't like there had been any liquid for it to act on, but for the sake of it alone. 'You're not as tough now, are you?' With a somewhat blunt phased face, his hair seemed to have been affected by the wind. It shot in every direction it could, to the point where it might not be held off no longer. So much had he been made aware of something which was there, in his mind, the very thought of popping it off. He had died, after all and so had the frog, both of them being caught in that strange enclave. Instead of grabbing the first sharp object which neared his close proximity, he chose to back away and carefully observe the line of events. That's what his gut instinct had told him. At least that very bile which kept pushing through his mind had. It had been the right thing after all. Some broad strokes of skin displacement happened, as it had been replaced immediately with a thickened form which would be encased as to ensure that the body wouldn't move. There had been some kind of vortex underneath the head, which made it so there wouldn't be any spine attached to the top of this barely formed shaped floating pop. That hadn't been as tormenting as to watch it suddenly be filled on its insides, with duplicated, all of which just shut in every direction but never popped the likes of the transparent skin in which it lay. Those skulls, which had served for their own likes to watch seemed so desperate to escape, for what fate followed had been much worse than this sudden break. As it happened, or had been entailed, the skin had been covered by the texture of the amphibian it had been welded on, the many heads now being tied in a unison of many voices which spoke in a dialect which had belonged to that which may not be named as to be some creature of the depths. From their eyes and mouths came out small tadpoles, which were not small by any other means of measurement, and as if happened for it to finally hatch, suddenly it sprouted its body and started flinging itself in any direction it could. Such a desire couldn't have been named as anything else but the mere desire for an attempt at survival. It had been misunderstood, for the body, which had seemed to be covered in some kind of moss, flagrant with the remains of what had been of the man seemed to have a mind of its own. Though from the top of its body, those lesions and flaps which had remained tipped around the very top of it acted like a mindful plant, forcing it to move alone. One went blindly towards the nearest pond it could get to, while the other, headed creature seemed to be stuck in its flapping motion. There, from his rear, Cromwell could barely even shake his mind off what had happened that he gave in and turned. Four men, strangely dressed in barely visible orange suits came and had revealed what they had within them. As they slowly approached, one bent over to him while opening his hooded-helmet. There had only been nothing on the inside, just machinery. As if that had made it any better, his face had been filled and dragged over with sweat. He saw those large devices, wide and long, which had been connected with many flinging entranced to the back of the containers they were carrying. One small red dot appeared on the moving body, another of which followed. Soon he only heard a quick shot which hadn't made it even less peculiar in the way it had gone through. It was way too fast for him to see, but it looked like they were shooting some kind of small anchors which had been attached momentarily. So far, each shot returned back, pulled by a strong invisible force. They were collecting pieces of him, it turned, before, in its strange, short-lived life, it leapt into the pond, immediately committing an act of self-destruction. There, it had met its fate and it couldn't have been called off. From what he could tell, the body had been the most important part of their desired hunt. By then, it had been made all to clear that they could not put it past themselves to look in any other direction, one approached and seemed to have grabbed the heads. Inside the top of its body, the machines started performing some kind of strange twists and twitches as a long forked body of metal pushed upward until it extended ten feet in the air, pushing forth some tiny dots of metal, some extensions, some filed pins, plenty of wires and at the mid-half there came the girth of an utmost important receding disc-foil. Those things seemed to be all so-adjacent, yet acted distinct from one another. But they had one purpose alone, as the liquid-filled container had come from below the machine. Forcefully, it had been attached to the rest of the body, pushing and cranking forth the splinter which had been the entrance to the spine. It looked rather painful to him, and it seemed like he had almost lost his sense of being. 'Don't touch me.' He looked frightened at the other suit, that's what they were, suits. But they weren't emotionless, at least this one hadn't. Either that or it had been controlled, but Cromwell couldn't tell what the reason had been for him having his hair being stroked. The suit had been gentle to him, it made him feel things which shouldn't have been felt. Cromwell couldn't see why, but at the extension from which came the hands, small holes popped and from them, there had been made a few insertions through the back of his head. There was some kind of bond formed between them. Most of the other suits had already left the area, other than the one which had the skulls transplanted into it and this one. This relationship had been calming as well as it had been bizarre. Without a proper explanation which may be had, this was at least on a whole new level of being unnerving. He missed a great deal of that process in which the two of them had been attached to one another. A whole new level of unnerving woes had lain in their union, as each wire pressed into each head and each brain, which had been functional and working, that's when it happened. They were complete, a whole new being laid under protection and separated from the sight of its very unnerving gaze. So-so clear as it had been, there was something to it, which couldn't be denied. A much expected agony of woe, the entry through which it fled as well. Only this one remained, who had been just as indistinguishable from the others as he himself had been.

There was some inherited hardness which had been felt by him. He couldn't look away, he wouldn't dare say a single word on it. Woe, alacrity, look at how he went. From gaze to gaze he snapped back to reality, oh what a wretch it had been. There was definitely something wrong going on there. It couldn't have been denied by no means of setting forth, no girth, no like as to be set close to itself. But this machine stood, as he had been followed by the Cromwell. It turned before stopping. From its behind, the weapon he had used was sheathed and appeared to produce no kind of threat, at least not for now. Without being ever so aware of something being there, he had dared look out of place. A mere sight bore just enough disgrace for him to understand. To him, that had been an empty machine. A standout had been entranced, through which one of them looked at the other and could do nothing else but miss each shot, by the eye, by the mere fact that neither of them stepped, it had been signaled that this had been less of a fight of wills and more like a surrounding grace of what it could've been. Like some reprogramming of some grace, this one seemed stuck. Would there be a reason then? Cromwell could barely explain why he was there, or what had been the reason for which he had been followed. It was kind of widespread, that place, nothing but the reeds and the loneliness he felt across the grasshoppers amongst their weird roads. Nothing had been laid there, not a single manmade path, but somehow, out of some tough wretched hole from within there it had appeared a formation of long stones which moved across the low-plain water. He could walk across it with no difficulty and he had no fear that there might be something which could drag him off below. But what of the suit, something powered it after all. 'Walk it off if you're planning on stepping in the water while I'm here. I'm not planning on drowning in a shock a trout. Well, I said I don't want you anywhere near me while I'm trying to cross it, do you understand?' Still, for each step he took, so had he. And he would be uncertain as to what that had been for, but that machine kept following without paying heed of anything of the sort, to things like personal space or proximity could be even less than rightfully shown. 'Wait, is this?' Was it what he thought it to be? There wasn't any way of knowing, but perhaps this suit tried telling him something. He would at least attempt to set himself forward in order to distance himself from the low tide. So far so good, as long as he wouldn't step in nor would there be splashes, at least he would be safe. In his head, he could only think of it that way. At least he could hope that there would be some way for him not to fall to that, whatever it was, below of him. To himself, there'd be no other who'd care enough to put it past him, you know, what he thought off. With that being the fact that he wanted ever so desperately to force himself into some flight and get away from the suit as fast as possible. But that would be what it wanted from him, wasn't it? It wanted another one of those head which had been taken for them. Why else would it try following him in such a manner? Such an obscure trance, as it had been, had forced itself unto him by some way which couldn't go past any kind of glory. He wanted to step on one toe and force himself into the water. Murkily aware of it, he could only try guessing what it could be, trying to step inside of it, that being. Just how many steps would it take him in order to get through to where he needed to get? How far would one too many, far too few steps on that rock and that adjacent to it could he leap on until he'd fall? He was already on them, and it seemed like the suit had followed. And with each leap, so had the suit, being as mobile as it had been heavy. 'You don't give up easily, do you? I suppose there could be no hope for me to get away from your grasp, would there?' It wasn't as decently put to them, that they would rather snatch and own it to themselves. It could be brushed off like some kind of well being that they would be stranded together, waiting on a rock. Something had to appear there, in the middle of nowhere, if only he waited enough, right? 'We'll be stranded here for some time, unless you drag the two of us down there. And if that turns out to be anything but water, then I suppose there won't be much left for me in any case.' He wasn't much to have any conversation with. As a matter of fact, not only had he not been well spoken, but he wasn't talking at all. Even though the rounded hood stood there as a means of protection, he could see the fact that there wasn't any way of knowing what was going on behind the closed doors. It might've been anything, frankly anything of the sort. Perhaps there had been certain things which may be twisting and turning, lifting and resting. Yeah, resting, just like he had been doing, not in the same way as he had but he shared some kind of remote feeling of closeness to the machine in front of it. That helmet he bore, to be broad about it, was kind of clean, enough that he could see his own reflection standing against him. It was in fact something he had taken a liking into watching. But not the other thing, the formation of water which kept rising from his back. Cromwell turned and looked, ready to leap on top of the suit if he had to, but he chose to believe that it had only been his mind playing tricks on me. 'I won't be able to last too long without any kind of conversation. Look, I'm not trying to be mean or anything, but you were doing something, before. And I'm not trying to intrude or anything, but I need something to pass the time.' For a second there, he thought he saw the top of the suit having shaken as if in understanding of what he meant for him to do. Clearly, as it had been obvious to his clinging ears, some tools had made the inner working inside of him turn forward. To keep it to himself before he would be ridden from this, he suddenly dragged its hand and placed it behind the top of his head. Moments like this couldn't be anything but mesmerizing, as he had been lost, with little heed and even less of an awareness of the upcoming surroundings. And there were quite some sights to be held, as they were both pushed by this peculiar moving formation, without even getting close to even face the threat of diving through the earth.

What less than some peculiar notion would it be for them to go around and heed no longer what was going on there. Simply said, they could both just give in and lay in that strange concoction as two strangers who had held themselves that way. But he pulled away and he felt the impact of the shore. Cromwell couldn't help himself but stare at the reflection that thing had against the liquid near it. He had been ever so disgusted by this, by what he had done. One of his hands started brushing off the back of his neck, only to return and reveal just what he thought he had. While rubbing way too hard, he found some pouches which bore small pockets of blood. Clearly, whatever he was doing to his mind couldn't have been that great for his body. 'Don't do that any longer, do you understand? I don't wish to be worked that way, I can't seem to shake this feeling off you know? With you following me, I can't figure out whether you're a friend or if you want me to lose my head so you may claim it.' He had been truthful enough, thought his smell had seemed to be rather dreadful for one who had to be near him for way too long. It was obvious that he would lay there and be kind of aware that there were eyes watching. Oh, there were frogs, and worse, tiny bloated sea shells, which moved with a strange addition from underneath them. From their insides, there came some strange means through which they could attempt moving, even if it had looked like it came from somewhere else. Of course it had to be that way, as soon as one of those clams opened, there it hid, the sea-urchin which seemed to have formed itself from angles which, in any other circumstance would've prevented such a thing from even moving inches from where it stood. Clearly, it hadn't been meant to be that way. It looked like some main body of the urchin had been thick enough to the very end, where it had unleashed tight rounded corners which pushed in every direction possible, to the point where it had pierced its own body, pushing and pulsating still while it tried getting it every tiny limb out. With those tiny things spread across each tiny stick of grass, it started pulling itself to some weird fruition of the kind. There would be nothing less than what it had been expected of it. For that to happen, as it did, the suit had no indolence for the tiny culprits. They were the ones pushing something in the ground, plating some kind of strange malignancy which helped the liquid spread. And now, the suits' allegiance had been made clear, at least to him now, as he had come to the very realization that he could see himself no longer be forced to wonder. Widened by the quick draw that weapon of his activated and shot with a sudden kind of mild despair as there had been. It couldn't be thought of being even less of a distraction than it had been supposed to be. But that small creature had been instantly crushed by a blunt strike. The suit hadn't even a need to take a shot of it, as it's been far easier to take its life than it could've been accounted for. Now, to stop and recalculate the position where they had all been placed, around the map there laid four directions which could possibly be passed through the map. At each interval, there came a surge of static shock from the great machine on which the four standing rotation points laid. To them there lay attached some four small land-satellites which seemed to keep the wild life under supreme control. Unknown to the living creatures there, it had been made plenty clear what they were after.

Small prodding devices which had been encased into locks of steel, forged into some flight but kept still by some tubes which shot in every direction in some attempt to keep them still. Through that strange concoction of a cage, in their prison, they still appeared to be active. Tiny red, almost invisible light, who would become invisible once they went into full range, seemed to push ever so carefully to alert one another and connect. With one point in time, there would be no less of a deceitful line through which one would leap from another, and none may know the better. For each time, the flying prisons crossed together, the system would receive a smaller shock, and the small land satellite in the area would become ever more active in its strangeness and the peculiar way in which it acted. Instead of drawing in higher, it would go deeper below, and then there could come nothing but the activation of the others. Each and every single one of them would push and cry after the others until the entire ground level would push upward a few feet. And for the time being, the entire place of dirt of which they stood seemed to be at least a few inches off the ground. As it just happened, something in the gravitational wave shot the ground in a manner of which affected mostly the liquid through its strange man-made laws. They couldn't be denied, nor would they be crossed by any means, for that alone would be of some kind of disturbance which could spread across the very globe. Such things involved the laws of motion through ways which would be unquestionably inevitable to prove as being false. Every single time a drop attempted to fall off the proximity, for those lines, like rivers bends which had flown from the mother puddle, they had been brought back on the testing area. It's been that way for far too long and it was just as clear that Cromwell hadn't the least of an idea of what was going on. They were now messing around with small creatures which appeared, at best to be harmless. If one of them had found itself filled with the liquid, he could only think of the disaster which may happen. And he tempted fate quite a lot, with each sole of his shoe going forth and trying to crush those tiny things beneath him. One could draw the conclusion that there was nothing in store for him for as long as he was there, watching for anything out of the ordinary, or the ones who stood against the small pack. And they had been assaulted by many of them to the point where it had turned into some game. 'I could get used to this, you know? And you're not that bad yourself, I might even add that you could even make a name for yourself if you keep killing them this way.' Well enough, that whim seemed to have dragged him to the point where he had been more than aware of what was going on there. The inner passages which only crept by seemed to signal for the tiny animals to follow and reach for the two of them. Most of them had been controlled after all, through signals or some others means which had forced their minds into this strange control. But, Cromwell seemed to have thought of something only now. 'Stop, stop, just for a moment, don't crush them, I need to think about something.' Clearly, it had listened, and well, those tiny critters didn't seem to be harmful after all. As a matter of fact, they had been rather weak, enough that they could be called into action, as to be somewhat peaceful once they reached them. Neither of them attempted to leap or bite or even push it to the point where either of them could be permanently harmed or damaged. In short, they backed away. But what of him, what had he thought. 'The old man, where is he? Wait, are you with him? Are the two of you even connected somehow? He was carrying just as many critters as we found here.' Just as obvious as it came in his short sight, he saw the small popping of the lenses which had just leaped in his field of vision. He had known for a while that they had been watched. He dared not speak of it, as of yet, not to him, on a whim, just like that. What if he hears me through the suit? An open slit came out of the suit and it came there, in the midst of the distraction that he had realised what had happened. Like some pole, standing erect, it blindly shot through his leg and started dragging his lower side of the body nearer. His hand was forced now and there, from the bushes, from the underbrush, he came. That stranger, that filthy vagrant, dark clothes, living buttons, a beard which had spanned on his shirt, a nose that had buttoned to a corner, with no smile, while he bore his green eyes which changed to red and changed to gray and changed to purple, ever on. From beneath his brow, he came up with some kind of hidden basket filled with those animals who leaped and crept. More of them had arrived, and now he seemed to unleash his hidden bottle, which had merely spanned as to come into action. From it, the insides had been dark and much more than what they were, some gust as if a wind or the blow of some mad smoke came out of it and puffed against the ground. Those critters were no longer to be touched but it seemed like there wasn't much of a choice. Certainly he couldn't even help it but keep shouting as it menacingly approached. To be called in rather dull. He knew himself to be approaching some rather cruel kind of death and even worse, to imagine his head being pulled away was harsh enough, but instead of wincing at the critters, he tried standing up. It looked like the suit had been too busy to pay any attention, since he'd been struck by that process of re-integration which had been set forth. What cruel pain followed couldn't have been described. As he reached for the weapon, one of the suit's arms let go of it, though as it fell, so had the anchor pulled back, breaking his ankle forth, leaving him into some peculiar crawl. Is that man seriously attempting what I think he is? Though the mind of the vagrant man had been so-ever present, he felt amused. With a sudden low-frequency heed, he stopped his tiny servants as he wanted to enjoy this moment for as long as it may be taken for. After all, the suit had been temporarily disabled, and at every corner, at his sight, there seemed to be thousands, perhaps hundreds of thousands of them, which had formed a line, in the distance it would seem like they had all surrounded every single piece of the raised ground, only so they would make it so he knew there'd be no escape. Just how many of them were there? What did they all want? Cromwell looked in shock as they all opened their rounded hooded-helmets. Many machinations aside, there were some who had many heads, others whom were empty, but that amount of work and so many functional suits made it seem like they had formed a dark army. At the signal, oh, another dreadful one, they each took a step forward, oh, so ever thinning the line. Hew would be dragged onwards, messed with, bleeding from his leg. It didn't matter as much as it seemed to matter. In any kind of way, it only seemed like he would eventually give in. There wasn't any other option there, he knew that, even before they stepped out of the shadows. Cromwell thought for a few moments about what it might take to survive. The vagrant walked slowly without a bother in mind. His tiny scoundrel fighters had already been bloated by now and had been readied for what's to come. In the distance he could see those urchins on the ground and understood why the suit smashed them as quickly as it had. From his side, there seemed to be some strange turn of events. They pushed the liquid farther away by planting themselves in the ground, and then made it to the ground where it had been receded then pushed in forward, extending past it and devouring the urchin in its entirety. Even in as close of proximity as it were, he knew better than to feel anger at himself for what was going on. His whim had come as he had turned on his back and looked at the very opening out there, from which stars looked rather dry. He had given in as the vagrant came, either from the pain or from the disdain he felt. Such a distasteful thing as it had been came and fell into his mouth and seemed to give in the agony he felt while being alive. As, in the distance, he remembered the man, and it was almost as if, in his mind, for a short period of time, it wasn't those filthy pests that came over him and started the process which had been forced upon him. No, that had been less of a bother, for what he had felt were the memories of that guard and the strange cognition of the frog at that. It just so happened that, as they had both forged themselves together, pieces, molecules or fragments of their brains had been scattered everywhere. Now, as distance had played a great role into it, there had been no way of knowing how that even happened. It would be unclear, at that, the way through which one may look as if through some loop and see it, there, far, in the distance as it would approach. Well, in that very moment, the molecules had partially been shot through his face and managed to pierce pieces of his face. That concoction had been enough to generate such a strong attraction that somewhere, in the army of hundreds, seemingly endless number of suits, one of them suddenly winced. Since he had been a hybrid, no less than what he appeared to be, he suffered most. His hood-helmet drew back. Once it had done it, suddenly it had been revealed that the malignity which had poisoned him seemed to be reluctantly laid in some awe. The living part of him started shaking, as every skull, every head, every piece of it started shouting and rotting until it came. From the distance, the entirety of its biological concoction had been pulled as if from distance to that very man who had stood there on the ground. With it, half of the body the suit had had pierced through like some spear as it had been dragged away with the heads, destroying the beacon the other suit had become and finally joining Cromwell as he'd become. The sight of him had pushed the vagrant and made it so he'd be on his toes. He couldn't look ahead and he could only dread of what was to come. He had pulled in parts of those suits, the head, and their memories and seemed to have grabbed a piece of him as well. But no less of everything, the utmost perilous of filth had taken its embodiment. IT was the urchin which had taken control. That nasty thing which shouldn't have been, it came in to the point where it couldn't control itself and forced every piece of the body to shoot short spears in every side, including itself. Before he had the chance, the vagrant had been impaled, the tiny critters as well, caught and killed, bleeding for their own sake as well. No more than it had been clear enough, this distasteful thing had earned them the likes of never to have survived. It was such a process of agony that nothing would disturb them as they rested. Without a master to look after them, the suits waited, stopped and looked, at the altar, spiked as it had been, overlooked by its own kind. Alas, there it stood, floating in the ether, forever, never to be seen again, for the platform stood there, in the air, forever.

High disturbance

More than a few times already shot out of the window. It was then that the prairie could be seen, with those sharp wooden stakes at hand, through each close-call and moving glance, as each trembling hand stopped. There were quite a few men applauding there. It was all too obvious by the redness of their palms. Many had almost come to form their strange calluses just by that. I jumped out of the strange balcony and landed on my feet. Front row, it looked, fourth seat, which had two men standing up, looking at me for some reason. Neither of them knew why I had done it, as they had been busy enjoying their show. It had been displayed there, right about the front of the large obelisk which stood in front of him just then. 'I thought it wouldn't be here.' 'But it is, now sit down or take a leap.' The voice which came from his left side had been the one conductor who solemnly waited for a thicket. It should've been in his hand by then. But each pocket had only been weary of some dirt inside of it. 'No thicket? Are you sure? You come here every single day and you always bring one. I would at least expect anyone else to be clumsy, but not you.' The show waited for him. Not because he had been someone important, but because everyone else started in response to the fact that he needed to do something. The mad thing inside the obelisk wouldn't wait. Such a confined creature, of the set of eyes, trapped inside such a small cage could only lay so low until it would be broken apart. It took on the time to push forward an m-shaped leg, from the side, which only expanded as to make a likes on m-shaped long legs. By then, he was the only one staring. But he's been too tired to do anything of it. Those legs, they weren't mean to do much, as frail as they were. It was clear that they were only part of many and seemed to have set its stage. By the time they had extended and had wrapped themselves around the stage, it came to him that it had so vastly prepared to bring out its hands as well. They were quite better as grabbing, oh, they were quite the spread. Indeed, through some vastly outnumbered set of finger holes, they started creeping inside each ear-lobe they could reach. He knew that creature needed as well. But, any other man would've found this creepily unforgivable.

Not him. 'I'm. My name is Paricott. The man you've previously served before I even came here was, my twin brother. Yes, he was my twin brother. So, please forgive me, but I don't want to cause him any trouble.' 'No thicket then?' 'I could try looking around inside his waist coat. It's his after all and that would be a reusable thicket, right?' 'Only two uses, per view. There would be no refunds for any man, and changing the man would mean two uses.' 'Between us.' He seemed to have twisted his eyes to their tips and ends, only so he may get an overview of the show attendee. It would be rather silly to think otherwise, with so many of them being used. Well, he's at least tried to get his attention, to the point where turning couldn't have been anything but a nuisance to him. At least that's what it seemed to be. 'You don't have to charge me for the price of two men. We could pretend I'm my brother.' 'Which one?' 'I beg your pardon?' The conductor looked as if he had been smug. A drain of sand was already being filled from above the obelisk, and it had been pouring from the top of its golden, stone-dunes as the hieroglyphs started being run on. 'Which one of your brothers would that be?' 'How did you know?' 'Try not to be hasty, I've spoken to your brother quite a lot, don't try taking me for a beginner in this line of work. Just between the two of us, he would tell me something now and then about the likes of you.' 'So you know.' 'Enough that I would just happen to make the difference between you, another and the other and whoever might try claiming themselves as some kind of imposter.' 'What imposter would that be?' It was staring at me now. All of them were. That thing had a piece of its body sticking out. Its legs were no longer shaped like m-shaped daddy longlegs, but seemed to have gained a fat to them which prevented them from moving. As far as he could tell, the creature wouldn't be able to get pushed back. What had been sticking out, to put it out of the obelisk from whence it tried pushing from, came some shooting-tied an expanded pitch which looked like some sonar body-bulked machine, with strings attached made out of the same bolted tallish skin it bore. And each string seemed to pull that hard block of body which forced itself into the air. If that would grow to the point where it would be dragged out there, he knew that he would escape. The men in the front seats had a chance of pace. As in their face was left some kind of old and harrowing look, which only made it so they gave up. They haven't been killed and seemed to be too busied by the fact that there wasn't any way to exceed their expectations. Less interest could be shown in the well-being of their colleagues in front of them. As he continued, he had to think of what he was supposed to tell. Would he expose the creature and in turn expose himself as well? Does he know I'm not one of the brothers? 'Well, you see, my brother doesn't know me that well and what I, I. Found it.' 'What did you find? Another thicket? Another lie? I can tell a liar from a man, and you seem too young to be one.' There couldn't be anything even conceived of it, at least not yet. What did the man even want now? It snapped. Perhaps it was the waiting, or it couldn't be bothered to wait for everyone to live with it. No one else had had the opportunity to turn, maybe one or two of them managed to lunge forward and save himself but the obelisk from, his prison thrown, as if the choice had been taken and it would fold. Everyone cracked there, thrown on the ground as they stood and obeyed. Not of some mind formation but because they feared what that thing may do to them. Paricott only watched in content as that thing came out. Its four legs had become fat, with two of them being covered in the grain of sand which had come from its peculiar prison of sand. All of them lead to a thin body which held that box of fat at the top, which had been strung to the calves of each leg in part. Where had those finger-holed long arms gone? They were nowhere to be seen. Perhaps from up there? Had those sonar-strings been its arms? Well, there could only be a way to find out. 'What are you doing boy? Don't go near it, I swear, it's not supposed to break out. This isn't part of the show.' And as he approached, he came to know why they all feared it. He was wrong, what he had thought had been wrong. It wasn't anything but a trick of the mind there. Everything around them felt likely it had been projected into another place. Both of those realities overlapped through some method, through some other, that creature hid it there. He approached and saw each man in form of plants. After bending down to touch one, he had picked a part. Unable to realize what had happened, in the other world an arm had been ripped apart. But he wasn't able to move, he couldn't be hurt by the boy. It could be excusable. At least, there had been some hope, he'd say to himself, that he would rather try not ripping too many. 'What's happening? I can't turn. Who's screaming?' 'It's the boy, the boy that was trying to cheat his way out of some thicket. He's torn Lord John's arm off. Someone needs to stop him before it's too late.' Each string worked at it, drawing and pushing onward for their likes wouldn't stop from that constant commotion of movements. There was a sudden smile on his face, after coming to the realization that what he had been doing was so wrong, he couldn't come to control himself. With a push and a clang, and a string and like that, he started grabbing and choking forth, each piece of plant, which ripped easily at that. No one dared move, out of some non-explainable mark, until the ones who stood forth suddenly turned, on the whim of an effort, the boy had been stopped. Would he be cowered like the rest of them? That was uncertain. It couldn't be that he would give that easily in. He had enjoyed himself way too much. All that meanness and the way in which he had expressed himself gave him too much force of will. He had really wanted it. But those four weak and fat legs suddenly pushed themselves into position. And from the bulk of the top there came the hand which stretched and placed themselves into position. From the side, there push outward a mad concoction like some lever which turned on and on until it stopped itself. There needed to be some assistance as one weak hand turned on the piston and the other tried itself on the strings. Even those plants which had been placed there, which had become flaccidly awake now came to be together. Now that they were reunited, even with those parts which had been broken, the song had taken full effect. How could they call themselves men now? It had been a fully-fulfilled exchange. Through some way, they had been brought onto the other side and were made of flesh no longer. Now they weren't plants, not that those were plants to begin with, but some vines, which had wide images strung like films which had recorded the lives those men had been into. The boy had been thanked for. The conductor himself seemed to have come forward, brushing past him, only to perform the exchange. He had kept a face quite humane and mundane. In their past and strange relationship and trade, these men had been robbed of their lives and memories. And for what? A few bars of gold. 'Oh, here's for your trouble, boy. I think you've earned it. You know, I think you've done as great of a job keeping them distracted as I have done my work on you as well.' He wasn't pleased by what he's done. He found himself feeling like some of the lowest kind of trash there could be. 'I didn't mean to do it.' 'I saw you looking, for quite the extended period of time. You didn't say a single word, you haven't even tried to warn them, why?' 'Why are you asking this now? Those men.' 'They're no long there, nor here. The only thing left out of them, is, their memories.' He found himself staring at the man, in the prairie. No one around them stood there, at least, not the fiend which had been trapped in its obelisk. Only the two of them stood there. The town was still inhabited, if not by stranger, by the wives of all the man who had attempted their show. And this conductor seemed to be getting ready to leave. 'So that's it? You're just going to leave as if nothing happened? What of this town, what of? How could I even explain?' 'You'll figure out something, kid. I've been trying to work up these men for weeks, so I think I deserve a break for now. If anything, this may be a valuable lesson for you to learn.' The conductor had already made him was to the small mound which had been made. He looked as if ready to start digging, but he only pushed a piece from the top and it looked like he found what he was looking for. It wasn't like anyone else was looking either. It was still too early in the morn'. Paricott didn't move. He couldn't chase the man out of fear that he may end up like them. And that conductor had little interest in anything other than himself getting away. At best, there had been some waving, as he left the boy behind, taking off on a carriage which wasn't his.

Moons

Plenty of moons stood there, floating in their own peculiar ways. Like some strange concoctions of floating eyes which stared at one another dancing and taking bites. Some of them had had plenty of men who had taken to themselves to invade them, forming mad colonies and enslaving those darkly skinned, special creatures which bore their heads on top of mazes, pushing forward blindingly to the haze. In their strange admiration of one another, they would often stand still and gaze upon their own forms, for, unknown to most, they all looked the same. And long, during mad eons, they had been alarmed over the fact that they had some similarities to one another, those mad moons, strange beings which they were. The truth could be anything but farther away than what it had been. For the sake of their likes, it seemed like their insides looked rotten by some different mean. Each of them had their own torment which held them apart from one like and the other. Some scourge had been formed in patterns in one, the moon-matter having been shaped into small drone-like, large and planar walkers which seemed to grab the insides of their moon, while carrying them around the empty gap which reign around them. As long as the discourse required of each being made out of stone to fall into some motion, they weren't tied. Rather, they moved like large statues, floating in the empty space which laid around there, carrying those small stones and rocks into the open, visibly formed mouths. Those weren't made out of stone, even if they erupted from them. Rather, the dark appearance of the pink flesh ended up to be rounded into circles, which pushed forth small pointers and dreadful cutting, less-defined sharp horns. They moved as if waiting, and showed little joy as they were being fed by those small flying clusters of stone. In truth, most of them had been only perceived by those gaping mouths to be alive. They were fantasies of their own. When in reality, it turned out that they were nothing but some kind of peculiar, estranged rocks which flung themselves from one point to another, bashing themselves into smaller pints which may be eaten by those mouths. And each bite had hurt, as both mouth and stone were cut off the same cloth. In some strange kind of unison, they dreaded the pain they had inflicted upon one another. But that had been felt the most by the watchful moon. On the outside, it kept the bickering mad smile, but one wouldn't be able to comprehend what the insides felt like. Soon, the stone could be revealed for its flesh and then, it would finally be dead. Nothing but the shell it bore protected it from the outside entities of space. It had been rightfully there, those living veils which dragged around and seemingly brushed off around them. Mostly, as their touches felt cold, there couldn't have been thought of anything less than some madly-induced birth. Something came out if it just then. The many slaves had been forced after all to mine something from their bodies, to the point of having been forced to dig up blood-meals as they forced themselves on the rampage which had brought them to extinction. Squad eighteen laid just around one body. Squad four, five and ten were just near them as well. It looked like one of the slaves had sucked on too much of the succor and have been overtaken. Compared to the rest of those savages, this one had grown twice in size, its four limbs had taken a wider, slightly misshapen twist as they started connecting with the joints from which they came. They formed these ellipses from which all the blood and meat in them had taken to their body and head. And since their heads had been attached to their bodies and as they seemed to be indistinguishable, it appeared as if they had formed the crest of some knot. There couldn't have been anything gushing out of it, at least now, that it had been less of mystery of what it's done. 'Return to your posts.' Yelled one of the commanders, through his translator, as the gutter of sounds came. It was a mystery how those blind creatures heard and even more so why they had obeyed. But through their bodies, they had been mutilated. In the middle laid some kind of device which had been forced through the bottom end of some entry which no one should've messed with in any other case. They acted like plump oil refinery machines, standing still like cranes, while the machines performed most of the tasks. Well, to say the least, it turned out that there was nothing of the like which might matter. Up and down they went, and through side and side, never stopping from this action. Yet, this kind of problem interfered with their work. Their bodies were bloated as one piece of those square, pump-like globes grew too full of their blood. 'I told you already, you're pushing them too far. What do you think it might happen if you're going to keep pushing them so far? This is the fourth one now. For their sake, I hope you're planning on giving them a break at least.' 'Mc. Avenue, you know we can't afford it. Damn's sake, you know they're going to eventually die off from those things attached to them. Let them work off until their deaths and we'll wager that something might come off from it.' They had waited, four more hours. 'Do you think it's safe for us to touch it now?' 'Not while that ticking time-bomb is still attached do it. Just take a look at the pool coming from it. That blood mixed with oil, it's highly contaminated now.' Though it hadn't been only oil and that was the disturbing part. There was something there which shouldn't have been. Some kind of perplexity of guts which had been dragged as well, small living organisms which had developed from it. 'Don't touch it, leave it there. We'll come for the spare parts later, if at all. Now, do well and surround the area with the small pointers and make sure no one will come in the proximity, all right?' 'And what of the others?' 'Just do what I tell you, squad ten will make it so we move onto another one of those moons.' 'And move our base of operations there? What for? You can't seriously expect us to move entirely there. It's mad. You can't seriously expect this just because.' 'Perhaps you didn't hear me well enough, I sad, do it. Leave the pointers for when the next team comes and never return here, understood?' There was something seriously wrong in the way he was breathing inside his own body armour. Without a way of knowing, he could only think of what it took him to understand what was going on there. Hornett Jonnard. He was out of place there. In some way, he knew what the leader of this expedition wanted to make out of this. As one of the main stars of that universe started imploding, the moons changed the shape of their eyes. Their giant pupils turned inward and shrunk. From inside they shot long solid beam-like tongue straws through which they started tickling and wrapping themselves at every star. Every single moon had partaken in this ritual with the exception of one of them. That one which had become as sick as it looked to be. That alone seemed to have marked it for some grim escape. Slowly, in the midst of its bottled rage there could be nothing but the final closing gap which forced its eye to recede in a stagnation of breeding red skin. Truly, as if for the likes it had bore for itself, there would be nothing but a discouraging shout from the men who looked behind from their shuttles. It seemed like then, in the wake of what's been happening, its inside had suffered most. The shell which had encompassed the inner doings of its body now left them way too exposed. One final opening motion from all of those mouths had revealed that there hadn't been any other way to get through. Now, the final stance had been taken as they've been exposed, this paranoia which made them lapse into unconsciousness came. And they blew themselves in some guttural form, pushing and splashing, being tied with long congregations of bile which had caught in their sticky net all of those things which had laid inside, tying them together. Suddenly, as if being unable to hold it any longer, the straw-like tongue had pushed inward instead of pushing outward. As harshly as the virus brought in by the vile creature had been, the insides had been filled entirely by the tongue. Without a doubt, there'd be no other spot, not a single empty gap to be filled once it had been done. That far, as to say, had been the fate of the creature then. The surge had come and in that benign moment, it looked like there had been an endless stream inside that moon. Through the straw-like end, where it had supposedly stopped, or had meant to stop, suddenly it had found itself to be continuously affected by that disease. As desperately as it had tried pushing through, stunned and fought against, there it was caught in its battle. Less than it had been for its reign, the tongue started thinning out at too fast of a rate. Mindlessly aware of it, its own tongue had pierced itself to create an eternal conundrum on its inside. While no longer attached to some part in its body, the stream had gone on to grow and move as if through some inner tunnel or some kind of path on its inside. Hollow as it may have been, there could only be seen in the light of its own damning self. There could be no escape from that sudden trap, while the others were too busy to pay any heed or any attention, that moon would not survive. Without a doubt, there could be nothing gained from it. It a strange subterfuge, inside another one of those moons, there could only be that. One long rounded yolk, which had been formed from the insides of a living being, stolen and made as if it would look likely to be erected as a planetary escape. Inside of it, what may be described as some kind of twist of the dark, there laid just enough room for a body to be laid in. As so be calmed down, for the universe wasn't as cruel to attempt to recreate the human body, no, it hadn't been that. Instead, it had only been another smaller, paler moon. The eye of a child lay on it, and as if from a womb, the tube which had been erected from its side had been that tongue. Oh, how, as opposed to the others, there it lay. No one might wager what that had been. No less, and fewer of the like, one couldn't protest that this had been the arrogance of life itself. For all of that past time, in which the moons looked at one another, each thought itself better than the other. But none other could compare to her, for she had stored her mind in that small body, reckless of the fact, need she be reminded, that there would still be the chance that one of them might be an aggressor. Another moon seemed to lie, inside of it being that credence of a peculiarity, through noises which may be unheard. Everything had been forced, in a low-gravity course of motion only to look at the one which had been standing near it, staring and pushing so it may be less than as a leech as it had been. For, there were other tongues inside, ever so thing that came from every side, changing in colour to a point where they had penetrated each adjacent other moon. It sucked from them and kept itself vigorous. More so, there seemed to be something coming from it, in the way it had found out of the death of their precious familiar and the second plan of escape the other one had. Oh, how the sabotage began. Day by day, if only one were able to count, it tried finding some way to take that into effect. Thought it may have wanted to make a claim over the fact that it may have poisoned and killed the other one, that hadn't been the case. What a claim that would've been. Instead, it seemed to have instilled in itself some kind of plan, oh, mad and benign. If only one could see that maw grinning in the end of space. For alone, as it had been, to its race there lacked some fewer close calls. Tongue after tongue it wasted and re-grew. While the others had been occupied, it had performed some kind of special surgery to its brow. First there came the claim, after one tongue tied itself to another one, and afterwards, it pushed towards another, there seemed to be, without a doubt, some reign to which none may heed. That had been the kind of plan, one sharpened tongue came at last, cutting the last one in line. Afterwards, another incision came, which followed yet another. That pseudo-dead tongue had formed a twisted dead whip, floating into space. Like some mischievous thing, it pushed through the hollow space inside the back of one of the moons as it connected it to its living flesh. It's been seen by the squad, who may have been rather busy trying to group up and push onward. Some of them were getting way too ready to draw in and set aside what they were doing, with many-a-hope that they could run into something useful. For them it mattered little, though that had been an interesting watch. 'I think there's something.' 'Let me stop you right there. Turn off your heat visor, you're not supposed to see those things. As long as we're concerned, nothing's happening there, do you understand?' 'But something wrong's going to happen there, I can feel it, I can see it!' 'As I said, don't try getting their attention, as long as we avoid that one, see? The one from which those lines of heat are stretching from. As long as we avoid that one, we should be fine. Don't forget what we came here to do. Now go ahead and join the rest of the squad and deploy the slaves.' 'But that won't do us any good if all of them are dying.' 'Are you trying to defy me?' His eyes seemed onset on him, his every move being watched. This damn little courier, who had been no man's soldier, not even that great at what he was doing decided to give in the lip. Well, there, if you want to play with your damn whore of a moon, then have it. He reached from behind his back and pulled the cap off his back-pack. He couldn't be heard since their communicators had been disabled, since they didn't want to risk disturbing these strange space-formation, which could only mean that he was gone. The mission leader saw him float out there, lost in what appeared to be the nothingness of the lost cause. A special emptiness which took on and removed him from sight. His colleagues looked forward and never even dared return to their posts. Neither of them could even hope to take that off their minds, the blank stare and the passiveness he had displayed, which quickly turned to frown at them, as if he had been supposed to put it on like in a play. He smiled and almost danced as they lay behind. 'This can only go on two ways, and you know it.' 'You won't kill me will you? After all, without me to lead this mission, you'll crash yourself into some dump and die off. That's quite right, you need me.' 'We don't need a murderer amongst us.' 'And still, one of you may have to kill me now, unless you want me to carry on and get rid of the witnesses.' The leader, as high as he thought of himself had no weapon on him. How cruel fate must've been to him. The way they looked at him made him feel like there wasn't anything he could expect. He would not get to plead for his life there. If that were the case, he would've been long gone by them, with the two being lost in space like the man he had killed. 'Right, that man, does either of you even know his name? I seemed to have forgotten it.' Neither of them even planned on entertaining any idea, if it meant that it could come from him. He had already found himself empty, that had been the best feeling, or the only one which may go through his head. He felt empty, or, he could barely see what was going on in front of his eyes now. In such cases, he expected he might be able to see some trail of blood coming from where he ended. But no, it was rather decent. He had liked it, seeing the tongues from the distance and how peaceful it were, that the pair of moon-tongues made sure that those stars were taken care off. 'Good riddance to the man, I can't stand the fact that we left scum like him carry on.' 'Wait, where are you going? Shouldn't we report him, or I. Look!' 'I know, I know what you were going to say and I, I understand.

There's no need that the two of us have to go down for the murder.' 'I knew you'd understand.' It wasn't like there had been another alternative. He had to shoot him from behind. It was their leader who gave the order after all, no witnesses. And, it wasn't like he could be checked since he forgot that they hadn't marked their tickets out. Corten hadn't even been his partner either. More so, it groaned then. As another moon died at the very edge of the knotted tongue, as they had formed a line which connected that pestering wound from which the infection came, nothing could be done any longer. Even as it had been drawn from the gravitational force, one touch had been enough for the infection to occur. The area around it had been numb and the bitter crevice which had thrown it in the direction of the dead servant seemed to have reeled back to itself. One of the moons had escaped the other one not so. While spreading through the ill-implosion of the vagrant reeds which had been shown them as what they were, it had become clear enough that there couldn't have been anything else which may go wrong. The tube and the small womb inside of that moon had been immediately affected as the disease had spread. Before the tiny moon could leave out some groan, out of the pain and innocence, it had been highly pushed to a size that no child should've been forced into. That disease had shoved the blunt force of a long appendices from its inside to such a growth that it couldn't have been called as anything but recently cut. Many pains had been revealed, as the gap between its eye and body peeled. It had been pulled out of its moon-socket as it had thoroughly been implanted in some kind lock that shouldn't have been there. This virus hadn't acted normal, no, it had mutated by some means of ecstasy. Oh, those various tongues had did some well, as they had established some kind of orgy between their likes. By now, the womb had been ruined, but they had no care for it. As this wasn't its own tongue, no, that had still been prolonged and thrown out there in space. That mischievous Moon had stood victor as another one lay dead. It wasn't supposed to end that way, as the star against which that moon had been extended had been surrounded by the tongue, in the exact position in which it would say for its foreseeable extended-lifespan. And their ritual had been completed then. What they had returned to was a sight of shock, which hadn't been shown on any of their emotionless rounded faces. But each knew not to trust the other, for one of them had to be responsible for it. That being, to give credence, to such a heeded record, they had looked at each other and seemed to be prepared. In each of them, their insides started being broken apart by the mere desire which had been given birth by their own insignificant petty unresolved differences. 'Keep digging until the unit leader comes back. Those were his last orders.' No one asked him. No one told him to repeat that. Everyone knew what they were supposed to do and all this time without any kind of communication had put everyone on edge. And it was something no one who was close enough to another man could yell. They were mostly there to watch and make sure it wouldn't happen again. The mixing of the blood, which had been filth or the exhaustion which had pushed those creatures to a sudden pair of strokes. It had to be dealt with through some ways, yet no one wanted to talk about it. It was them, who had been responsible of those creatures. Their task had already been getting in the way of moaning and the likes of pushing some kind of confusion for the likes. Now, when some creature would be getting unresponsive to the simple commands through which it had been indoctrinated to respond to, that's when it started. 'Shoot it, drag it in a place where there's no opening and put it out of its misery.' 'But shouldn't we wait for the leader to approve of this?' 'Do you see him anywhere around? Have you heard of any sign of life coming out from him?' 'Me neither. Now, who's in charge when he isn't around?' 'You are, Sort.' 'And is this not a direct order in his absence?' 'But what if he returns and what if he's not pleased by what I've done. We both know how he is and just how far he'd go to get what he wants.' 'We'll just say that there were signs of the infection. He'll know better than to attempt to contaminate another one of the moons.' 'Does he, now?' 'I would assume as much.' 'Well?' The two men pondered about it for a few moments. It wasn't likely that they could reach a general consensus about it. But they had to do it, the squads four, and one were waiting for them. A total of six men seemed to be waiting for a reason to drag that creature by its knees and push it on a bed or rocks while they'd extract the machine. 'Fine, but if anything goes wrong with him, that's on you.' 'And I'll assume full responsibility if it boils down to it.' With a signal from the overhead, they came down right to it. As much as they had been pinching and prodding at those things, the sudden pull of the extracting crane-like coned dropper got immediately pulled inside. Everything seemed to go as intended with the occasional scare that the men would most likely fall under the circumstance of falling underneath it. 'Move it, move it, place it there, push from right side.' At the rear every man turned out of the fear that they might be caught under the rubble and fall off their own senses. They had been driven out and seemed to be less than disturbed. To be more precise, why, their very likes haven't even cared about what was going on there. In the midst of them moving from one Moon and the other, they had love one of the formational cranes, a plutonium-infused chain and seemingly eight thirds of their raw material, which was ever-so, called into action. 'Missing, missing, missing, and now this? Two of them had been flying over-head, look, can you see them? There in the distance, I believe that you may be able to push yourself to the point of seeing them if only you were to try a bit.' 'No, those must be just some space clusters, you know, like in the old movies. Made out of rock and space-debris and spinning planet-tails. There's no way one of them could've went that far.' 'Activate your visor. Now.' The man took two steps until he stood watching and peering out there. Something else came into it. They've been well trained after all, only use as much of the body amour's vision as it was necessary. Otherwise, one would find himself unable to stand on a single dark rock. 'What is that? Is that what I think it is?' It would seem like the body of a man had hardened his body, as it had been broken in pieces, being regurgitated by the knotted tail which seemed to slowly float out there. 'That's not supposed to be there. Men, to the shuttles, now! Go, I need you to get as many of them to activate their communicator, as fast as possible. We may have an emergency at hand.' It had been far away that they appeared to be leading that beast, before it fell. At least they seemed to draw some distance between them, as it happened for their likes not to meet the strangers. Fiercely, it fought until its legs gave in. That's when the same kind of behaviors seemed to happen as it attempted to prevent its fall. Some of the inner-fat inside its own legs only acted up and down as it pushed onward to bent the tips of its hooves. Through some quick maneuver, it connected itself through the same jerkily stump from which it popped. Openly aware of what it had been, there's been something to it, which drew them to look away. Those slaves weren't meant to end up in that way, to moan in pain and act as if the pain they felt had been unbearable. 'Do we have to stay here and listen to this?' 'This doesn't feel right now, does it? Does it feel right to you, how about you? What of you? Do you think that what we're doing here is the right thing? Because I can't go through this. This is the fourth one I had to witness being killed in such a manner.' 'How could they be killed? Can't you see that they're meant to die this way? We're only watcher.' This cadet drew closer and as he grasped the tip of the man's collar, he only whined at the likes. 'No, we're responsible for this. You are as well, you're one of the repairmen who are responsible for that thick thing being set inside it. Can't you see that we're the ones killing them? We're the intruders, we are the scum, the trash, we're the ones exploiting them for what?’ ‘For those very bloody veins you know very well we came there for. Don’t act as if it doesn’t matter to you. We share this thirst for it and we’ll do it time after time if it means we’re getting more from them. Harvesting this liquid had been the greatest thing we stumbled upon. Play with yourself and don’t ask questions, that’s what they tell you. I shouldn’t have to deal with your stupidity now, that we’ve made so many deposits.’ ‘I’m sorry, cadet Bryng, but my family needs to eat. You know we all have to do this, right? Everyone here has to deal with the fact that we’re no good men. This is sick, but. At least I’m fully aware what I’m doing it for. ‘I say we could just kill it now.’ ‘And take the chance that it might backfire against us?’ ‘Enough of the back-talk already, Jonsie, that’s just enough. Everyone here will just stay put and do what you’re told.’ There was some nuisance coming on its way. Without being able to overlook what they were doing, every man around from looking at that dying creature and seemed to be apparently shaken by the fact that the man was out of his post. ‘Something happened?’ ‘Communicators, now.’ An echo reverberated with the very sound of some inclined hearing. On the tip of each communicator there had been some kind of obstruction which couldn’t have been taken for what it was. No amount of tries appeared to turn them on. ‘They’re malfunctioning, of course they are. We couldn’t even have an insignificant piece of equipment working, could we? Oh shut up. ‘He tried shouting. ‘We have to go back to the shuttle. An immediate emergency status has been declared. No one’s allowed to be here while it’s happening.’ ‘Can’t we use the sound forge rolling atop the wave then? It should work in the same manner if someone were to think with it.’ On top of them there was one of those devices they had brought with them. The way they worked was that, as long as one of those sound forges kept floating and drifting into space, there would be some kind of globe which seemingly imitated, somewhat correctly the means for sound to travel and bounce against its strangled walls. They could hear one another as if they were down there, somewhere lost on Earth. But as of now, it seemed rather dull to ask. ‘What would happen if someone were to work on it? You don’t suppose that would mean some complete isolation from the rest of the crew, do you?’ ‘That’s exactly what it could happen. Isn’t it a risk worth assuming?’ ‘It’s out of question, that’s some valuable equipment at stake, not to mention that, if something goes wrong and others end up.’ A stroke of the lip hadn’t been enough. Many of them had been waiting as they looked for a simple reason to come forth at the sound. What other reason could there be for this contamination of priorities? Jonsie was around when this man had come. He immediately turned towards the others, bearing the apprehension of the grave news he heard. There were still flickers in the slave’s eyes, as a piece of its body had been set to grow. Good call, thought one of the engineers present there. This one could’ve contaminated and released something far more dangerous than an infection. Many of the problems had spanned out of the fact that they were still trying to figure out what the best course of action would be. For what was worth, they settled on this. ‘We’ll draw in then and throw it back into the orbit, and wait for the other squads to be alarmed of it.’ ‘Wait, what about them? If we leave now, all that progress will have been for nothing.’ ‘We can’t have them both and you know it, either we sacrifice the men or we give this up.’ It had been decided by the likes of hazing. The men simply ignored the titillating inflicted pus which had recoiled at the slave’s blood went through the same damning process. ‘Where am I?’ A voice shouted from that dark spot in space, infringing upon it, there he was, drawn in like some remnant of the great within. It could not be called into action then, but there had been some weird familiarity which had been thrown at them. Their effort had been combined and redrawn towards small capacitors which had been drawn from their storage unit near the open wound where they had dug the blood torsion area. They had just enough charges to connect them to pulp of wires which could only throw themselves into some motion. It had been that connection, through which the charged entered the prototype drone, which would've served as a replacement unit for the servant in case the device in it had to be replaced. Through another modification of its own, the engineer on site had managed to open it just in time so they could each drag the large squared glowing charges which carried small reverberating reversing tin connectors which would force the unit to shoot the giant crane-like pointer in the opposite direction. If anything that would've been some kind of dangerous and peculiar kind of tinge, in the way they would've force themselves to activate the engine which had just enough force as it had been needed to reach the outer layer of space and wrap itself as some stable grinder against the forge. Slowly and surely, the forge had been in their close reach. An abruptness had come but it had been so slight that it had been ignored. Every man put a hand together and placed themselves on top of it, readying themselves to make it clear. They had unwrapped the thing while cadet Jonsie still dispersed his gaze towards that one slave there. 'Jonsie, come back, this may be the last time you'll hear us, at least until we're on that shuttle. You couldn't possibly consider spending your time with that thing?' 'Look, it's dying. I got the message, I know where I'm supposed to be. The other squads are still wide spread, so I should have just enough time until the shuttle leaves.' 'That's not the point Jonsie. Look, I don't know how much we're going to be here for, in case this emergency goes. Why not spend the rest of your time with us?' Jonsie felt some like they had departed from him. For some reason he couldn't explain, it was something they've said, that thing about doing what needed to be done, for their families, for their needs. Excuses. 'I simply want to be alone for some time. Just let me stand near it, please.' 'Let him, we'll have only a few minutes to record, afterwards, the device will be set on a loop while it centers on the area of the Moon.' They nodded but still seemed like they weren't going to choose anything else over the other thing. It couldn't have been thought off as being anything else than some way in which he had to cope with what he'd done. It wasn't safe for him to be there, near it either. But he was allowed. While they had been busy, he could only see how hard this slave struggled. It's been so long since he fell. One of its sides had been crushed by that device inside of it, which hadn't made it any easier than it was. Its moans hadn't ended. That reaction of the mixing of the oil from the machinery and the blood still couldn't have been explained, or why was it so deadly that it would. That it would kill that very Moon they were on. Come to think of it, they have never been told the reason for which they harvested the blood on mass, or why was it so important. And the unit leader was nowhere to be seen either. He'd have another explanation to be tender with once he'd join them on the shuttle. Jonsie looked only once in the back, seeing the others wave as to make their way. He heard the echo once the sound-forge rejoined its weird trajectory. Oh, he'd have quite something to say in his field rapport. Quite a lot indeed. Everyone followed their lead and seemed to converge back to where the shuttle was. It felt lonely there, emptier than usual, not on the Moon itself but in space. For some time, it felt like nothing had kept them together any longer. They had started to drift away from one another, to the very point where one might consider the fact that they might never see each other again. More unnerving had been the fact that there wasn't any way of knowing which one had been alive yet. It couldn't be conceived at all. Only one of them had been as deceitful as to know which other would be infected or infested and never would be touched by no slave and no other slaving creature which may attempt to strike at him. Now, as the voice module from the sound-forge went on, men had become alarmed and in a desperate call they heard the message and the fall. 'The state has declared an emergency through the intercom, all available units are to abandon their posts and make their way to the nearest shuttle while the evacuation process begins. Know this, that if neither of you is to be dispatched immediately, by the third entrance of the front rows, in the general direction of station Wallda, it may be taken into consideration that your abandonment would be seen as a must rather than a need or anything of the kind.' One would turn a blind eye if one or two men were to be lost out there, but not too many. It couldn't be trusted otherwise that they may do something of their own. It was in the wake of the planetary station which had drawn to the area where the meeting was supposed to happen that they had received a signal to the shuttle. Everything went rather well, with the exception of a few crewmen who were nowhere to be seen. Their very absence had been accounted as it seemed like a space-storm would come on its way. There, the man looked down, as the squads had been dismantled, and as every man looked ashamed, Jonsie could only look behind. He himself had chosen to turn a blind eye as their shuttle raised itself from the landing area on the Moon. On its surface, he looked at the various things which had been abandoned, such as the sound forge, the slaves, and the deathless eyes which had been pushed and thrown aside. In a moment like that he could only think and swear that he had, that one slave moaning while it buried itself into the Moon's girth.

Needle

Lord of broken needles, in a heap of forming throngs. There he came, much defying, curator of many long decisive stings. He looked inside some well torn shirt, taken from one of the many users which lay below. Under him, it looked like the pool had started growing tiny toes, gained from the infection cured or pulled from the infected people they'd been lodged in. A living being came out. It had the appeal of the pool and about twenty fingers of its own. Needles lay stuck in its grown angle-lit formations on each side. Light had come from the bulbs which ended, which in turn left the shadow of its needles on the wall. More than it had been degenerate, it had looked like some kind of in-drawn motion couldn't be seen any longer. Its body did look like a fat cucumber in that light, though it had been known that the bumps it bore on its every side were nothing more than the sharp points of the needles which were attempting to get out. Unquestionably said, there was one defect he had. Though they may have been under his control, they may have pushed themselves towards some disobedience. Immediately, at the first chance they had, many of them plunged deeper through the mass from which it spawned. Even that far away from it, inside the lord there remained that amalgamation of the pool which had been mixed with its own being, the insides of which could only purge them by dripping away. Slowly, the lord would lose ounces of himself until there'd be nothing coming out of it. In that pool, not only had a kin of nasty crows nests began appearing, but they would also bear their children as well.

Neumorr

Far thee, never to see, for In this veritable day of October, from whence it lay, as if for your sight only, the foundation which belongs to one of the greatest buildings that had ever been, screamed, likely for its falling metal coils, bricks of tons, as it stood. In such magnificence, its glory, taste and much distaste as well as it had lain and looked as if it was out of place. Much of it had been, they said, never to be looked at again. Newspapers roared, for the likes of men had never been bred for such a likeness, as of old. 'Look at it, the grandest distaste this world has ever seen. Can they not see how it managed to destroy everything around it? This couldn't be clearer than it is now, if you were to take a simple look at it, even for a moment, you'd see how two thirds of the buildings around it had already gone missing. They're barely standing like two lost flocks.' Though they seemed less interested, the men and women from around the Bridge area around town seemed to have ignored the fact that those buildings had to be evacuated. Somehow, this building had become wider by some means, but it hadn't exactly destroyed the buildings around it. No, that would've been much madder than some hatter, whose gone fatter at a tatter. In other ways, it looked like it had managed to grow inside this monolith of a building, this construction which had been set forth, erect in some way which may not be dismissed. No man could look at it and be spared of its malignant tapestry and stolid walls. It seemed to some that the sculptures which had been carved into the walls seemed rather, far too life-like, for their own tastes need be. 'Madame, if you would please. Could you tell me who the master carver is? The stone mason? The artist, the sculptor who had erected these statues? I can't seem to be able to find out at all. Would he just happen to be some lost and forgotten foreigner of some kind?' 'Oh, but my good company, I couldn't tell you a thing. You see, these things, these people just appeared. Out of nowhere, of no sight to be held.' 'Simply in such a manner, as this? Could it not be explained by other means? Maybe someone who brought them from some lost and abandoned museum in order to plaster them on the walls? Could that be the way they got here?' 'I couldn't tell you, see, I am just a mere guest, but they do seem quaint, I will admit. And the circumstance surrounding their sudden sight, oh I couldn't bother myself no less.' And there had been something to it, to say that, at least, as much of an understatement as it had been. There were the likes which only dragged around and pushed inward. Sometimes the statues seemed to change positions, to walk around sideways, still adjacent to the walls. Some of them who looked straight ahead now lay sideways, caught into some stream which couldn't be explained at all. 'Look at them, that statue over there. That one specifically, at which I'm pointing towards, it moved. Don't tell me otherwise, as I seem to know better. And tell me even less of what I know, as you can't fool me. But I swear, I saw it move, please believe me when I tell you this. I saw it move with my very own eyes.' And on the other side, it seemed that half-bodies lay caught between the two sides, the two worlds, that of the living and that which laid inside the half-wall. The first alarming blow came when all of the sudden, the more it pushed forward, of backward, depending on which direction one may stare at, it seemed to be directly encased. Now half-bodies appearing, but only their tops appeared to attempt some kind of movement. Many of the ones which had been spread in halves appeared to bear only the same expressions on their faces. It wasn't likely that they would be pleased by this sudden turn of events. No, not even likely. It wouldn't happen to be less likely of awe that they shared the same kind of facial tension. It opened and opened and opened until pop. That had been quite a show, as now, the guests had been mesmerized by the likes which were. If it were done accordingly, it could only be glanced off, the peril. Those mad men, those who had joy of their faces suddenly turned to face the consequence of their actions. It couldn't be denied, the cause and effect which had been felt. So much for the splatter of the kind that it could be dreadful in ways which couldn't have been denied. Why was it that they all felt so well in their sudden twist and turn of events? It could be incomprehensible, at the very least. 'That man is outspoken for! Don't listen to him, he'll only force himself against you, he'll draw you in that hole from which you may never return! They will force you to draw closer to him and then, you will end up just like them. I've seen it, I swear, I've seen it all over. No one will dare lay a hand on you as well as you seem to be.

They're not trying to be fancy, this spectacle must end. Can't you see how vulgar and violent they're starting to become.' 'Why are you paying attention to that man? Go forth, throw yourself like them. Can't you see the inhumanities which are displayed? Without a doubt, this is nothing more than some scheme which may not be spoken of. Worry not, worry less, I shall confess to you that there's nothing to be seen here, these things are merely for show.' 'How do you know that? You've barely just arrived. How could you possibly know of such a thing? Who do you think you are?' 'I've seen with my very own eyes, that's how. I was there on the other side of the building and I've seen the machination. 'What have you seen then?' 'Yes, tell us, oh good man, tell us immediately what you may have seen there. We have to know, me and my wife fancy it as an interesting thing. We want it so madly that we can't help ourselves.' It was an interest which not only could it be discussed but it had been wagered as something of a less, well, less than human. They weren't that any longer. It was obvious, way too obvious that they had become something else than that. 'And it just so happened for one of them to draw even closer to what it had become. The bodies twisted, made as if to stop. It was so quick, to their eyes that even they froze and spoke no longer. Under direct observation they have looked and saw just how madly it had pushed behind, with one motion which had spread through every side, everything had been encompassed. Just another piece of the adjacent halls had been converted as they had grown and spread through every kind of sight there had been. And in that mad and quickened conversion, the objects had refused to change. No, something happened, for this change had refused to change its texture. All too obvious, as it had become, there was a clarity, which couldn't have gone any sooner than it had done. Whatever it was which encompassed it had the colour of some dark fluorescent green, tainted by a transparency which had revealed such shades of dark and of white at the very core which seemed to flush between the bodies, through the floor and the ceiling until it walked no more. Such scrutiny as it was held no longer helped itself but had revealed the sight. Such was it that the very might which had been displayed no longer seemed to matter. As the guests were no longer pleased by the show, but they had become frightened. So and so, as it had come to be, there was despair which couldn't have been accounted for. No man walked straight from there, and women wept and they fled. Those things, those human beings were now mobile. Though they couldn't move freely from their posts, from their behinds, suddenly there appeared some kind of long pushed forward trains which had given them just the distance which they were in such a desperate need. 'Look, the railway, those lines, the very coal engines from which that solid gust of smoke seems to come. I swear, I knew something had been wrong, I knew it, since the very moment it just happened to come. No, it can't be that we would be forced to flee now, we were invited.' 'Have you been forced to be foul? Look at it for a damn second, can't you see that it isn't safe to head outside any longer?' As if heard, the crowd stopped. This train cognition seemed to be slowly moving, ever so magnificent that there would be nothing which may be brought to sight. As clear as it might be, there were circumstances which may not be explained by any other means. 'We're trapped here, and for as long as we stay stuck in here, the world may be contaminated by that foul string of suffering.' 'Here it comes, flee now, flee or die!' In some contortion made off the mysterious way it had suddenly come into being, the creature, or creatures as they fancied their own kind pulled one another deeper in the seat. They twisted and contorted themselves with the sole desire or pushing inwardly to that spot. Those hands managed to reach for the center, through which it could only be held accountable in itself that somehow it had managed to set itself free from this bond, at least momentarily. It needed no longer be caught off guard or limited by the fact that it had been forced to step out of the wall. That much had been ever clear in terms of pushing forth. No amount of uncertainty remained, not might it be held no longer, as it had been somewhat free. 'Make haste, don't let it get across the room. You know what might happen afterwards, be weary of it, I say, be weary!' And to no other account than their own, suddenly it had come forth and broke through the opposite wall. Some of the guests had been caught in the middle, while others stared. By no means could they be alarmed by the fact, nor could they seek anything other than companionship for themselves from that point onward. The reason being that they were, after all, the last remaining human beings there. 'My dear, look, look at the world outside.' The worst of fears had been somewhat made ever so clear and certain and aware as to make it so, so, way so near their own deceitful approach. No longer could they stand what was going on and soon enough they would have to flee again. But what they saw out there, before making it to the stairs had been the very fact that there was nothing out there, nothing, any longer, which may have been of interest for the likes of man. It was all too obvious that mankind had suffered this ill blow, through which everything had come to be, part of it, at least. Could it even be called in part? That was the certainty which may not be told off either. And the crowd, what had remained off looked off in the distance and waved, as to some distant past which now lay covered in that crystalline dark from which sprouted that whiteness and that bleak from which encompassed all. Through the halls above, they had made it so everyone knew. 'No one is to lay down there, understand it? No one is allowed below the waist of the building. This had been a failure I say, a failure indeed!' 'Speak louder, I can't seem to hear you, where's all this noise coming from?' Not to peak out of his canvas filled-room, there seemed to be some curtain there, popping out, pushing forward, laying forth in some twist and turn which never seemed to bother anyone. It could be called into action as it begged for the reaction that followed. He'd been punched, straight across the face, latter in the face with some kind of bust through both sides. It was clear that this man had gone from acting like a saint to a savage. 'Now, will you finally listen? I can't seem to shake off the thought that I'm the only one here with half a mind working. I can't even expect thing kind of repugnancy to be filled any longer. Just go ahead and listen to what I've got to say. There's no one in this room, or at this floor or in the building who's going to survive this unless we go ahead and work together. Come on already, we can't be all saviors or even pretend there's a chance.' 'Poor choice of words you skin flab.' The fellow next to him had been ready to strike him as well but chose to push him instead. And he had done well to drag him out of the general direction, as it's been made so clear now, the fact that neither one would take the news too well. Behind the two of them, amongst the curtain, the room had been locked. It didn't take long for everyone out there to overreact, grabbing, pushing, stalling and trying to scatter around anywhere they might be able to leap towards. In their chambers windows opened, screams were heard as well. The image of their world having been twisted into that had been dreadful, as some case experiment, or some test on their minds. And it turned out, as intelligent and logical being as they appeared to be, they all seemed to have taken this a bit too harsh. Ants standing, trying to run from one corner to the other in their minds but held physically by the realization that there was nowhere to run. They haven't been the worst ones, as those ones would just happen to be the kind which could only suffer getting through the wreckage their world had become with the help of brute force. Many fists rested against counters, broken walls, fading bloody marks pushing from end to end at a corner. No forth, had it been that they could only make it so they wanted more, something to it, something no man could have taken for himself from there. Logical, they were no longer, as the theft began, their mad behavior having been forced into what they could freely see for themselves. Against one, against the other, one stroke, another fell. But not in that room, where the artist was placed in some unconscious wave, some dormant gaze having been set forth. What must I do now? I'm locked with the two of them. 'What's that in your mind? Do you see that thing? Can you even realize what's happening?' 'I have been the first, now what are you implying? I was the one who warned the others.' 'No, not that you imbecile. I'm talking about the fact that the world is in such a mad shape and the fact that you're not helping it by any means. You've startled everyone, as if they needed to see that.' Oh, what he had looked upon, the great city with its tall buildings, grand cards, and many pastels, colored and floored with the likes which may flatter even an artist, now lay in its grasp. That thing which had either been alive, or not, seemed to have just spread and instead of forcing them into any kind of disturbing behaviors, everything seemed to flatten. 'Look at it, at any rate, our world will become shapeless, and there's no stopping to it.' 'Listen, fellow, doesn't that mean this might be a great turn of events? It could only make it so we have a chance at life, we have a chance to go out there and.' His eyes had been so wide. He wasn't even paying attention to it. He hadn't been thinking of even trying to hint at the fact that there would be nothing out there, nothing of the sort, no animals, no humans, and no wildlife. Their visions blurred, as they had realized, they would have no air either, on the long run. And outside, what stood too many, as the many lights seemed to be in some kind of glory of awe, as many lights suddenly turned on, they have seemed to have thoroughly revealed themselves as the guests and escapees who had stood, locked or unlocked in their rooms, chatting and watching as their world continued collapsing. What had there been to watch, who may sink ever so deep as to look at it. Creatures which were no longer human but rode in many trains around town, crashing through buildings made out of their own material and their own bodies as well. Soon the buildings would crush and shape themselves like heads, revealing the agony they felt. Much more, hands grasped only to reveal the mockery that would be their end, as they grasped around their mouths and nostrils, only to reveal the way through which they would be dead. And in the end they worried not for themselves and rather seemed to bother themselves no longer as they waited for night to be over.

Through a large field, the mark of the body had been placed, widespread and disinterested in itself. The mark had been alive and moved to the side of the field, spreading like some walking plague formed out of cut-in-part rats. It started ever since the day of the third harvest that the biggest mass of rats would be drawn towards the fields. Like a plague of dying morbid blanket it drew itself farther on the field until the body came and embed itself on it. Many of them had been mentally-starved in ways on indescribable terror, from which many of their minds had not only pushed and threw out but. The corpse only appeared to be caught in some dreadful spin on the other side of the plane on which he landed on. There, he had managed to gain control over as many degenerate children which had been born in its strange image as it could possibly take care off. He would be oblivious to their kind, especially since they resembled him far too much than he would expect. In such a conversion of thoughts, the only thing which had kept it alive was the fact that there was some dreadful signal being shot from inside the mark. Out there, somewhere, it had attempted to seek its master, the body, the deterrent of woe, theater of many plays in which the rats played answered the call and held itself out there, standing like some pillar of a giant raised uniform statue. Of its body, there was the very fact that it had no limbs and it couldn't walk, not crawl. It would only dabble in the likes of being shut off from society. As this body had been looked down by the other bodies that had grown their limbs inside their spines and had been able to release them as some constructs of flying and malignant retribution. It couldn't have been thanked for, in the likes of many of the grown and benign creatures that had looked upon them in disgust. Their bodies spread from behind, those limbs had pushed like legs bred out of kindness for morbidity. And it turned out that their insides had released a big embodiment of guts which shot from their backs, pushing through, spreading as they'd eat pieces of their own limbs. As tiny as their heads had been, they had been heavy, their teeth had been far too many and too sprawled and only came to show that their insides had been filled with them. It had been a mad way to sharpen their own bodies so they might be able to keep that permanent state of floating in the air. Without it, there'd be dread and fear. No amount of insecurity would lay or be the same for each and every single one of them knew that they hadn't been bodies but entries, living portals to the other world. And in the otherworld, where objects floated akin to some embodiment of the cosmos, there hadn't laid any other object, no full body, but the many heads and the sides of the rats which had been taken from them. They lapsed in the fact that these bodies hadn't been real. Many if not all had either been poor imitations, to which their own portals lead to nowhere, or had served as nothing but traps. Unfurled and unturned from their insides, the bodies looked like walking pairs of spiked planes. They could spread themselves and pin down the living with their malignant spreading vine-like tentacles. But deep inside each had been an olfactory sense which only had to activate to force them into such a stance that they would prolongely be set to suffer. Inside there lay such a kind of deep pain which couldn't be escaped from without the proper way to die. They would evaporate and their many teeth would end up somewhat tried at times. Every single they would slowly drift from the disintegrating bodies, ending up in the fields. Though they may have been empty, the filed would be filled with towering teeth, spiked to the touch of no man who may dare come to live his life there. As one such sight could not only defy expectations but bury themselves in the body of the ground. To such a mount, from which the sight of the progenitor of a spiked retreat, the men had looked at what appeared to be the remains of a great invasion. Most of their world had been sabotaged to the point where the many sharp points had been stuck through the bodies of those rates, being delivered into the bodies of the rats. In their home dimension those half-rat bodies began barging into a magnificent rat-king, though its mind had been anything but well functional by any means. Nothing would be right by any means, nothing which would wager the return of such a strange confinement and the lost breed which never waged any war against their kind. Someone had stolen their flavor. They attempted to taste one another but spat pieces of fur and of themselves out there. Since those pieces weren't living, they had been turned upon themselves, pushing and throwing each other as far as possible, without need of apprehension from what had been going out. In some way and through the danger of the malignant, there was some kin which would be left alone. Dread could never be felt by the one living head which had refrain itself from joining the rat entity. Out there, swimming in the fur which had been spread just about everywhere, there had been some malignant woe which had been given birth. The many heads and the rats had suddenly drawn inward, creating the entity of supreme filth. And it stood there, with one tiny rat head, against the rat king. While the outside world had been under threat, this one would stand against its so-called superior in an attempt to defile it, while the wave of entry had arrived. A few pointers came out from behind the floating rats. For the time being they could only stand, unable to move forward and waiting. It couldn't be conceived with otherwise, whatever it would be, no mind could be held accountable to no end. It made each of the rat heads become paranoid. The space in the realm hadn't been infinite or widespread to unfathomable reaches after all. One couldn't possibly hope to ascent and get through as far as possible even if he wanted to. It is for that reason that fear came afterwards, pushing inwardly, to the point where mobility had faded to some unconsciousness of the mind. The many teeth found themselves being dragged inside by the real body which had been pulled to where the field of spikes had lain. What actually had been conveyed in the matter was the fact that, in that one decrepit manner of disturbance of the bile, the many rat bodies had crept behind the real body, trapping it before proceeding to drag it away. Within their likes, they had senses the scent of their own heads, not through anything else but their pulsating bloody veins which had still been connected through. Their worldly feelings had been spared nothing less of the circumstance ahead. In such a short duration of time, they had managed to draw within their allegiance the mark. And that mark had given them the strength to carry the malignance as to marry themselves to the body. Like a covering licking shadow the mark stood over the bodies, preserving not only their strength but their strange defiling gazes. Such a filthy and malignant pause had come until he had been about the entrance to the field. Those rats knew there'd be no way to be reunited with their heads, as they had been forced to feel the presence of the entity inside their own bodies. And it was filthy and malignant, for each of them felt used as if by some nasty fragrance of some kind had exposed their breed and minds. In some kind of mad dexterity, they had cut one another in spite of what had happened, pushing in the field, dragging the portal as the body had been forced open. The body held no control over its own actions, as he had been restrained by the mark and by the rats. Writhing in agony, seen by them as last, the entire dimension had been ripped apart, seeing the land in some kind of field of battle where only the rat deity of filth remained. It soothed itself as it watched everyone else wreath in their death coils. The many teeth stood jointed and covered in dark veils sprouted by the mark. Not even it had survived this destruction, as it appeared to breed itself into cover again. So desperately had it turned inside that it attempted to push and creep and shoot as far as it could. To no avail had it happened, as they turned as they'd start sinking in the bowls of their dying cosmos. But this world had been young. The humans would soon come and they would look upon their deity and crown it as their woe would come to an end.

That man

Two times for each chance. It had been right there, ready to be plunged upon. A row made out heavy brass-wielded tied hooks formed the path ahead. Someone with half-a-mind afflicted by some mild vertigo had passed it before him. But what was way too distracting had been that person who lay at the end of the row. It lead to a half-closed gate where that lord of sickness waited. On his shoulders, like some wandering stoppers, two half-breeds were placed. Luckily for them, he had been long-bones, shoulder-wide, filled with something which had been growing now. It was by both of their crookless, tooth-picked mouths that small sealed mutton-chop formed, green liquid filled grubs came out. They were either being spat, which could be look from inside, the shoulders of the man. As it seemed like they were connected with his insides. Likely, the madman had two giant stomachs on each side, in the form of his arms. They would be unlikely to be checked by anyone else. For the man on the other side of the lines row, it only looked like those two half-breeds had only been giving live-births, when the reality had been much more lacking in terms of what was going on. No man, of any renown would ever pay enough attention to give to that highly short-armed tainted cruel thing in front of him. He only waited, amused by the fact that there could only be a single thing distracting him from it. No longer would be paying his respects to what was going on down there. For this had been a weak, frail and poor beggar who tried to escape the likes of the on-going war. 'Please help me, I need to cross and I don't know if I can do it safely. Anything, I swear, I'll serve you, and I'll give my life to you, anything, but don't let me die. I stole something on the way. Look, I'm filthy, I'm not right, I won't judge you for what you are. Look, see, see?' From under his woolen robe, tattered with some scummy earth, he looked like he had been dragged and whipped and much more beaten than he had eaten in a lifetime. But under that helmet and beyond it he still couldn't see to whom he had been addressing. It could've been anyone. As a matter of fact, if he hadn't known any better, he could've thought this as being one of his captors' attempts to make a mockery of him while he tried his best to escape. It was obvious that the way behind had been barred. Going back down there was outrageous.

The dark had spread quickly in the night, but it wasn't the lack of light or the shade but the remnants of the fire coming from the fire arrows which had been laid on tracks, forlorn like some kind of spree and nets, fire bets between demon-like mindless creatures who taunted one another while fighting the likes of kind men. And many men had died there, either fleeing or in the fight. Many less than they would've liked to admit at that. Not kindness, as no man could lay such a claim, but it was the need to show some empathy and fight for long enough for their wives and children to escape. Those cowardly creatures with their naked breasts, the likes of which would've been stripped down and thrown across the halls. The walls, indeed were to crumble and as he seemed to be there, watching for himself, he looked for a way in and one out. There was none. Such a fall would mean that, even if he had survived, he could die either from slow injury of mockery as everyone leaped after him. Now, as the last of those grubs had settled, the half-breeds closed their mouths. It looked like they weren't scaled but smooth, their bones had been picked clean, their mouths went in both directions, and eyeless gazes seemed to come out of the fact that inside their pupils, actual holes laid. Whoever had done this act had blinded them for as long as they would be alive. Despite being spread across the flat surface which had been overlaid on his shoulders, he couldn't help it. Not at all, he couldn't be bothered by the mere fact that they were staring at him. No less than he would care to admit, he made a single step and outstretched one of his hands. This knight dressed in a governed armor, by its dark twisted tinges and many locked, tiny-screwed chains which seemed to drag from his behind in some device which kept all of his limbs from falling apart now came to torture the half-breeds. By the looks, or so he seemed to look at it, those shoulder joints weren't meant to stretch or bend that way. It didn't look natural, how they eight legs were set in strange directions, over the bottom of their bodies. And, below, their inner sides seemed to bear some stretched magnitude of many flaps which only gave the impression that their bore large sacks that had been forced inside its arms. Madly, those eyes started twisting, rounded, and kept rolling. No more would they fold themselves over the fact that it had been in pain. One would have to govern his own strength over the fact that there had been some trap of the intestines there. The insecticide had come into effect. On both sides as the grubs came into their respectable positions they popped, releasing splatters of their acidic leaping bile. Those who fell victim had been turned inside and out, being thereafter pulled into the bile, and unto the other side in some twisted reflection where they would had looked like it had been made out of the same acidic substance. Those caught in it seemed to be walking without their muscle mass or bones or even memories at that. No longer could it be thought as a way of watching or of knowing, they only existed there, suffering constantly over the fact that they had been forced to suffer for as long as they would burn from inside. And the beggar, named Cabargio, seemed to stand at the threshold of falling. He looked below and could think of nothing but what might happen if he were to fall down there. Just what might go wrong if he were to go that way? Perhaps that substance would be soft. He could barely see it now that the smoke was raising itself up. He would have to take his chances with him after all. And if he took a miss-step? He'd earn his place down there, on that spot, never to be dumb-founded again. If only I could trust him, he thought to himself. Then I could cross that tight gap and get over there. Down there, broken swords, armor pieces, metal melting by the distant blacksmith gorge. 'I beg of you that it may not have crossed your mind to drop me in that pit there, our hold had become mousing but some wreckage left by the destruction brought by your kin alone. Don't mind that I walk slowly, but hold your half breeds still while I cross.'It moved underneath him and before he could take it on himself to get over, he brought himself closer to some sense. At least his legs felt something hard, soft at times but hard enough for him to step. There, in his grasp, their hands united and as they had, he was drawn in closer to the point where he'd touch and feel no less of the exposure to the cold metal which came into contact with his hand.

Paint

In their wake, it had been thoroughly acknowledged that no being would have a normal life. Theirs would be an unspeakable agony, forced to keep churning until there'd be nothing left but the unspeakable burden of propagation in their lives, until none would suffer any rationality, unlike. There was one failed artist who had walked the streets. The city where he dwelled at one of the feet of the thorough fare a few years ago, during his youth, he could vaguely remember the fact that there used to be some arches in store. Somewhere in town they had taken them home. He had painted figures and had stored them all in a decrepit old archive that he never dared to visit on his own. Sometimes they were called the barracks, but only he could mutter their name. 'Clystia, Clysiac, where have you gone?' And the door would open, as if charmed by him. Though he dared not stare at what he'd made. A fashioned ringer in a sculpted mouth, something which was his and looked upon by his adoring fans. 'Will you please start sculpting already? Can't you see you'd make a great sculptor if you tried? Pah, they're all meaningless, and dumb. If only they knew that what I made behind those doors, they'd look upon me with much more adoration.' But that feeling of guilt which followed almost made him stink at that. He knew that behind those shutter, everything he made was trash. Only the most disturbing rubbish he had claimed to store. But in reality, he faded, oh so obscure over the fact that he realized, with sudden grace that he had failed. Every time turned to gin, to opium and other substances that grinded his mind. Unable to help it any more, as they had started pushing forth that anachromatic vigor that made him want to start again only to stop. If a single stroke of oil had landed, he would be met and lay blinded over by every single one of his mistake. 'This doesn't look like a face or like a body. Ugly, ugly, they're all ugly. Why am I unable to create anything even remotely close to beauty?' After watching and realizing that there wasn't anything which were to make him happy, if only he could land a stroke by mistake, a skin tone or a blush, an eye, anything which would bring any kind of anatomical delight. But it was hopeless, his hands were pitiful and benign. Despite his studies, and his moronic desire to get into architecture and through perspective, he had failed. 'I cannot see how this would line. My hands are shaking, I cannot even draw it kindly, to a straighter edge.' He looked at it as if it would try, even the architecture seemed to mind not a single rule, as they began lining through each other, some bent, others placed too high on a piece of ground which shouldn't even have minded the roads. And they curved in the most atrocious manner. How many nights have I spent ripping it all to shreds? He wondered, only to realize that he was losing his years, most of them were already gone. It was a dream, a pitiful thing which had only lasted for as much as he could help himself. And one day, out of the ground, he took a piece of clay, or marble or a cast of bronze and he had made himself a lock, to put them all into a place. It was his rage which drove him there. For a lack of any kindness, to which he may not even be able to contest a way to resolve his sudden issue of derangements, be them told or not, he found himself at the cross, standing and praying like a man who had suffered a loss. 'Why can't I create?' He wondered, sinking by the table, unable to look any of the repairmen who passed him in the eyes.

Avoidance like this could only get past his head, an order which would only make him wish he would be gone sooner. To remember all those stroke and the lack of joy, for he had reached his prime once, ten years ago. Despite his attempts, he had never got back to that point when he had created something which was near, that of which he feared most. In his elder days, he looked back with a lack of heart. Past the door, where he had locked them, underneath the pile of failed paintings there was the image of dread. He had gotten there by mistake, a mistake which might haunt him for the rest of his days. An image of the most obscure creatures, almost somnambulistic, mechanical, abstract or lost to him, even if that was possible after all. They were connected, like two heads standing near a canyon, bearing themselves as another two headed being, with a longer body, but smaller, ate from both of them. Their base of operation lay behind it, like a giant machine, which bore tucks and iron claps connected to what seemed to be circuit. As the valley peered into them, he had come to see and to know that it was not by his hands that image was created, but by it, that schizophrenic fiend which had possessed him and forced upon him the image of morbidity. It made him want to see more, to experience and to see the grave. Hallbartt walked and found himself digging graves during the night. He wanted to see what it would feel like, being near one of them, standing in the same grave, almost tied or glued, resting near one of his own. Like a shattering blow to his ribs, it gave him the midst of laughing and of glancing, realizing he was looked at by one raven which brought him companionship. 'Have you come to bring me news perhaps? Are you a bad omen, or sorrowful at all?' No amount of whistling could do. Not a single dare, unfair to him, he would dare come back to the living, standing prolated on the grave-bed, with a dame of his choosing, still too close to together for her to feel any amount of warmth inside of him. 'May you at least bring me some sort of quiet? I cannot help but listen to your voice and realize that I can hear you scream there.'

We've been separated, haven't we? Ever since I decided it was rightfully fair for me to step in, you've become cold and distant. Now you stopped again, you wouldn't even tell me of that.' What I saw inside that painting, even now. The colors which were into light were dark, like an extraction from the deep sea, where they swam and no one else had been like it. I miss that feeling, of being so thorough, at to be done with the day and be tired of it for as long as I can. 'There's still force in this arms, you realize that, don't you?' But she hadn't any intention of showing it to him. For that he brought a piece of wood, a few colors of the oil, to which he started painting her face before the could grow warm again. What have I done to her face? Hallbart left her with a crying gaze, from which he almost got up awakened during the night. It's only been a few hours since he had performed that unforgivable act of gravedigger which molested his dreams, and took him over from his bed. He had to see the painting again. With the key taken from the counter, after rushing in, no laughter had come from inside. The window had been open and it seemed like his old friend, the raven had been there, witnessed by him. 'Have you come to steal my paintings? Not that I would complain, but I wish you'd stay away from my most valuable one, that one. I cannot help it. I don't like looking at the others; I took no joy into making them. They were done by force, nothing more, these hands had been wrought to a distasteful end. But I can see them working again. If only I could be proven wrong about what I've done.' Slowly he unwrapped the newspaper folds in which it rested, only to see that it wasn't the creature there, but the lady he had taken from her grave, she was being eaten by those vile creatures, with no interest in preserving what she was. And he had confirmed it again, by looking at the beauty marks and at the colored face he had given her at that. In that moment, when he ought to die of a stroke, the man was met by a voice from the high above. 'Sink, sink, deeper if you want to get her back.' And through the room, once the windows shocked by forced, it had almost curved itself to become the home for the submarine he had been on. 'What's the meaning of this?' He went out the door and looked at no apartment but a small side of the many roomed hallbeam he was in. By the right and by the left, he was greeted by the rest. 'Go back in the cabin, we're going to have to shock you if you resist.' 'But I've done nothing wrong, look, I don't know what it is you want.' 'Stray away and we shall shock you.' To which he pointed at his knees, he couldn't feel them any less than he had wanted. 'I cannot force them to retreat.' 'Much deeper than that, you need to be at the bulk of it, to reach her.' Through the husk, he seemed trapped, almost drawn through the layers which protected the innards from the deep pressure which stroke at it. He had not planned on looking back, nor had he doubted their intention for as long as they knew what they were doing. Frightened of his failure to submit, he started jerking so he could at least obtain the color he needed to paint inside the walls. 'A crimson hue for the many wretched worms, may they eat me whole if they want to. I do not care any longer, I think I may just feel as if I'm home here.' Yet he wanted to see if the painting he had made was real, no treachery, no disease, no distaste only that, he feared least he knew. His heart, twas' thrice the size of a beating pouch, and he couldn't even dare himself to be there any longer. What came out of him was at least one deeper sorrow, another cut followed. He would think himself the braver, if the hanging would've come. But they had to speak again, convincingly, as they would force him to draw back. 'Sink deeper if you want to live, for if you can't, we'll make to drink your own blood and gush with it.' He followed through, unable to face what he had become down there, a being which could only breathe, only through the likes of his pigments and the ink. Air vibrating got through him through the blood, and the more he lost, the easier he would get a way to take it back. Soon enough he had been given a pass, a mass of the least desirable, the malign and the prime blood anchor which dragged him down. He would meet her if only he tried, to sink deeper rather than be alive, in a pace he hated the most. Within his throttling neck, bile entered him, no longer allowing him to breathe directly, out of the uttermost fear that he might reek or try getting in through the various spasms that inherited his oxygen starved mind. Before he could reach her he had fallen too low. Being landed on two ends, he started from both sides, only to see himself, staring at a mirror while being eaten by the old lady he had looked so long for.

Strange change

One of the first contacts had progressed just as it was planned. By the noon of the seventeen hour of September eight-five, caught by one of the camera in the experimental room eighty-two, lay the blue dreamer. He would be called that only because its most defining feature was the fact that it could slightly resemble the likeness of a message in a bottle and its surrounding areas as soon as it was thrown overboard. Lighten, in its strange and peculiar drone-like watching glances, was the inserting machine. That's the only way we could call it, without risking to be fired out of the inconsistent way in which we treated it. This mad being appeared to lurk in places we couldn't even admit to have seen it as a human. That's what the top of its body betrayed, but everything else didn't let it get through. No, unlike its predecessor, this strange comer had been missing for far too long. 'It's time that we look at the recordings again. "Eight hours, that's for how long we've been trying to get through it, eight damn hours. How can you even suppose we could explain this to the higher ups? So many hours wasted for what?" "For this thing.' In its strange engulfance, the solid suit appeared to encompass a body which would've been attributed to a gorilla than that of a man, both in strength or the fact that it was as wide as one could measure it. 'How strange, it appears to have set a contact with that blue-cliacl.' 'So that's what we're supposed to call it now? A blue one, as opposed to the normal CliacIs?' 'Indeed, this no time for mockery sir, I must insist on the fact that we use the proper name and nothing else.

Otherwise, we won't be able to set contact again with their kind.' The first set of contacts, prior to these ones couldn't even be called that way. In all honesty, it had been a mild thing, a ringer, a scare, they appeared out of nowhere. As much as they could be brought to the attention on the animal physiognomy, these were stranger to the likes, to even fashion a kind of peculiar rivalry to what ought to be an accepted branch of biology. It looked like the head had been too spread to belong to a man, and neither of the dissections revealed a skull being held inside. No, they had some jerky thing, which helped preserve the tools of worship. The orange key and scepter had been taken from them. It was not the place and time to be judged for it, but one could swear, by no hare's that these things would walk again. Or gloat at the fact that their many feet had been left out before they began levitating. Nor was it likely that their bodies could be torn apart. To say that they were stringed or that they were winged would be a mistake. Simply, they were able to adapt to whatever environment they could simply produce around them. And that kind of production had only served to haunt them, after seeing the illusion of the air. 'That's where the color came from, that dreadful thing tricked the molecules into being softer and wetter.' 'Quite the observation there, I see. You ought to become a scientist with that mind and with those keen eyes.' 'Please, I'm only trying to preserve myself to the betters. I cannot help it if I can't cut a few of my fingers off each time you open your mouth.' 'Rude, now let's watch it again.' Alexandris had been the medic. She wasn't as disposable as she wanted to appear. As a matter of fact, out of fear that she might miss it, she had to replay it in her mind again. The moment in which their agent interacted with the creature. Some of the present crowd, for the circumstances which be around, appeared to have caught on something of the fright needed to pay enough attention to the details around him. Key logs, left notes, the details regarding the circumstances in which he found himself unable to cut them off. It was to be distasteful, for one moment in which they had been lead to the drawing of the crook. Whichever he was, the engineer Corco, or one of the recruits, Lern, it hadn't mattered at all. This man had been changed by forced, into a wild machine, or that was the only idea they could think off. An alternative no one wanted to suggest, though that may be on their minds being the fact that inside of those sixteen metal cases, there hid something which resembled of tower of sunken tender remains resulting after the entry of a fully-grown adult into the chopping-wagons. Even as a mere accident, to think that such a wild defect would somehow survive the entire process and be reanimated by some unworldly means was deceitful, dreadful, incomprehensible, it served as no means of trying to look into it further. How would he have ordained the use of a connecting tube then? How had he acquired it? Without that question answered, there was only the ever-present idea that this thing was intelligent enough to do a lot of harm. As much as it did, they started to compromise each other in this desire to destroy. Each of them drew just enough information from one another to change. Soon the entire controlled environment had simply become their peculiar lair. The walls had actually become organic, covered by some almost illidiac net which spread as soon as it had come into contact with the rest of the floor. Not only the temperature had fallen into their hands, both of them had also managed to draw some of the members of the controlled facility in. A pair of contacts came and appeared to have been lost. With their cards being authenticated, no living thing would keep itself from pushing in. The saint in white arose from slumber, waiting in the hall of lost chapters. In the tomes rested in order for atonement, for their own sake had been lost, at the cost of whomever the thieves had been. As soon as one was to account for each of them and the extinguished flames which had almost engulfed pages, he opened a book he had drawn from one of the shelves and started reading again. 'Where was I?' He wondered as soon as he came to stand tall, though his feet were long and widespread, in the insignificant way they had begun. Both of them were lost, he couldn't walk any longer without his servants being there. 'I long for you to arrive, back in the place where my insight has gone.' To his words none answered, and none the matter. It looked like once he stood straight, his marble radiance had emerged. The circle around his head faced, his almost plastic head bobbed and out of his shoulder a pair of incomplete arms fell to the side. Even if he had tried, he couldn't remake himself in the way his ancestors had left him there. What had been left of him was but an arm, once which work thoroughly not to be broken and pulled from the rest of him, at last. It was undecided what to say. 'When shall I speak with you again?' He wrote in the passage, and the one locked in it responded. 'Once I am ready to accept that I cannot escape my fate.' Answered one of the lost speakers, tormented in the purgatory, with no one to talk with, in moments like these, a blessing came. 'I shall force you to join me then, during my closest hour.'

Would you be pleased to join me?’ ‘But how can I look alive where there’s nothing I may dine upon?’ The back of the stranger, in the tome he had picked, had bore the description. ‘Being whipped.’ As the many lashes left some hindrance to the core of his body, he had only found himself drawing back, pulling to the side until nothing was worth it. Only the supreme dementia which arose from what he would peer upon lain in his mind. The blind would not see, the deaf would not hear, and the one who’d speak his mind aloud couldn’t fear his own voice. So many things had been left unspoken and unwritten by him. Many of his journeys and his sights, all of which haunted him more than he could think about. I had only come in contact with the Slugman once. He had been lost to me ever since that day I have come into contact with him. Whoever I could span to look into, for as long as I could help it. The Pink Slugman Illioporus.

Determined for disturbing delights

How could it be that they were still alive, even after the percussion of the compressor? Their high peaks had been taken down. And when they had, the population couldn’t resist as the waves had shot across the planet in a wave which had turned their bodies into those changed hour glassed traps in which they had been locked ever-after. Earth had been full of them. Standing bodies which couldn’t move, bones which had mixed with skin and blood and water and the dirt which had been around seemed to be thinking for each second in which it took mankind to return. It seemed like they had come, one by one, bearing the memories of the worlds they had been sent to witness. For, this, as it had been was only the malignant image of some long terrestrial prison which in which only the wickedest of minds survived. The sight of the mundane couldn’t. There were those who stopped from their way and watched. From out of nowhere a human being had appeared out of all, or at least a piece of him. It looked like an ever-changing form that mixed and tried re-forming a man. His hands shape appeared only to be contoured as if to keep themselves that way but from inside, it looked like there had been made a connection in-between the special tunnel there. Between the inter-dimensional hole, the inside of which looked as if it had been shaped out of many pieces fit together, out of moving flesh-being who had been tormented by the torture wheel in which they had been set. Those hinges had been solid and seemed to come out of those creatures, holding in the human still and his body had been stretched from inside his world and into that other one. He couldn’t help it then. Pain had gradually increased for each moment which had been spent there. And every second, every moment, for as much as he could stand inside of that place, a piece of him would be pulled back and replaced with another. Eyes would look from the sides of the sole of his feet, while back on his home planet, there would be nothing there. Some cruel and twisted creature seemed to have exited from his much delighted groin-like area, as he was invited to his world. Seeing how so many of them were venerable, this heartily, extended rueful centipede-like formed head widened itself to a size which would only spread and push until its body had become a block of many twisting legs, clustered at each ends. Four pointers spat as it few and shot one long leg as some bolt. The farther it went, the thinner would its body become. But that was worth it, for it had managed to pick up one of the men who had been there. And its teeth collided with his inside and as they had, suddenly it had shown its savagery in might. This was no creature but an elaborate living device. It would collect the man and place him into some form of statis while he would be prepared to get locked inside that prison. As a mindless device, that it was, nothing from its insides could manage to do with the fact that there were many invaders everywhere, using the entire system while only ever so many of them could be dispatched at a time. In the world where the fluid atmosphere turned into a stirring pot of vileness bred out of some inbreeding cause by the liquids which had tried setting themselves forth as some desperate suitors, now crept to the likes of siding with the primitive beings which were there. One pimalistic stalker appeared on the ground. The floor was raunchy, each step formed another piece of ground underneath his cleverly molecularly enchanted being. It couldn't have been thought off by any means that one could look at himself and see anything. As the body of man wasn't supposed to become what it had been forced into. Without a doubt, it was not to be called in form. This forced him to suffer time after time as he drew in the sight of the other ones that watched. The insignificant concoction which had been formed by the universe looked like a fat, greenish-yellow skinned resonant hard fluid, which had moved on its own before stopping in a final mold. Its limbs were gangrenous, taking to themselves to spread in sides, where one could land his sight, if only he could wait. Danger resided to the way in which it had approached. As it opened a blue colored wretched hole from which puckered the strongest stingers it could master. They looked like tectonic rocks, formed only for their might alone. With a huge flush or beady robes which had been placed around the man's strong nodes, his neck had been smacked, his joints as well. And this enthusiastic morse' started eating from his insides, revealing that through the strange inter-dimensional tunnel, pieces of him began being pulled and ripped apart. From some entire sections there began to be a line so thin that the man had been torn apart completely. Now, there would not be any return for him to the place from which he had come. And the entryway between worlds had come to an end. Tiny spaces laid inside the gaze of the man who watched at the primalistic world he had been thrown in. He had been fully formed as a man. Pieces of his eyes appeared less than apparent to any watcher who knew what to look for. Something about them had been wrong by every possible mean. If someone found it possible to have an inside look, he'd know what it's like to dream of their own surroundings. As that's what it looked inside one of the eyes.

Pieces of a man, must hurry

One would have to look for the marks left in by footsteps on the ground as well as for door steps placed on the walls. They were left there by those who had drawn in and who chose to spread those acres which had sunken from around the very room they had been trapped in for hours. Less than a few sacrificed had been made as they would store their own thoughts inside of them. Perhaps every now and then, a man like Matthenew would come in there and spread the likes of bleeding doors, only to enter in a phase of watching, how the small particles like spume broadened to the likes of grey. It felt like they couldn't have forced themselves to do anything else but push and spread and tell no man what had been the inner-workings in the likes which then revealed. To the man who had entered through the hinged of a door in one of the walls, he couldn't have forced himself out afterwards. It was there where he would remain for as long as he was to be alive, in a state of not being but slowly he would become like static. And he would be jointed by hundreds of others that had stood there in the likening of being forced to static and static until their very souls had been ripped apart. Matthenew couldn't stay. This period of time had been short and he himself had been shortened. Or at least pieces of his body were. Eventually, after having had his fun, he came back out. Someone made sure there would be a trail to follow. It was clear that he stood enough time in there for someone to come in and make a hole through the bottom of the door, right near the step. He saw just how deep it went. Apparently, someone stole pieces of him, too many to count. Not only would that be a disappointment to him, but it would appear like his dream or his desire to be part of them, that infinite mass of human beings, which bled through one another as static, that desire would fade away. He had to pick up those crumbs of himself. 'How many of them are there? Whoever that thief is, he will pay for this.' Matthenew hissed. No doubt came to it. They looked at him, on the streets. Normal citizen who wouldn't have even looked at him otherwise, clearly they hadn't seen much more of a twisted complexion than he had on his face then. Pieces of it were missing and they didn't work like that. Neither of them could be shoved back inside of him, otherwise this wouldn't have been a problem to begin with. As for face value, they did smile and seemed to grin at the fact that this backfired. 'Why are you judging me now? If only you knew how great it is to be part of them, to feel nothing, not to be looked like an ugly man or some. Someone who was lost.' Is lost. I'm lost. But that scoundrel was there, just around the corner. I could feel him just about that point, looking for me in some direction which wouldn't have been held aloft. He was someone's child, apparently, quite clever for his age. With a few tools and a vulnerable man, this kid had made a blow which would be unforgivable for anyone else. If only I had my hands around him, around the back of his throat and into his ribs. That kid would know what respect is. He would learn it soon enough on his own skin. Indeed, he knew just the perfect punishment for that child. If he was to be caught, then, sweet irony would come. Why shouldn't the kid be permitted to live? No one said the kid had to die, why, he would make it so the kid wouldn't have to suffer anymore. Both of them could bet together after all. With each turn of the block, Matthenew started thinking about what he could tell the child. Sweet promises of this being his end. 'That kid should've known better than to mess with me.' At this, he seemed to be set on it. A light flashed from the sign above his head. Some neighbor thought it would draw in some people to move in if he proved himself to be rather hip with them. Clearly it hadn't been the case at all. No, there'd be nothing pulling at it either. Both of them would have a long way back to talk about it. But as for this alley, it seemed normal. Flattened grass, cut, rounded end of the road, with four traditional homes in such a city, this seemed old. What he couldn't take away from him was the fact that he had seen exactly in which house the kid went into. 'Think yourself clever because you ended the trail right about the middle? I saw you enter that house, kid. I know where you live?' It's been getting all too heavy for Matthenew to carry that pile. He couldn't trust himself to carry it even less or far more distant than it had been. With one leap in that direction, he could be just by his front door and enter it. Just keep in mind, the child brought this on his own. He'll be the one to suffer. I'll make them pick them up, every single one of them. There wasn't any undoing now, he already placed them into a pile out there, exposed to the elements. If he waited too long or if he didn't hurry, they could melt and become tender as well. But that would mean he would become too as well. And pieces of his head were missing. He forgot that tiny detail. Not a single moment to waste. 'Where are you kid? Open the door, now!' It would have to fall eventually, if only he had hit it hard enough, for as long as he could, hardly stopping, unable to be heeded. His thicko-clock stopped marking four at least eight hours ago. That ancient thing looked as looking, as its tongues were licking like a tiny bull-plated small bed-rocked stones from where it could be seen spinning. Obviously malfunctioning as it had been distracting, it had looked as if he couldn't be bothered by the hands which pointed at one another, gulping at each stored piece. It was right where he placed it. Otherwise bent to such a scuffle, he looked as if ready to overcome his desire to draw in. Will he look around if I drew the lock from the barred visor? Without enough, he couldn't have shoved or pushed all of those remaining memory pins anywhere else. Not only it may not even be thought off, but he could also spare a look forward. To the side, they already seemed to have melted, on the desk and on his four squared, eighty inches television set. Could it be the room temperature that caused it? In about one moment he would enter through that door. Little care had been heeded for injury, as he wouldn't care of he'd get on the other side still in one piece. The door broke with half of his body standing outside and the other side lying within the house. Not only had he looked into it by something within a few seconds in and out, but it also came to him there that he would stare at all the other pieces of him which had been wasted. But this sudden burst out of his chest revealed that there was another kind of affliction which threatened to terminate him. A rate burst which had been induced by the process of transition between the two worlds. Seeing how there wasn't a chamber made out of the unity of many people, two halves hard turned against one another. That bottom half from the waist down only came to leave some kind of miss creation of the room it had come into contact with. It would self-cannibalize the living pieces, forming them into sides, twisting and moving them around the yard so they might be wide spread. It hadn't been meant for any objects to become part of the unity, and those long grass-blades only peculiarly seemed to matter now. No amount of push-and-drag could make up for the fact that the man had been inside the house. And his was the other side of the body which had, in turn, reversed the process up to the point of having himself be turned in a man. He was bleeding then, but at least his hands had been on the back of that child. 'I've got just enough time, kid, look at what you've done.' He had been a mute. Only but a few things went through his mind then. First the hand which had been on top of his face seemed to have a few pieces of half-fingers melting on his face, not even likely to leave a mark as they only brushed off his cheeks like water. 'My bones are turning inside out, I can feel my mind going off. But you're still going to come with me one way or another.' The brown in his eyes only cherished some kind of reflection against that constant static which had taken pieces of his door as it spread itself across the floor, the ceiling was there no more, and finally that man had got what he had asked for. Even the pieces of himself which had been on that sidewalk had been taken back and afterwards, no one had been safe to ever walk upon it. Matthenew had been no more.

Primitive savages

There were floating islands just as widespread as any man could see. Many roots flung those floating formations from one side to another in some dance of much disturbing hopeless influence given in by the mad gazers from beneath. On both side, beneath and above of them, no rest could do over the fact that it half pushed itself to some kind of defensive stance which was much needed in order to keep itself from breaking. Their small plains, as dark and shady as they were pushed and threw one another into repealing curves. In themselves, whatever might've been stores pushed inwardly towards the lack of better storage, damaging whatever organs there had been inside those floating islands. Many dazzling grips had shaken them so badly that they couldn't keep themselves floating in the air. It was laborious of them to stand and float into the mad circuit of space. And in-between every other gap left in which hadn't been fully occupied by the empty circuit, there was something near some flattened planet or some piece of some long crushed comet which had been used for travel by the most dreadful of beings. From there, it seemed like there came the one who had been waited for. In his share of most disputable claims, the fragrance of space which had been given life by the empty circuit now came into being. Many of its sprouted faces ended up being swallowed by newly formed ones. The spaces looked as if it had been flat there for one second until it suddenly pulled itself to make some space for that thing. Nothing was within its rage. But one planet suddenly approached. From beneath its end, that space-admired being had finally come to be. Its faces were only four in number and from the top of their heads, there was a worm-like crown from which came many walking legs which pushed onward as to creep into the essence that planet had promised it. From where it stood, mightily in its show, there seemed to have been sprouted some peculiar velvet-shaped bottom cowl. It would present itself like some deity of the outer space as it pushed in forward, presenting itself as this mad being that had come in front of those strange and tiny primitives who stood beneath it. As for what they resembled, those faces were rather shallow and would appear as nothing but some strange formations. Only a human being could see a face in such a being and there were none out there. It felt like there would be something to be held in contempt. No amount of waiting would do for such a thing to happen. It wanted something from them and those nasty creatures couldn't help but praise it instead of giving something to the circuit. Was it no them who brought it there? Within its grasp, now that it had come nearer one of the primitives, it ran its crushing mouth against it. But there was no hole in there, only that crushing force which left the remains. In the strange happening of the universe, the primitive creature didn't die, instead it had been exposed to some peculiar growth mechanism which had imitated the strange being. Or it least it had attempted to do so. Most of the process so far had been seen like some kind of blessing, pushed forward from the likes of a primitive folk who was one of their own spread on the ground, with a piece of that face sticking out of what used to be his body. But that blessing had turned on them as it from that very petty grave upon which they looked down upon. It couldn't be helped now. From its downplayed recognition, it had spared not a single second as the face of the primitive had been farther away, being connected only by the growth of the imitation which had been its long, and worm crown. 'You are beneath me, you are all beneath me, let me get a hold of you. Petty things, don't mock me. I am as much of a god as he is and I shall not be forced down upon my self not matter what.' He was quickly abandoned and not only that. This creature had been spat upon, thrown and dragged but strangely, they only touched the parts of which hadn't been attached to that deity which had been grown on it. No, it turned just so close to being shoved by the side, the pain which only throbbed in such a small a head. The feelings in his limbs were dead. No questioning could be had for the likes alone couldn't have been had there. It would be hard to look after them, especially since it may not be that they could be distrusted with him. He could not be farther from the pack now. Under direct surveillance from that circuit spawn, they threw the other savage into a pit they had dug underneath the much beloved, tormented foliage. In some sudden urge, they returned and watched closely as one of their own had fallen with that creep in his pit. There was only one slimmer of emotion there, before the savages realized that the creature had been dead. It couldn't be denied that such an insolence would shatter no less of an expectation when it came to whom they were they worship. One hand, this comer from above stood there, bored. Ever since ha had come there, little interest had been shown in the world he stood in. Less than that had been disposed for pushing inside the filthy brothel they had set around the pit. Those nasty creatures only seemed to act like suitors for the half-god. It was disgusting to look upon, as they threw their young daughters to that thing below. After all, despite being as frail as it had been, this creature had shown itself, it proved itself to be a contender as well as an enemy to them all. It couldn't have been suffered no less over the fact that they shot at another through dark ways of preparations, in which their daughters would be taken good care of. Look at them. They only see him now for what he is or what he had become. There's little insolence in what they've done. No interest whatsoever in what they came to be and do. Well, I should have taken him and dragged him into the gutter he is. Where he belongs. There were thoughts in that circuit box. After all it had only reflected what the universe had thought off. No matter, not less than what it had been, the broken one had eaten the living one he fell. Not only that, but in his prime example of savagery he had done well to eat and hide himself inside the body he had just attained. Such a primitive thing wasn't worthy of someone like him, but it would do for now. No one could bother enough to push it in any direction than what it was needed. They had little strength of character and seemed to be caught in the initiative he showed. Like a bunch of small puppet-engineered repugnant skin-beings, they had become quick to follow, never being set back by the nerves which had been needed to give in. He may have looked like any other creature with his lips slightly puckered by the likes of high deceive, but, for the one who knew what to look for, one may very well force himself onto them. With his newly acquired might, in front of this, father, as the feelings formed, he would choose to present himself for what he is. A stranger of many less than acquired words and unfelt, unrelated touches, for the likes of which one may know better than to show himself for what he had come. Clearly, there were tremors in the like of that one who stared. One wouldn't have passed on the chance to show himself especially since most of those who had surrounded him were rather dumb. Primitive, perhaps, though they had strength of their own. As their muscles did enable them to go ahead and try hinting at some never-met gaze, the power of on-looking at the flying edges coming from space. The circuit had grown weary out there for their own likes were not supposed to dwell outside and push through that tiny hole which had been formed through the planet's atmosphere as it had forced one tiny grasp of the outside inconsistent gap of biochemical nodes to be produced. They would appear out of nowhere, from one side to another, forcefully throwing the tiny bodies of the prime savages against the ground. Caught in a stream of forceful thrown, there wasn't anything which could come out of the fact that they were pushed and had been drawn to that point where they grew weary of life and died. In that moment, the one half which seemed to have taken to it to sit on the ground hadn't been affected by it. Only one effect threw itself over, as it happened for it to go on and be set aside. Nothing could throw it from where it stood, in that spot where it had managed to drag it. As the heads of the circuit came, they looked down into the pit and stared at this breed which had been bred out of their own gut. Why had it been so peculiar to look down upon it? After all, it felt like they were only staring at a mirror of their own insides. The red scare Back in the past there was the red scare that no one dared speak about, for what it had entailed was the fact that for no lack of courtesy, none dared ask what it had been about. 'Look at how it turns the normal, good-working men into lazy red painted, escapees? They have no comprehension of reality and what comes with it? Someone needs to civilize those men and drag them away from their red idol.' In the heart of their land, it had appeared like the churches had been brought down, while they had been replaced with it. The standing spine would belong to you, the watcher, looking at its formed and born out of its holes, the many skulls of the men who died during the Revolution. Thereafter, everyone who died found himself thrown into that pile, unnerved by the fact that there would be no way of seeing their old or visiting their graves at all. Bodies lied in burning heaps, while their skulls had been flipped onto that idol. 'Behold the red idol, the symbol of the state. Is it not great how it stands there, glooming with its red light and grim delight? See how they all died for us, for many, many years in which, for better and for worse, generations died only for you to live with freedom. Nothing could be farther from it. For some who looked behind at the chanting man appeared to have state-encased collars at their necks. As opposed to the neutral faces coming from the other men, they smiled. How could they deny that feeling which had been shown to them then? If they hadn't, one could mark them for the taking. Paranoid instilled instill in the fact that they've been told about how advanced they were and how they'd snap off their heads so it'd be easier to drag them to the idol. Mostly, it had been the trouble makers who wore those markers, not to alarm the others in some way. But no one knew if those collars were just signals for the guards so they may take them to the chopping block, or worse. No one risked, or if they did, those had been closed cases. And the closed cases were obvious to them, as a matter of fact, one knew of them at a first glance, as soon as it would happen for them to go at that. People immediately circled one such man and stood there, talking, spearing no doubt, but never spoke of what they thought aloud. Even from the distance, the on-lookers could do nothing but wonder what had happened to the man. Instead of looking inwardly to himself, Ivan never bought it. 'They don't look like they're, you know, they don't look like they're shocked by it. I don't see any blood spreading around.' 'Shut up Ivan. I don't want to hear anything from you again. You always spit on the state, you always look down on people who pray to the idol and.' 'I see it for what it is. Don't act as if it isn't that way. There's something to it that they're not telling us about. There's way too much space inside of it, can't you see it? I'm afraid that the state won't be able to hold its people for their sake at this rate.' 'Don't interfere with them, you know that nothing good could come out of it.' Katya said, whilst looking at the plainness of their simple house. One state-enforced ambulance seemed to have made its way through both ends of the crowd. It couldn't be conceived that they would manage to somewhat made that as subtle as it appeared to be. And the thing was that, they didn't hide it just from the onlookers from their home but also from those above. Foreign zeppelins had been allowed to go through their foreign land and it couldn't be anything but forced. Even with their lenses, they still couldn't see through the thick clouds coming from their filth-inducing steam machines. It would be dreadful for the greatest line to go off there, leaving twenty homes without electricity. 'How come it always happens when there's someone about to lose their head?' Every single time, forced as if through some weird event, it seemed like there was someone or something getting in the way of people finding out the truth. It had been an age which had prevented them from ever thinking or saying what they wanted to say. And that idol had only served as its reminder. How it looked down upon every single man as the crowd dispersed. 'They managed to do it again, not a single sign that there might be some body there. I can't help it if there's nothing there. Nothing, not a single puddle, you'd expect there to be something.' 'We're too far off, you wouldn't be able to see it from where we're standing. Just let it blow off, you know you can't do anything about it.' 'Fine, then I shall make it there and see it for myself and if I don't, then talk to me no longer and expect nothing in return.' 'Ivan, don't do it. It's not worth it. Is truth really that much worth it to you that you would risk being collared like them?' 'How could even think of asking me that? Have you lost your mind now? Is life even worth living if you cannot even dare say what's on your mind? Simply take a look at that idol there. That's where we'll all eventually end up at. So what's it to you, Katya? Can't you see that they managed to dull your mind now?' She hadn't responded, nor had she cared for any kind of accusation coming from him. Simply put, she was there, working on her dress with the limited materials she had been given in care. Ivan thought about it, walking around the room, trying his best to shake himself from that poor condition he'd been set in. On the way out, he grabbed a small coat off the rack, it was a worker's delight, with one band of stripped hammers on its side, something about that mark never made sense to him. Katya had been stranded on a turn right about the stairs, looking straight ahead of her. She wasn't one to dwell for long, or to bother with much as it was, but even she knew something had been wrong with the outside world. She couldn't have cared less for the people outside, for as long as he caught one more day of doing nothing. 'Ivan, are you seriously planning on leaving me alone today? We barely get to spend enough time together as it is. Always in that damn factory, struck by something day and night, a woman would be rather peeved by such a man.' 'Have you considered leaving then, Katya?' 'You know I've got nowhere else to be. And I would be on stranded on the streets if you left. Just stay inside, one more day, I swear, everything will be clear then.' 'By then, they would've cleaned the place up to a brim and I would've missed my chance to find out what happened there.' Before she could protest further, he snapped the door shut. He had been gone before the hour. It wasn't too far from where he lived now, nothing was. As a matter of fact, the entire country seemed to have become a giant circle which had been pointed at the Idol of red. It couldn't make sense, but that's how it appeared to be, not in the way the architecture had been landed and drawn, but how the people acted. People used to stare outside their homes instead of intervening when something like this happened. Not now, it was something he had thought of doing for some time. Within reason, there had been an exception. Katya couldn't help but stand near the window, staring and wriggling her napkin at him. Ivan couldn't help it but stare around. The streets were empty with the occasional guard who had patrolling or who had made an opening through the steel in order to fish. Everything seemed to have been placed over some frozen ocean of the alike. It's been this way ever since the destruction of the Motherland. But was that even true any longer? Past the idol, there were mountains in the distance, there appeared to be land, there in the distance, placed at the same level. And opposite to the north, they were surrounded by a similar sight. Ivan had been hand struck by it. Focus on what had remained of it, that blood, those remains, if there had been any, I will know. He could only remember the general area from where the body had been taken and nothing else. At least, he would get to get through this without getting his hands dirty. It should've been there, but it wasn't, there wasn't any sign of there having been a man in that place, let alone some marks of a head being ripped apart. And even the crowd, who stomped their feet on the ground, there were a few scrapes which had been left there, but nothing too deep, no smidgeon of blood which may have escaped if it were be. Tomorrow then, Ivan thought. He would get up early and try joining one of those crowds. If it turned out being what he expected it to be, he would confirm it then. He would know. The following night had been restless, as they all had been when one had to sleep near a woman like Katya. He had been distracted, somewhat by the dreams of red he had. Likely, no one living near that idol had any chance of getting a shut eye. Something downright diabolical happened. The thought over the event haunted his mind throughout the night. It kept him awake. Ivan knew he had seen what they were doing there, he gave in to the image of those men in the front. They must've been miners of some sort, halting with their picks before going on to strike at the body in front of them until there'd be no red to it. Another lie, they said they removed the blood from the bodies so they could feed it to the eyes. That's what gave the red such a growth and such a crimson radiance, it had been the blood they got from every dead man. No apples either in the markets, they would be harvested in order to make some shells and leave them standing inside as well. He wanted to come near and wondered if he'd get to see something now, brushing past the crowd, only to reveal nothing. Straight into the middle of the night, after each attempt of a shut eye, he forced himself to stand. Katya was sleeping like a dead man, or she smelled like one. It wasn't likely that he would be disturbed now, now, not a second in-between. Under the likes of a lamp-light, he chose to lock himself in the kitchen and wait. Could he even bleed if he had tried or was he only imagining it? Now that it was within his reach, he tried thinking what would happen next. If only there was a tiny cut there, he might be able to confirm what was going on. Perhaps he'd bleed, perhaps he wouldn't. How deep should the cut be? The radio turned out amidst the night. It had almost pushed Ivan out of his senses and out of his nerves. A set of two cardboard-tampered orange-boxes already fell from the top of their counter. Public announcement. 'Dear citizens of the Red territory united. The state had decided to announce that tomorrow, at dawn, you are to be present in front of the entrance leading to our monument of hope, that you may find yourselves observing the execution of Citizen Olaf. He has committed an atrocity against the State and we have decided that he is to be punished by the immediate release between the inner doings of his throat and his tools of listening to our message of peace.' Katya forgot to close it. It was some kind of a punishment for those who weren't paying attention to the radio. Those messages went continuously every few hours, to the point where one would have to put the effort and close it if he were to draw a shut in. And it wasn't easy either. There was no confirmation whether or not the radio would be closed at time, no popped button there and no sound. Ivan himself was unaware whether or not something came of it. But the next transmission could only come after hours and there was still the problem with the knife. That will wait, simply be there, for the execution. If you could be there, then it'll work itself out. Two hours into the night and he still couldn't get an eye in. 'Have you noticed something about them? It's like they've been forced to become spineless. Look there, everything is coated in red, the houses, their clothes, their raised buildings and even their roses.' 'John, those are supposed to be red, they are roses after all.' 'I know, I know but still, we got them in pink and even in white in the states. They need to be brought to our way of thinking. All that red is bound to get up to their heads.' 'What's stopping us from releasing the charge over that thing in the middle? They must be worshipping it and that can't be any good for the head, if you know what I mean. You know how crazy they are, sooner or later, we could wake up with one of those things snuck inside the state, like some bootleggers dragging their booze on them.' 'Shut up, I think I see something, look, there, over there.' There was indeed a gathering down there. More than a few people gathered, to the point of there having filled the main square. It was there that the idol managed to look down upon then it its prime of red. Their assorted clothes, though dull and plain in their appearance, seemed to have been stamped and well prepared for what was going on. Though they may have been kept down, they felt a deep desire for blood thirst. It wasn't that often that people got to see an execution, especially not for a foreigner who wasn't even decently dressed. Olaf, man who had come from somewhere of the North-Western Hemisphere, stood there, dressed in the same clothes as they had. One would take him for a spy, otherwise, for some reason, none dared say anything out of fear of the man. Something about him, and the way he looked at them came to heed some respect from their side. It wasn't important. That thought aside, he had to be killed. He couldn't be allowed to live, no spy had been, that's why they brought him there, and they had to make an example out of the man. 'Katya, you're staying inside and I won't have you open that window until it's finished. Do you understand me? A woman shouldn't be exposed to those kinds of events.' 'Why? I am more than properly equipped to deal with myself. I would say that it is you who should stay here, Ivan. You haven't been right for some time, in there.' She could only pop a small finger at her temple. But it's been enough for her to know what it had been for. 'I mean it, Katya. Do this favor to me and I promise that I will spend as much time with you as I can, afterwards.' 'You mean it?' 'You know I do. Nothing will keep us apart, you understand? Nothing.' He only gave her a kiss on her forehead as he headed out. Katya did notice something about him, as he made his way out. It was a small cut just around his palm which he had forgotten how to bandage. Before she could make it to him, he closed the door behind, locking it before she'd even get a chance to act. 'Now, let's see what it is to you.' Ivan said as he made his way towards the mob. For someone attending a lynching, they weren't really too active as people. If anything, there had been nothing about it, but the reverse going on. Everyone there seemed to be either gulping or rather onset on this strange man's eyes. Something cold came about it, if even the guards showed some reluctance themselves for what was to be done about the man. If he weren't tied behind his back, well. That was enough. The two of them had forced their eyes apart. It felt like they were the only ones living there. And that had been the case for a while. For a place under such tight control, everything only appeared wide and empty. He even wondered now, how come there were no guards standing at those doors? Had no one ever attempted it then? Only two guards stood by the man. With just enough speed, he could make it past them and make for the entrance, that way he would find himself there and decide for himself if they had hid all of the red inside the Idol's head. The red state had taken everything from him, his freedom of thought, his need to speak his mind, everything. Ivan only wanted to know. He knew that man must've been so much more alike him, but he was a foreigner after all. There had been only one chance to find out and in his lack of sleep he took his chances as he ran. Past the vesselium upon which that man had been placed, he went at it before the two uniformed men even had the chance to snap out of it. It had been such a strange sight, seeing one of their own just take on like that, which only added to their stupor. They draw in, leaving the man there, seeing how he wouldn't be able to pull himself off the cuffs, and came to chase Ivan. Now, lying under the many skulls, he had realized just how similar they looked to another. Has it gone so long since they were under control that their heads would shrink to such small sizes? It was unconceivable. By the time when he was met by the end of the stairs, he started chasing wild phantasms, seeing how they came behind. He would finally find out, despite their blurred shout, what had it been up there. What had they been hiding? Where had all the red gone? Where had his blood been taken? Before reaching an end, he stopped at the top of the staircase, frozen in a state of shock. In front of him, stood the cemetery, the vault, the places where his forefathers, his companions, his parents and every living being at that. And it was cold in there, the light was dim, and there was no red for him, anywhere to be seen. 'You heard the orders, haven't you? Drop the charge, it's time to prevent this catastrophe from reaching the states. It's either us or it is them.' To which the charges had been dropped. And Ivan had been struck. He couldn't see much from the blow, but he swore he saw a liquid coming from behind his neck, which was enough for him to know. It was then that the red scare had come to be, whilst everything blew up in a show made out of agony. By the time the announcement had even been played, Katya stood alone in her bed, having her ears placed against the tool, waiting on Ivan to come, soon.

Cave

In some way, it could've been avoided, heading through that tunnel. Before long, the way back had been closed and it looked as if there were some kind of minerals which clearly exposed themselves to those previous explorers who had been there before I had arrived. Without much help from the others in the ground, we, alone, have proceeded forward. Jonathan, Camp and I were the only ones carrying the means of protection. Those crystals had hardened themselves the moment we arrived in their presence. We were watched by them. The first crystal had been flat, looking the way it looked, cut around the corner, from the spread which opened a small corner which leads inside of it. It looked like the more they had descended below, the nearer they had managed to get into that hole. Prior to their descent below, they had stumbled on it there, past the edge of the bottom row. Much of the stone carpet had been rotten by the stun disease. 'It's been blown recently, I swear, this wasn't here below.' 'You've got a lot of explaining to do. This shouldn't have been here at all, this sudden leap in awareness will cost us a lot more than our funding. What do you suppose it happened in here? Someone came and suddenly threw themselves in before? How would they know there's another whole new level under the tunnel?' 'It could just be the tunnel only collapsed in it without outside assistance. There's still hope that we may be able to get through this unhinged, even if that is the case, right?' 'But what if someone did come in before us?' 'Then we shall find him or them and we shall carry on to put through hole through the top of his head. As much as it takes, we shall make it so we'll be the first ones there. I'll hear no more of it now.' With the quickness of the descent, there seemed to be something down there. Slow down there, you wouldn't want to fall now, especially since there was only one joint of wood standing between what had been of their rope. Protection was lacking as well, to the loathing amount of one helmet being bore by Camp. I had been the one to wear only my cap while Jonathan had been left behind, standing there, doing nothing of the kind but observe how we were risking our lives trying to get through some discovery. Small contingencies, now, unmarked for no notes. It looked like, down there, inside the slightly raised crystal formation, there had been nothing coming from it. Without a doubt, one would have to pay just enough attention to what was going on around him in order to figure out what that thing had been. Clearly, one would pay no less attention to what was inside that opening they had encountered. To the observation itself, or, as it may be, to fact that there had been something inside of it which had been released either by accident or another party which previously reached the end of it and in a slip of a chance, may have attempted to break it apart. But those crystals seemed to have inside of them just enough space for a man to enter. 'That's way too dangerous for either of us.' 'We shall go down there, together, or fall down that pit below us and never draw out of it.' To intervals came to be picked, from around the twentieth hit on Camp's pocket watch as well as his eight. What followed after had been another set which couldn't have went forward sooner.

Corpses of divine

An acolyte had once come up to me after his ritual inside his coven ended. It was his release after all, through which he had spared no word on matter. Before he had been done with it, he ran away. His hand suddenly had become a ray which couldn't be controlled any longer. The agony his kind had felt was much stronger than it had been. Only one would survive. Only one executioner could survive after all. And he alone would remain. It had to be that way, as his entire life counted on it. With such a disturbing stare, they threw themselves at him again, through their tumorous approached, many of those vile shades appeared from just about everywhere they looked. Without a doubt, that was what they had been looking for. The dark ray, filled with its energy, which sprouted from his arm as it released itself into a mad cone. From it, there could be drawn the power those shades seemed to be looking for in order to feed. No other power source would do. Oh, and this strangled piece which had escaped his bone seemed to be as nasty as to be looked upon in the dark and still be seen. Despite having itself been made out of some forbidden summons, life released itself from sight. The acolyte had died in that ritual as he had been placed into this zone where his memories unfolded and not much time remained. With his ray he could stretch into the chamber of his inner-most kind and reach for those parts in the brain in which he'd dwell. His body had lain outside the maddening temple in which he had once served his pantheon of morbid saints. As those holy men had once been stolen and forcefully said, their bodies had been submerged in some swamp of evil where they had been desecrated. But be weary, for those men who had been responsible for such a sacrilege as to defile those saints filled their suffering for what followed.

One could only ever hope to dread what waited for them on the other side. For, inside those dark and crushed bodies, there was the filthy magnificence of those who stood and looked down upon them as their souls escaped. What had remained below had been the bodies which had rejected their own servants. Though nothing could be said or seen of the bodies any longer, those acolytes served their image and spoke highly of their kin. Inside their slouch, there had been something to be seen. In the deepest level, one man had managed the impossible. As such as he was, the acolyte appeared to be looking at a single vision from his apparent memory which didn't belong to him. He had to step aside for a moment before he looked at the inner chamber of his brain. The sight of the unholy had appeared, with such a sudden causality as there had been. It was shocking, to see that a piece of his brain had been replaced with another which didn't belong to him. 'Those marks of black string, of course you couldn't have done a sloppier job if you have tried. What is it to you now? Why do you want to see me what this man has done?' There wasn't any helping to it. At least, no one should be forced to look upon a piece of his own mind being mistreated in such a manner. Even more so, this had been wretched and disgusting. He knew for a very fact that a pair of sleazy hands had mistreated him in such a manner. He knew he shouldn't care, let alone the fact that they were creeping inside his mind and now, his. 'I must defend you saint. I am aware that they have mistreated you and let me assure you that they will pay for each treacherous betrayal they've gone down with. And for every holy man they had taken, I shall make it so they know.' It seemed like the man had turned. Before he could pay any attention to what was going on in there, that piece of him which spread turned into the likes of his decrepit bed. It was in that wake of that ungrateful dread that one peculiar tormentor had arrived. The wake of his moving ribs had twisted, not to have shaken the very worlds underneath them. Within that gaze from the calloused world, a disemboweled hands as tainted as to be opened by unholy words, the ground stood at a wait. Below the ribs, which by means of large extraction stood the keyholes which had been needed? A disemboweled hands such as this with its gaze and magnitude of exported goods seemed to have waited for something to be told. To whom would those ribs have belonged? They should've been owned by the space entity which had given birth to the malefic engulfment of destruction which had once spread across the universe. In it there was some kind of desire to look back. Once, in the past, there had been life, but that had been quickly extinguished. The reason had been unknown. Out there, in the vastness of the universe only the remains of the lack of life had been around. But none of it had been solid either. Now, in the midst of this empty, lost and discarded place, how could one even think of there having appeared a pair of ribs in the midst of the sea of dead stars? It didn't. That had been it. What happened seemed to be just a recollection of the distanced past, where one could do nothing but wonder if something had gone in the matter of some longitudinal disdain? The waking call appeared in the midst of the entry. Most of the flickering evil inside the disemboweled hands appeared as to give in for the mad extraction. Though that had to stop, as it was some kind of event which could only break the disemboweled hands apart. Staring and yelling at the walls from beneath, one couldn't help but shout amidst the crowds. How had the body even come to lose itself that way? The giant tormentor which had lost his ribs didn't lay on the ground amidst the forests and the vile ends which had forced themselves onto him. No, instead of that, it seemed like he stood there, on his two feet, watching, lifelessly, yet alive. In some distant past he dreamed of his kind, how they had been created. Many of them had dread their ends, for they all knew that time after time, no matter what, they would all die in the same way. They would lay low across the valley, unable to do anything but weep and wait for their own ends to come. It couldn't be conceived at all, for no amount of credence would make up for what was happening or what was going on there. As much as one would force himself to be looked down upon, he would know. There, in the position, as they fellows, as their bretheren had died. It was clear enough that there could be nothing to be drawn out of it. No man should suffer this kind of uncertainty for himself. Enough was enough, and a mind could be tainted by the likes, he knew. Even thinking about it appeared to be pushing or drawing himself near the edge of death. It couldn't be thought off as being anything but the kin. Craftiness could be denied or it may not have been taken from the fact that there had been a few wretched watchers. But there had been many other men which had been in need of punishment for their desecration. Not to mention that the rest of those bodies had been hidden from him. It could not be denied that there was a constant feel of repulsion this man of cloth had felt, both at him and at the unholy act he's gone with. It was hard, having a piece of your mind missing. This could only have made him paranoid. A constant expression of shock had inhabited his face just then. This image of what he had become, or what he had come to undertake had resembled that of the old mad Tsar who had killed his son in a fit of rage. Around his neck, there lay the crucifix he had carried, stalling underneath his shirt, hidden from sight, undeniably sworn. Another victim had fallen pray to his quest to seek those saints. He would simply not rest until they were all found, removed of their earthly gabs and properly placed in their place of sanctity. For his Lord had spoken to him in the voice of old and as that happened there'd be no hope for no return. Mid-afternoon of what appeared to be some day in late December. Searches came and went. The bells of the church rang again, though the night sky had been blue, the stars of no hue, inside the bell he stood. The other man he had defiled, a piece of his mind inside. Less than likely as he had been, the cord which had been muffled by his body couldn't have disappeared any sooner than that. Pieces of him had been missing inside that bell, but this acolyte had revealed the other body of the saint as well. In the butt which lay on top, his body had crawled, the spine did rot. It was irrelevant what it had been made of, as only the flesh had fallen from his body, to reveal that his blood had been replaced with hot iron. It was fluid and that seemed to have come from a melted side of the bell. Stricken by infamy, the bell rang. And for a moment there, out of the many flayed pieces, he came a live, as a formless piece which spread about the tower, trying to get out of the lire. A sudden exposure to sound had caused his mind to be alive. What had been revealed to him was just how he had seemed to be placed. In the catacombs beneath, where lay, the many bones, the heads the rotting woes, the threat, he lay. In a chair, of black, placed at that, in a circle of many placed skulls belonging to many men of cloth which had stood before him. His sudden reveal to suffering had been long and enduring. The acolyte had been forced to see how this priest had picked every single one of the head, while he cherished the dead. His hands were ever so humble as to stumble into holy water before they had been placed upon each head. They had to be carefully placed where they belonged. It was a task which took some time, and in every moment that it took, the acolyte wanted to shout, as if he could. His tiny speech organ lay broken underneath crumbling stones. In his mind he had been pinned on the ground area of his brain by a small needle which stood in vein. Even if he could help himself and look away, it hadn't worked. With each skull being taken to their place heeded to be, it brought back to another, his sins pushing from dark places where he couldn't see anything but that bile which had been slowly drained inside his brain. Without a doubt, with little which may have been known about, it looked like the muck of the bell had only been the iron well, which had been melted, dropped as well. There had been a way of knowing and of watching. Man of cloth, brought not to justice but some kind of well desired fate of sin. He had been already walking half a mile in a pair of worn out shoes, unable to tell just how many of them had he spared. So many of the acolytes had been lost, about a quarter of them disappeared and out of place, and many of the bodies of the saints seemed to be missing just as well. One would have to search as deep as he might inside some lost passage underneath the ground where the gore and the chord of its dark abode had only spread. Though this man of cloth may have lost himself along the way, the acolytes could only convey through the top of their minds what had happened at least. In the scourge of being hunted, admits the places which may have been haunted at the time of the happening. But know this, for every time a head had been pierced and every time a body recovered, one saint got lost underneath his cover. Down there in the midst of his bed of worms and dark scarabs, he couldn't help but come to life. His metamorphosis had begun. From there, in that pit there wasn't any way for him to return to the spot he had bet set in. It turned out that his sudden resurrection had left an unquestionable mark which may never be repelled by no force whatsoever. His scent of decay forced all of those grubs and every infiltrator which may try itself there with means of lung resuscitation to be repelled. For the acolytes knew that underneath the burrying ground there were grubs that could turn organs back to life, a different type for each of his insides as well. The lack of many which may have been able to resurrect him in his entirety was rather unnervingly fruitful. What had to be dealt with was the very fact that there was nothing leading to it there. Many of the acolytes had suffered through some way or another as they had been tortured and messed with, as the implants had served as those reminders of what they did, from which they'd suffer after. A man stood stall, with no mind inside. All but one saint stood missing, with little to be held. There were so many acolytes who had nothing to do with this project and they had served by no means. While the man of cloth had only brought this on himself, as the corpses stood, purified.

Sunken eyes

That man had presented himself like someone with good intentions, though there was nothing of the kind to him. It couldn't have turned any better. By no means had he appeared in likeness of neither a beggar nor a well-to-do man. Instead, he came with some ill-intention, bearing on him a knife. Two by two, they threw themselves against him, two more of them, dressed in their strange clothes of planar angles, from which there came the entrance to the knife.

And as each of them died, that's where they lied, arms crossed together, as their insides were less likely to be received. 'My meal for today in exchange for these.' Colouroy brought the hunters eight more passages, which had been read. On the Neumokorum, only the last notes of a man's last written lines could be written in ink made out of his own liquefied eye after he had been killed. Regardless of what it had been the age or the circumstance in which whatever message or entry they may have been written, they would have their thoughts or past notes revealed. But that could only work only once for every man, for, the likes of the Neumokorum, there had only been ten. Such theory had existed as to explain that a man's memory would've been completely stored in his eyes. And after usage, the Numokorum would drag a piece of his mind, as it had a tiny needle coming from the page's placement inside of it. A hunter came to Colouroy, he stepped ahead, a string. On him there was a small device, and from within, he placed one of the passages in. Without a clear delay, whether this may have been unreal or up to him, the storing device played him as a vice. It had been revealed, then behind the glass, like some gramophone, the head of the dead man came, as if back home. He would open his mouth, in order to repeat his lines. To them it mattered little what he looked like, for everyone had suffered of an affliction of the eye. Both hunters had been blind, so they wouldn't be affected. It was for that very reason that they had been placed in that line of work. Vaguely he could be heard but that hadn't been enough. As soon as he had been done with the audio checking, the other hunter had stepped in. 'Give this to me.' He dragged a passage, he would sniff it once before going on ahead to put it in his mouth. The strange reaction was the fact that, despite not being able to hear the criminal, he saw what the man had seen at the time he had written the note as well as the area around him. It was that they had been looking for, the body of the girl, near the table, where her body had been able to move? She had been kept alive. 'It's time, there can only be a single way for us to know where she may be in order to track her. We need you to transplant one eye and get there behind her.’ ‘But what if I will be stuck inside of that place and never return?’ ‘Then you shall live two lives, and we shall cut your mouth wide and put an end in the middle so you may keep a side shut while your may use the other. But it is important for us to proceed this way, for this passage might be more important than any of the other we may have encountered.’ ‘And if I am to die here? If my body might be lost?’ ‘You shall then write a note as a warning. But there’s no message here now, so it shouldn’t have happened, unless you hid it from us. No trickery?’ ‘Do I look like one who may have done it?’ It was dangerous to wait for too long, as each passing moment made it so the passage would become a pink eye of its own. That would be dangerous, especially in the night. They could end up being seen and that man in the past would notice them as well. And they could see themselves writing. So many times it would happen that, if one were to write something of the kind. ‘Slit your throat.’ Everyone there could possibly die out of the fact that no one but one person out of so many who shared some kind of consciousness and mind might do something rather irrational, just so they could escape the torture. And it would be barely hopeless and indecisive for their lives, even if they had been blind. They would be affected just as well. There was only one opportunity to get through with it. If one of them, either of which may know how to act and what to sow, after which.

Imelusin

I have feared the advent of the new century for most of my life. I couldn’t even begin to wonder where I had gotten and why the streets were filled with them, mostly lost people who never spoke more than a few empty phrases at a time. Their mouths had been sealed over something they had said. Someone made sure they couldn’t even bother trying again. By noon, near the clock, the large domed communicator-looking protrusions had begun pushing out steam as it was ready to take off. I had thoroughly failed to see the hour pass by. They approached me immediately. Through the bars, or the crossed angles in which I could barely fathom pushing a finger in, I started drawing through them. My fingers acted on their. Their mouths were like strings, fluttering which each moment I spent on trying so push deeper inside of them. Let us say I took a few steps back, as if I wasn't pushed on my two lost feet. He wanted me to draw him something from my pocket and show him where I was from. It was my recognition card. It bore three pictures of my face, each one being altered, aged, just so I would be seen a few times after. A few years in the future only lying by my side. Before I could be read, by every bad and every code written there, I had been told I was going to die much sooner for my incessant observation and for all the sniffing around I've done. They aged it even further until one of the pictures had become young and the other one bore my face. My plaid face, stricken by features closer to those of a skeleton, or some dead man who was being infuriated at himself, and they had given me something. A conjoined creature that looked like me appeared on the picture. I was told I needed to find the man and die in the exact position which had been noted down. Otherwise, they didn't tell me of the consequences, to which I could only assume that something could be going off. My fingers were plainly pushed onward, generally pressed in. Damn bastards melted a bit of it. For a few moments spent in the cold were just enough for me to recapture that feeling and look back at what I've done. My finger prints were in there, deep enough to leave the impression I had been a fugitive. I would be questioned soon after. Near the rail station, down the counter, there was a lady with a few locks missing. I didn't get to see the bottom half of her mouth and body because of the metal barrier placed inside. Only a tongue-like missing piece of a shrub stood there, slightly disabled. It was clicking unevenly and appeared only to push on every now and then. As far as I knew, if I even tried to push my hand underneath it, she would press a button and chop off my hand. That wasn't exactly worth it, I imagined. Less than that, I kind of wanted to try. She waited there out of courtesy, not saying anything, obliged to look and listen to anything I had to say. Behind me there was no one. Even if they were, I was tall enough not to be approached in person, or to care for it, if they tried. Nothing, she would say nothing. I could stare in her eyes, even stare her down if I wanted to. There was little stopping me from breaking in the glass case, pushing just above the litter box. 'Do you own the cat?' Her sand was placed there, in the unaesthetic look which spread around the city. A greenish-pink metal which somehow found itself by the likes of some delusional architect who hadn't a single clue of what would please the eye. To think that she was the only beautiful thing in her case would be. There, I saw her, the feline form which spread and tried to get past her counter. It produced a twitch before our very eyes could come into contact again. I came to understand that there were things one didn't speak of. 'Move aside.' I immediately recoiled, looking at the vague thing which came in. Rectifying what I said before, I've come to realize that perhaps I was rightfully wrong now. Despite my staying there, in the same spot for minutes, I would not dare stand against someone like him. Two feet tall, fit to leave a mark as he grasped and charged himself against the counter. He disregarded the woman and went directly for the nearest amputee to insert his tips in. As for the two holes in which he found his fingers going, I saw the long tubes which scourged at least twenty feet below of him. It wasn't right to barge in, but I almost assumed they were human. Unlike my previously assigned observation, I realized I was right only in part. He was human, or that thing he was taking down the drain in exchange for energy had been human. Both of us were immediately made uncomfortable by this image of recklessness, this strange scent which infected our nostrils couldn't help itself anymore but betray something more morose. I was sick, being made so by the feeling of amputation. Though the smell infested my senses, I could almost feel him going back in. Exchanging more, needing to get in a few more liters of someone just like me. They saw that I was shaking and appeared to look with indifference. Only a jolt of a color came from inside their helmets, but that was about it. As soon as they had been away, the metal case which stood there closed immediately, leaving not only a scent, but the memory of my friend. That's what I called him, I didn't know him personally, but I could almost imagine myself in his place, being in there, looking at the circles, being amputated in his place. Just what kind of pain had he to endure to get into that state? My card went in, after seeing this, I didn't expect to shy away from showing my recently molested card. She filled it in, then landed it back to me, with a thicket. We nodded and continued our ways. I remember something of her, those eyes still kept with me. I could almost see myself jumping off only to be caught off guard and lay cut just under my shoulders. Despite the solitude, I have drawn myself in, taking my time to fantasizing about her, the way she had to speak by choice or force. I wondered what she sounded like outside her cage. Or what those deranged people might do to her. By time my ride came in, these thoughts vanished. After embarking in, I hadn't been given enough reason to return. They looked at me with so strange eyes, likely over the fact that I wore the same blue old coat and that they recognized me. Everyone here had been somewhat poor. Shoes were not always a commodity everyone could afford, and the thicket back home was always a fortune. It was a way of keeping you in, their cattle, and their slaves. Sometimes I could see the man in the third row, called Galloway. He picked up a fight with one of them, he lost it. Not an eye there, but a nostril still worked, and half of his mouth had still been sewn together. A prick of the finger took a way whatever was left of him. I had decided that I'd go, as soon as there was a chance for me to get away, I would get away on a random station and never stop walking. There were edges around the town where they lead down, to a point where a return was impossible. Plunging to my death didn't sound like the alternative I was to inquire about, but I felt as if I would survive it. A few had, they must've had. I couldn't even know whether or not they had, there wasn't any confirmation to it, but I knew I could leap down there and live with them. For now the same routine came over, watching over everyone, trying not to pay too much attention or too much suspicion over them. I had to trust someone. 'That's not what he asked me, I've already told you this eighteen times. He wanted a piece of a fruit and I refused to give it to him.' 'Come one now, who would get mad over a piece of fruit like that? It's ridiculous. I think you're exaggerating a bit here.' 'I think I would like to...' The train stopped, and so had my eavesdropping. We all looked over our windows and only saw the rims of the outdoors. There were so many plains which were lost. I had been accosted by the utmost dreadful of smells. As sticking my head out, I saw it. One of the bests had tackled the front row, which fell over and blocked the only way ahead. My mind had taken something from it. I saw just what was missing over its legs. It had a lot of that pucker, spread just around everywhere its body. From it, a few more coats would go on ahead and cover the tiniest amounts it could spill itself over. On the top of its little legs, afterwards, a few of its offsprings would start gnawing. This was how they fed, or how they were supposed to. But by the way in which those lumps started cajoling to it, I had no idea whether or not it would leave. My persuasion came over the man sitting in front of me. 'Might we switch places for the hour?' 'What for?' I shrugged. He gave in, as much as he had fallen prey to my stare. Even during the few moments in which his back was turned, he could feel my breath going over the back of his neck. He took breaks from the conversation and kept turning just about a few inches to face me from the side. 'Only for the hour?' 'Only for the hour.' That was all the convincing he needed. I was intruding now over the other passengers. It would only take me a few moments to recollect myself. But I believe I've been taken too near the point where I was almost mesmerized by them. A single man appeared to be distressed by the face that we switched places, but he had not a say until the hour was done. In reality, I had only come here to look around. From this spot, the better angles only came to me thoroughly. My teeth were battered, they jolted every now and then, in the expectation that we would run. By half-an-hour the engine started. It was strange, not seeing anyone outside, working to remove both the debris and the culprit. My senses went as far for me to hear only the slightest of shocks which came into contact with the worst of kinds. They made me feel unsure whether or not I had any desire left in me to be alive. For the other half an hour, I had desperately tried to make something of myself. Even with them trying to get a word out of me, I only came to think of her. What would happen if one of them was strong enough to break through? It crossed my mind several times. Especially so near the time, when one came in our compartment. Without a single exception, we've all felt a sheer folly of repulsion over the suit he was wearing. Something was missing, over his uniform, there should've been the mark of a cane. They embed them inside, as dark as they were, you could still see it being shaken. It was settled then. I would stop at any station and I would not leave this train. The man I was supposed to meet wasn't there, but as I figured it out, the consequences wouldn't matter if I was to become a dead man. They could sniff my arrogance from a mile away. I wasn't liked there, they weren't about to show me as much as a single whiff of the matter. It started happening along time ago, but the signs were there. The elderly would be on this part of town of the coast. I could go on my word again, I could go and there and see for myself why they would take them there. And it wasn't just the older generations, but the children as well. I could almost hope to see some of my relatives again, if only I would be given the chance. The lights were still flashing in front of my eyes. For I had only the vague recollection of trains walking by me, and leaving. I've spent too much time in that corner, coerced to give up the seat I've taken. My mind was still trying to go on its way. A few more liters of water could do much less and I could do without them. And I hadn't expected this place to be flooded to the rims of the edge of the underground tunnel the last train of tonight might take. I was greeted by an older man, whose appearance startled me. For I could not even decide whether or not I was supposed to abide a set of rules or to look away, they didn't exactly made me feel like I was from here, but another place. No age difference could straddle the two of us together but a kind of infamy we could barely exchange. By the midst of our walk, I saw them all, trapped in benches, standing as if they had their legs cut off. Perhaps I've come here, and intruded on their house of slaughter. Jolts of metal encompassed and rounded their meaty legs, their arms and pieces of their chests. They were broadened like holes, these meat-puppets in which I could only project my future for as soon as I could hold myself steadily on my feet, I've observed the constant following they did. Even from the distance, even here. I was not supposed to take the drop. But I hadn't been dropped off any other place with no reason in mind. They had me, they messed around. I want to be anywhere but here, being lead to room seven. Stiffened by the air, I could only conjure the look outside and wonder when they might come for me. The clock came back. It flew through the window, landing in the only spot where its landing could be complete. I have barely felt being myself there, for a few minutes, I couldn't even establish eye contact with it. For the same reason I decided that being this shaken had to have been a sign that I was on the wrong path. No longer trailed, but lost for the lack of fewer words. Unable to process how many of them were out there, I was again met by the disgusting look the city carried around me, regardless of where I managed ending up. They would attempt to get me as soon as I went to sleep. To implant those knots in my ear and in my mouth, my nostrils and bathe me in their fluid of sleep. Afterwards, I would sink in the deepest sleep and wake up in one of their armors, torn for pieces just like those old people. Those prosthetics were tied to them as a result of them being constantly used for their insides. I shouldn't have looked in any sooner, but I knew that had been the case. Shaken too soon by it, I decided that for a portion of my mind alone, it wasn't worth it to bother with them. I could at least make the pass and change my room. Down at the clerk, who had been another pensioner, I seemed to be staring at a face which lacked those qualities of an old person. I was met by a spook, which lay in its mold. Waiting for a death which refused to come, which by now, showed no interest into hiding its affiliation with the grave. The symbols it wore at his neck were something so awfully awry that I want to know more. 'What do those things around your neck mean?' The old man had his pupils closed for the entirety of time I was there and I hadn't even realized it. For as soon as I had stared at those white circled things, there wasn't any difference for me to notice, whether or not they would be closed or open. 'They're a reminder of an old family tradition. We used to hunt during season for the bugsmears. About the year of the old gudgeons, when there field out there unoccupied, it's been a while since then.' 'I'm sure it was old man. Could I not perhaps pick one of those for myself? I'm feeling out of water now and I have to have something to protect me.' 'Have the entire necklace, on my behalf. There aren't many young men around these parts, and we have a few of them down here anyway.' He pulled a box from beneath the counter and showed me just how many of them he had to spare. It was a wonder that the entire town hadn't been filled with them already, for these were things which made him feel estranged already. His mind was pulled and writhed. It never bode enough with him. Every time he even drew nearer one of those hard, clustered doors, which were already doomed by the lack of working seals I could notice, I could see someone breathing from the other side. He had been obscured or lost to me but I could not fathom looking back for my sake. I felt like I had been taking too much time. 'I came here for another room, but I think I'll keep it.' 'Good choice, constable.' And again the displeasing demeanor. Twenty stranded interlopers had arrived at the gates beneath the distant lands of the uncouth stranded pillars. From what could be made out of it, so many of the had been sacrificed that nothing remained untouched any longer. Strings of indefinable flying bodiless wings had started yearning for the touch of anyone who could take away the gift of flight. It would be unachieved by anyone less than infantile, the children of the passengers who'd cut and breed inside the sickly looking people brought into the world. No one had been prepared for the arrogance of the one darkles peon who swore himself to the darkest of powers. In it, there had been promise for failure and the untouched malign. Destined to be caught and strewn like traitorous swine, the leader of this rebellion who had brought them to the sinking destroyer, the conveyer of dreams and shattered of whims had come to show he erect. His defects were plain for the others to see as they could not distance themselves from the agony he had brought with him. Where his followers saw him as a hero, the enemies saw him true face, a wretched disgrace which had sacked the giant evenly parasitical embodiments of desperation which had come to life in order to save him. Delighted only by his own presence and only by the image of himself, he had surrounded himself by mirrors, to which he'd look and glance, and dance in the state of an indefinable woe, unspoken too, and beaten to a pulp, only by himself. As he would look ahead and claim. 'So much have I endured for you, my people, and yet you're all turning your backs on me. Why is it that you cannot even fathom believing that I'm one of yours. Even now, I can see it in your hearts that you do not believe me.' 'But we do, we do believe you when you say, our best interest is at your heart.' To which he claimed that the only way he could get it from them was if they showed him a sacrifice. No more and no less than a man, which would be taken and repurposed, filled in with the juices of the incest-bred incessant liver-spillers from the grottoes they created. Under his orders they bred them, forcing a king of morose-amount of spines to emerge from their necks, breaching out to infest their own caves until they risked killing themselves by the amount of foolery they started spreading against one another. Despite being tribal and putting the needs of their unity, it couldn't be observed otherwise. A demise of filth would be brought underneath them. As a prize for their waiting, it was surprising how fast they ate one of the men. Even more so, what had been far more surprising had been the fact that under the act of the malign, they had allowed him to survive. Out of their mouth, large extremities of growth, which looked like ever-spreading cheeks to wrench the bone, came onward to push out pieces of him which had been reconstructed out of juicy fat, stored in their back lumps. Those cancers had grown for far too long inside of them, incessantly pushing towards the ends of their lives. Without this sudden release, they would've immediately faced a death. And for the succession, he had been invited to join them. Of course he couldn't return any longer. A dreadful being like it could only wrench itself in the benign ability of strapping itself to a filthier nature of indefinable wretched activities. For it had lost four limbs which got replaced with longer ones, which hadn't been as useful or as conveniently human-looking for him to be accepted back in. Instead, he had crawled on the walls now and appeared to be planting his forgotten servant there, in the heart of stone where no one would be seen. To have been caught in such a manner, in that terminal state through which he had dug his own grave in the ceiling of their grotto was unnerving. A few more members of their rebellion came and looked at how it carried the growths to its children, to which no survivor came. His invitation and life in that new seclusion had not only been limited but ended up being distant and morose. Nothing remained waiting for them there, only the occasional need for sacrifice, to which emerged a new method, near the village they had made. Forges worked constantly not on weapons but on something much greater to be uncovered than anything they could've ever dreaded to desire. In place of their silly humane methods, there lay only the wishful mark of a wretched heart, which spread looking apart. From just about a few uninfected wagers, I could see that I had been afflicted by the same paranoia which started gnawing at my bones. I was aware that a few mistakes had been made. Without a way of trying to disguise one self from the constant blow and the bitter throngs. 'I have found it!' The foul man shouted, in a deceitful lack of awareness, as he could only see himself stare. He had been out there for too long in the wild. Before long he would start communicating with the wild commuters who were hiding in the mist of their forlorn constructions of dirt. Within their grasps they had made giant drains. I could not even think of the most disturbing remnants of skin to which I had succumbed. It couldn't be helped any longer. As I rested on the soles of trees, unfathomably looking within myself for a way out, there were things I started recognizing in my body that shouldn't be there. Like a manta-ray, my eyes and the top of my head began seeing them. Just as I started joining them during their ascension I could see the fornication of the sky spread in the most distasteful manner. My eyes were fathomless ghoulish fiends which began crawling out of my sockets, making it to the point where I could not dread to follow them any longer. This had been their journey to track on, not mine. I could only step now underneath their shadow, looking forth for some way in. I couldn't be spared of anything of my won. This urge I felt, to take my own life had followed through, as I couldn't leave without them. They left me untouched and unclothed, like some desperate creature in search for some warmth. His skin was touched by petulance.

Dragon's tip

I have attempted several times to do this. They haven't given me a choice in the matter before I found myself standing in front of their door, beaten. And that had been perhaps the worst possible manner I could end in. My rubbing alcohol could only be screwed twice now. "They used to call them arm-collars, you know that?" "What for?" "It's because the arteries, they keep popping by the neck, one holds the chain, while the other one holds the collar. It's a cycle of pulling and dragging until one of the men subsides to dying. You wouldn't understand the intricacies which come with it. I know it's far more dangerous than you'd expect, but that's how life used to be. One man would grab himself near the collar, and next, a revolution." The phone rang. I could see it, my eyes were trying to by the dial, but my hands had been weeping for far too long. I was afraid I could lose it one day, if I hadn't paid enough attention to it. But no one seemed to care about the old man working at the mill. It's how they referred to me. "Hey, would you mind if we went for a walk?" "What of the phone?" "The call can wait, just come with me. I won't bite, trust me." His hands were rather stark. I believe I was lost for thoughts, now, I didn't know what to tell him next. Perhaps ask about his family? His friend, well he just came here. Acquaintances usually disappeared in times like there. I could at least contest in by some means. "See anyone you like yet?" "I couldn't, I'm supposed to be meeting someone back home. Well it's not my home any longer, but you understand me, right?" "She's always near them, my family, I think. She's always asking of me and she sends cherry-kissed letters back." "Do you return her letters? You know a young man like yourself shouldn't be busying himself with a woman he may never return to, unless you're planning on marrying her on the way back. When your work is done here in either case." "My work sir, I don't think it's ever going to be over." I could see just how much he had been immersed into them. The streets were actually doing him a greater thing than any of my advices could. He was constantly staring at them, trying to get in as much as a few words could suffice. It broke my heart to almost let him go, but I knew he wanted to change wings. Farther than our own conviction had been the eastern one. In only a few generations, they had managed to catch us from behind. I don't think I'd be able to surmise otherwise my concern for them, as they spread their dominion too quickly. "Turner, do you enjoy looking at their architecture? Do you enjoy looking at the arches and seeing how they rise? What of their golden wheels and their spreading miasma coming from their burnt candles?" "I think I'd like the oriental style. I get drawn to it more and more as of lately, huts the other few days I found myself going nearer their buildings, and sketching." "You fancy yourself an artist now? This may be surprising to you, but I used to want to pursue the arts as well. Not any longer, not that it would matter. It's far in the past now. Turner, I'd, I think I'd like to propose something to you." "What would that be sir?" "Follow me around for a while; I think we may make something out of our trip here." I pointed him towards the highest spot in the eastern wing. He looked at the tip of it, which gave ever the slightest impression of the tail of a dragon resting. If it were up to me, I would get him there, even if both of us had to snick past whatever means possible to get there. So far, I hadn't qualified for being his friend. We were more like sergeant and casket. Speaking of which, my appointment to the Funeral house, I had to inquire about it as soon as I could. "Would you mind telling me whether or not you remember something about a

Funeral home? It was something in the limb of the Funeral services den macabre, no, something much more different than that. What might be the proper name?’‘I think it was Danes Macabrum.’‘Right on time, kid, I knew you’d be able to do it. We’re likely to make a good team on the long run, if you know what I mean. Not to get ahead of ourselves, but I’m still going to keep you down to my promise.’‘What would that be sir?’‘I’m going to take you to the tip of the dragon, Turner; I want you to look back at everything we’ve done over the past few months. I was planning on asking you for, let’s say summaries me what you saw there. But I’m not going to ask that any longer, I think that would offer you better material for your sketches.’‘You really mean that, Hosstrack?’‘Without a doubt, this is the only thing that matters to me. I don’t think I could’ve made it so far without the little people behind me. If you don’t mind now, we ought to attend to some place, right about.’‘Fifteen minutes top sir, just about two streets away.’The hotel Reef du Flour, it acquired a whole new basin for us to come into. My reaches were only going as far as trying to get away from some of my responsibilities at the office. Business takes too much out of a man, nowadays everything’s being obscured by the dust in the streets, the sun of smoke being bussed out for as few as a couple of minutes a day near my place. I didn’t much like it, for a man like with no hobbies, I couldn’t admit to it. But I didn’t care much for the little people, only for him, for this Turner. Truth be told, I envied him. He seems to be up in a boot, doing just whatever he want to, without a single concern for those around him. And I’m supposed to be his boss, the business man, who can’t even get himself to the likes of a kid. He was infuriating me again. Even then, when I hadn’t supposed to be looking back at it, I was lost, for words, for the matter in which I paid no heed to where everyone was trying to sniff in. What a moronic thing to set myself about. I had been desperately trying to teach this boy a bit of culture now. I yearned to show him something he could even boldly grab on. ‘See, as an industrialist, I have been dealing with plenty of young men like you, dreamers I believe you’re called, though I would restrain your titles to something more naive than anything else. Wouldn’t you agree with me Turner?’‘I suppose it’s only that I’m still young, sir, nothing else seems to take me away from my goal in any case.’‘What do you have in mind?’‘It’s something I shouldn’t be discussing wit you out here; I suppose it’s something which ought to be kept in private.’‘Now you got me interested in it. Please go on, I’d like to know.’‘Why, sir, I would like to succeed you one day.’‘Succeeding me now? You can’t be serious? Are you?’Right before the entry to the dragon as well, we were at his mouth and Turner already claimed he had some kind of intention of surpassing me. This kind of arrogance and even, even ambition almost struck me like it came from me, as a young man just like him. I was curious to know more. ‘So how would you replace me now? By growing by the ladder? That can be slow and someone might just cut right through you down the middle. Perhaps a blow to the state that way at least you could stand and dissolve everything I stand for. What will it be, you man? You got my full attention, how would you take me down?’‘I wouldn’t have to do either of those things, sir, because, how I figure it by. You’re simply going to let me replace you, just an heir would.’‘And I suppose I ought to give you my fortune as well, wouldn’t that suffice for something, kid?’The workers around us started laughin’. It was just the right kind of jovial embrace I needed. He had something to him, I thought, he couldn’t lose it, not if he wanted to make it in this world. ‘Well, let me tell you something, you’ve made a great choice in leaving your childhood home. But now, you’re not ready to take my place now; want to know why?’‘If I’m going to make it, I should at least know that, someone like me wouldn’t be able to make it otherwise.’‘That’s a certainty, kid. But listen to this. I’m going to offer you this piece of a device. When it comes to you, don't look back. Whatever you do, don't look back. It may come any day now, it may feel like it's the right thing to turn back and change your mind. But you needn't do it, and you want to know why that is?' 'I wouldn't turn back on my word now; I hope I'm not going to be met by that choice.' 'If you will son, do you still want to know what will happen?' 'Sure, I can take; make me understand what might happen.' 'You'd lose everything you had up to that point and I'm not talking about anything you've lost in value. I'm talking about you as an adult. Coming here was an important choice; you've jeopardized something in order to come here. And turning around will only force you to subscribe to a lifetime of abandonment and broken promises from which you may never be able to come back from. It's a never-ending cycle of trying to run and get away. It's only a matter of time until you'll start considering leaving her, or leaving them for something better.' 'Sir?' 'Turner, your children, your wife, your spouse, whenever you're going to have them, they'll only drag you down, this is the meaning of sacrifice kid. Sometimes you need to take something away in order to give.' I was interrupted by a crossing pedestrian; she was plunging through the street, even though it hadn't been her business at all. 'I'm sorry to disturb you but you strike me as someone who's incredibly sad.' 'I beg your pardon, ma'am; this conversation was supposed to be private. And you were too far away to even hear half of it to understand the context of it.' 'But I've heard just enough. I see you around here, now and then, walking away from your tall building, always with a younger fellow.' 'What's this about then? Am I supposed to feel something? Perhaps I'm being questioned? Accused of something you dislike?' 'Nothing you oughtn't to be ashamed of. But I'd say you've done quite enough now. This kid shouldn't hear this kind of advice now, not while this town hasn't taken his hear yet.' 'Spare me of it now, I'm only trying to shape the new generation of free-thinkers.' 'It's exactly what they call poison for the mouth. Say, Anthony, wasn't it? Would you mind coming with me?' 'I'm sorry but I can't. It's my schedule and all, and there are a lot of appointments I have to take care of.' She wasn't going to turn us away. No, I grabbed him by the arm and dragged him through the mouth. Her expression had been left behind. I could only pay as much as a lip-bite to her before turning away and getting to the stairs. 'Mind your step now, some of these stairs are quite an antique.' For obvious reasons I could not bother myself to get through it. There were several things I hadn't the proper bearing for. A ring for a wedding, a boy to the altar, and a lady to the stopper, but she knew what I was doing. What I had intended all along. It was quite obvious by the flight towards the upper floors that I found myself staring already at the least surmountable scaling I could carry on. I hadn't been well equipped enough to get that far and the kid, he was getting bored. 'We'll switch to the elevator now.' Through the fourth floor already, we waited. It wasn't like me to be staring that often at the walls. But I could at least spare a word for each of the paintings they had placed on the toppers. He liked that, my enjoyment of him being brought to an unfathomable amount. 'Like those?' 'I'd like to paint one day, it should only come naturally, if I'm not to be bothered in the meantime. There's nothing personal here, is there? I could still work and do it.' 'Not with those hands, I'm afraid not. You're not always going to hear the sound of the moon, where liberty leaves, going past the hues. I'm afraid that just like a fleeing muse; you'll find yourself in a state where your hands must have just a bit too many calluses for you to be able to write anything. Don't take that as a bad word. I'm only trying to hand you the benefit of the doubt here, boy. But there's a time and a place for everything and I'm afraid that the time for you to make art is only going to stray away as far as I'm concerned.' 'You don't mean that, do you?' 'Look at this elevator, for example. Do you not like its design? Are its arches not golden, and strapped with circulating waves from one distant end to another? Do you suppose the architect had something of this planned? He had his place and the designer and the sculptor and the painter, all of them put a hand where they could. It may just be that something as unexpected might happen to you as well. Some day you may be given an assignment or two or too many to complete and when it happens, these dreams of yours might be consequential. Do you think an architect could paint that or sculpt that way or even make a shimmering eastern sun like this, even though it's a simple a design as one could find around here. We're only made for so many things in this life, and I don't think it'll work one way or another, if we pay too for us work. Time takes away from bone and from skin. One day you'll find yourself regretting of your choices in case you bit too much than you could chew. I'm perfectly away that no one will look even remotely at you, if you were to pay as much as a bad lip and tell them of your childish endeavors. 'We were inside the elevator before he could say a thing. One hand came on his shoulder, and I almost came to laugh. 'Now I seem to have got you by the collar, now, now, don't pull away, I don't harm you.' But I found it rather amusing that he even considered, so remotely that he could replace me. It was a nice bottle-dream. He could be kept at night by it. If I were even close to. Looking for the eastern sun, the design which almost over-encompassed the body of the dragon, as soon as we'd get near the tail, I could finally make a real move on him. 'I can already say that you weren't made for art. There's something about real beauty you wouldn't appreciate. Don't take this as something personal, but you have a shot. At least I think you do. Just give it away and we'll just work through it. As long as you stare. 'It wasn't fair, as likely as I had my eyes on him; he was still reluctant to give me something. He was too resistant and I didn't like that. For some reason, I wanted to pay him just enough regard to his surroundings. 'Look at everything Turner; everyone specialized into something, while you haven't. What do you think might happen if some of them started slacking? What of the elevator's engineer? What of the painters? Think of the painters? Were they workers or were they trained? Are you trained boy? Not in their craft you aren't, and one day you shall fail on your endeavor to get at it. Don't do that to yourself, unless you want to live under the shadow of greater people. No one in this world will forgive you. I know that no one did that for me. 'There were a few more things I wanted to tell the kid but I think it had been enough. My message had already come across him, in some way. He couldn't exactly try anything even if we were so close to the edges of the building. Unattended even, as there were no portmeanous near the exit; it was more surprising that they didn't even show put on a sign for no trespassing. We were standing just before the great tail itself, which had been strapped just about the end of the front side. Its design had been clearly interpreted by some western sculptors who had done a lot for their like. I wasn't going to comment on it yet, but I think he had taken to himself way too many considerations for one day. 'Keep your head high, and let your forehead sink. You know I wouldn't let anyone come between you and your future and the Wisecrop Due. I'm only trying to make sure that your ambition will know no end. 'Even if it means abandoning everything? What will I become then?' 'Isn't it obvious kid? You wanted to be my heir, you wanted me to allow you entry. Don't act surprised now that you have found out what it means to be that it's not all sunshine rows any longer. This isn't an easy life now. Make do and understand that once you start traversing the street, you won't be able to find yourself looking back. You'll have jeopardized everything you had. Don't look back, not matter what it means. 'But I could see the elevator coming back again. If I could feel just one more touch, I might've prevailed over my senses. She would be here in only a few moments and I knew I wouldn't be allowed to leave. His aspirations were somewhat unnerving. I could feel it just by the way he was shaking. 'The price we have to pay for things like fortune, stability, and a future. There are some things which far surpass them; it knows that once you're here, there's no way back. It's simple.' He was collared, I should know it. My hand was still firmly placed around his throat. He was still tempted by it, but eventually, it was clear he wasn't going to hold any pencil any longer. 'We're stepping away now; I'm not holding you too tightly, am I?' 'I want to go back.' It was plain enough. He wasn't ready, he simply wasn't up for it, and no amount of pushing could get him in the right direction any more than I could. 'She's going to take you away, and you don't want that. I don't want that either. Look down there, isn't this view accommodating to your needs? Perhaps for a few pencils, we could stay here for the rest of the day, and look around it a way in, wouldn't you like that?' 'I would like to go back now.' 'Don't turn around, Turner, she's there. And she's not alone. I'm giving you this chance to abandon all of these, while we're at the edge of the dragon. And the winds won't bother beating away from the west now. Isn't it calm now? Can you hear the sirens signings down by the eastern sea?' But I ought to have known better. He wasn't prepared for it, not in a single bit. I was trying my best, to, even consider letting him go. No one deserved that kind of life, one filled with regrets. The type of life which doesn't matter.

Chapter 1

From atop his plains

Down from his mountains of decay, where filth ran across what had remained, rested the face of Agamemnon. His servants waited, readily giving their lives to join the mounds formed in his name. His head stood like a beacon on that place as a leper that connected to an effigy of infatuated girth. At the base of it, dissected rows and many flows of living locust swarms gave birth from interlocked blows to nets, near-like pests, as a sign of pestilence control. The world fell after turning to Agamemnon, once a man who ruled his kin under ill-will. His past looked back at him unkindly, while trying to keep itself alive. After countless strikes at his hearth, he wouldn't fall. The remnants of human-looking mongrels mixed with inflated lungs manifested near the mountains. They pulsed with beats until they hadn't any blood left in them. In their puissance, they feared that something kept their minds locked.

Those lungs had overgrown; cracked their ribs, uniting their bodies with the phosphorus gas until they developed their infected stingers. Patches of skin overlaid their fingers, growing inwardly in an attempt to induce paralysis. All their weight was redistributed to their backs, heads, lower legs, so they would be dragged on both sides and bent in form like bridges. In a mad approach to paranoia the weaker fell as there was a retreat of the misplaced organs inside each lurid spot they owned. Their lungs became their prisons after growing to be the size of giant Zeppelins. From inside of them, bombs of decay would often drop without immediately imploding. Instead, they shot a plethora of limbs, all of which were similar to malformed wings. Agamemnon had seen his children rise and flee, as they let go, they started acting like cockroaches, flying towards the other planes beyond the rims of his reality. It couldn't be helped that they'd be there, underrepresented and drawn to the cores of the flying metal birds they chased. One giant indefinite creator stood there, waiting in its invisible spot, encased in a dying blanket from which his prey could never fall out of once inside. He waited for them to arrive before abandoning his veil.

The sight hadn't been that of a tyrant but some transparent spinning illusion similar to an inter-conical vortex which drew inside of it every remnant of the living that reached it. Without a stranger's paragon in mind, they joined his insides, in that small plane accursed by many different shades and features which were ill-formed. Sharp noses became beaked, poking at their very own eyes while filling themselves with robust lashes, formed mouths, teeth erupting with living men encased in their own strange stones. Broken and unnerving, inside of them, stood the threat of eruption and birth giving to a form of terror that would devour everything in its path. Pure agony could be seen inside that creator as he revealed himself as a filthy scoundrel, a parasitical defender of its own kind, a predator of the most ubiquitous matter. It desired to close the sides of the chamber, enclosing itself with as many of those children he took with him. And there had been a few of them, as much as billions in number.

Defilers, who joined the flight couldn't help it now but be drawn in like moths. Many other similar predators revealed themselves as they had lain in waiting. An observer couldn't help but wince as they kept drawing in and devouring as many of the children as they could. This process was the end of humanity in its last surviving form. Below, the planet looked like a desolate Mars, with an addition of ever-green and in-between, shades of purple, teal of the most disturbing kind, colors which would turn the on-looker blind. And every living being had been allowed to live for him who reigned above them all, Agamemnon the filth. Though he rests unmoving in his dreadful manor, he waits insisting on his decaying harbor. Seas were filled with a magnificent green tint and from within, came the giant. Headless, toeless, armless, the Colossus had arrived. He was in a desperate need to find his master. A head would trump and thumb and snap as it was destined from on top the mountain.

A peculiar observation could be drawn from it a swell. In the giant's empty hand there stood a hole which lead to a hollow placed filled with burnt toes. As a result of it, his body ended up being frozen as the many toes began digging their way out. They were longer than they appeared, drawing out like spears from his every side, spouting and shooting in every corner of the sea before he fell down and bled. Sorrow followed afterwards.

Yet their lord did not cry because of him but because his children were being trapped and eaten alive, and he was powerless to stop it. With the little force he had kept to himself, he turned to the inwardly overlapped growths inside his girth where he attempted to grow the next generation of living breeds. His mind may have been marked by attrition, but his brain was still connected to everything inside the world.

And there he'd be the strongest. The breeds developed twisted torsos, outgrowths that stretched from atop their heads; impaired maxillae with filled out beady reeds from behind their heels that wormed out and dazzled. It was obvious that they struggled to remain alive. Eventually, they would be driven out in the open to face the worming fat produced by the sun and the many heads outside its surface. Instead of growing with its fumes, they pushed forth a pink light which barely stretched out to reach him.

It could only be felt as the star-like corruption pushed it out of its lumps of fat. Perhaps in its inner depths, a shrunken red dwarf manifested itself, giving away heat so the lumps could grow.

A piece of the planet widened at the ground level, using the manifestation of more loyal ancestors to distract the great ruler from staring at the light.

He was mesmerized by the dance of the new comers who arrived before the evil set of births had been accounted for. By the law of the land, they were to be accepted despite not being functional. They did not move but put on a great play. These sickly-looking dancers were so distracting that the lord of evil malignancies gave them an utmost mesmerizing gaze he bore.

From both circular ends, shivers were sent, pushing through then not as if to cry but to generate enough force that they wouldn't be shackled. An entire valley rested underneath the pocket of the vile grounds. It couldn't be overlooked, as no eye cared enough to pay attention to what was going on there. Unfortunately, many eyes were displaced from their positions. They've been abandoned by their mad users in order for them to move through the deepening cowl that got raised around the planet.

It was clear that this mountainous deity had no intention of allowing his children to flee towards their deaths. Far too innocent and naive, as they were, primitive, as they could be deceived; they had to be forced back before they ended up being devoured. So many broken cries were felt, lost in the echo of space.

Whatever happened in those mouths and in their chambers was completely concealed, but this prestige of destruction would not last forever. As the great spans of the planet's lips finally enveloped the world, the inner lights of the underworld shone upon its shell. With a great deal of effort, many of the fliers were saved from their perilous flight. Billions of them had no other option but to still their ascent.

Mollusk-men emerged then. With them joined the sheltered heads that had their faces expanded and rounded as to act like smiling helmets acting mildly interested in the fact that they saw from their two dimensions such a perfect creature that resembled them. Those were the first two who had arrived. Now within the lock of filth, where arrogance was mild, wicked minds escaped the heads of many of the inbred from below, revealing themselves as they escaped. Unnerved by the creation of their uninterested misaligned and altered bodies, these floating brains grew eight times in size and seemed benign as they each searched for a pile of filth of their own to get attach to.

They desperately wanted to imitate their mad lord. Though they had no faces and no protection, as they underwent the transformation, their limitless potential went to waste after being completely absorbed and wasted. A kind of irreversible damage followed as every brain cell and every axon, the white matter and both lobes had underwent the equivalent of a supreme kind of self-cannibalization resulting from sleepless eternities. None may claim to know the like. None dare defy the light. Many extensions from the valley started pillaging tunnels with their worm-like long extensions. Evenly spread, they would be pushed through and tortured to some grim extent over the fact that no one wanted them to live. They dug through the long expanse, hurting the land in the process, but they managed to spare the light far enough for their effort.

Only the purest illumination could shoot through the various loops of dark that loomed around them. Even they were affected, as they grew solid and floated in the solid mass of dark. As the light drew forward they revealed themselves as frightened creatures who were trying to get out of sight.

Look how they came in even after I made it clear they weren't welcome here. But they weren't there. Paranoia only brought the conviction that those space devourers managed to get in.

Malady spread, the light grew erect, and with the help of it the pools gave life to a new batch of sea grinders. Those fat delinquents bore their fish skin and fish-fat until their antlers came out. They spoke the first words they bartended with.

'Give us the heat of this man.'

The other creature noticed the shark head this one bore, from underneath a sack that stored enough fat to fill its many limping legs that sprouted out of it. As he drew nearer, he took out a small manta-ray book in order to check what he was in need of. A set of paragraphs remained unchecked. Words were written but they mixed with spew. His small head barely crawled out of its nest only when the deal was struck. Before he knew it, the other stander with his flat fleet-fish legs pulled a tail-bone too quickly for him to notice. He didn't stand a chance to defend himself before he dropped flat on the ground, leaving his egg sack undefended before getting crushed by the same evil creature who took his life in the first place.

It amused their overlord who looked kindly on such acts of cruelty. After all, he fought not for the glory of the kill but because it wanted to smuggle his eye-pearl. It was another displaced trinket, speaking of which. To his annoyed temperance, none dared respond the call he on them. His younglings had been flying ever since they had evolved into those floaters. Staying out of the light's reach hadn't been easy for them.

One moment, from beyond the garden, underneath the collar of used necks, into the stringed flying torsos, which choked after each flap, there was one evolver, a master of organic acceleration. Underneath the blind gaze of his one filthy apple-organ, he transformed the cells beneath him into growths of terror, standing filthily erect.

Like triangular spinners they opened their mouths revealing many pair teeth of seething filth. Each of them replaced the other as soon as one matured, being forced to connect one another through string after string after string of disease. Their tubes pushed on needlessly gnawing through their bodies, carrying various heritable infectious diseases which were pushed inside their offspring. As they became aware of their destruction, they started eating their children. Someone had to spare them from that conegnity forced inside of them. Growing only brought pain. But it hadn't been accounted for, as this sudden inclination to hide their wings suppressed all of their pain receptors.

Though they would spread, otherwise dead, evil would still grow without them. Their younglings danced inside their guts, they danced inside their swollen mouths, spreading their bodies in every direction they could. It was unnerving to watch but the progenitor, the castrator of dreams, maker of nightmares finally revealed himself. And he bore four corners of diseased cloths turned into boarded wings, which held some rooted potato-textured formed chrysalis of skin, bloated yet eyeless as it threw out its gaze. It was as if every single living molecule suddenly imploded in them pushing forth many tendrils and evil ways through which the tunnels formed from their bodies, attaching themselves to that same damp cloak the winged evil wall wore. From inside of it there came a coiled serpent-like tube which brought him saline-light in defiance.

But those creatures weren't affected by his sight. Only the lowest and the most inhumane would be affected by the acceleration growth. One eye of evil threw itself forth from the diseased sea finding a hole in the ceiling through which it could fall.

Obviously the mildly pronounced acceleration threw forth such a deflected array of pores that they blew one another to nothing short of a supreme destruction. Therefore and thereafter, the sea spilled and throttled, drowning the swimmers during their sad attempt at hiding. Pure evil dripped from above then stopped. Now he deflected himself on the pool and the various things, the creatures and the fiends finally swam safely. But forth, inside of it, there was an opening to a small slit that some of the inhabitants of the land ended up spilling in. Bubbles formed inside the pools as the flow of muck slowly passed through the living cut, slowly inflicting agony upon its very nature. The pool stopped being a pool down there. In the poorly dim light, in that empty room where the creature referred to as the Accelerator stood in, many egg-sack like formations loomed inside the dirty water.

'I see that many of you sitting down there, inside your pool; I know you can hear me. I won't be fooled so easily by your defiant nature. Look back to your madly corrupted minds and throw yourselves forth so I may see you clearer.

Break through your living prisons and crawl at my command. After you have presented yourselves to me, I shall give you bodies such as this world has never seen.'

And it smiled there, or at least it turned its deformed sack of a grin into such forms that none may recognize what it attempted doing. No man would see it as a grin, but as a nest of termites pushed on as their kingdom rose. Malady spread. A diseased cretin-spore jumped out of the pool, suffocating its desire to please itself with hope of some feature that might emerge out of its ugly face. Its barely visible eyes grew red while the vision blurred. Soon it would be dead if no one took pity as to cur its suffering or give it what it wanted.

'I bestow upon you the name of Aeugeoupuous.'

Then, its body grew immediately, for no longer would it die to exposure.

But something was going on inside the creature. Its many filled-out lids shaped themselves like plane-walkers, or lily-pads made out of whitely spread tubes that held it from ascending. And its torso looked like a fat finger, while its forehead turned into a bunch of caterpillar blobs, slowly splitting on two sides, until two heads came out bearing two evil eyes on either side of them.

A white liquid sprouted continuously out of them which shot endlessly through the maddening conflagration of heat they produced. This abomination wanted to spare the others.

‘Blasphemy, why is it that my creations are infested by empathy? Why would you care about them? You were made to suffer like the rest of them, through one form or another. Everyone here is. No one is spared from this agony we’re all forced to endure under him, who looks down upon us all from his palace of filth in his mountain mad. Can’t you understand?’

Dumb and irrational, filled with hatred and fear, this disturbance may never be accounted for. I feel the fleeting terror and the clouds of emptiness drawing north.’

This one shot both of its means of destruction down. It was something which may never be forgiven, the destruction, an end of torment. The torrent which followed drew itself back. He hadn’t been the cause of it, but this other contender submerged its own spit, which acted like a malignant acid. It burned skin and skull, as the mass of his entire being fell prey to complete decay before he evaporate into nothingness. The curved sky exposed itself to the second coming blunder that assaulted the kingdom of lurid pleasures.

Before one could look away, a submarine had emerged to reveal, the survivors of a lost era that was never meant to last.

As the bones cleaned the guts many limb leeches fell below.

‘But that can’t be.’

Said a hooligan with two snots, a bad fellow in the mountain, brought to anxiety, at last.

‘What is it?’

A mouthless limb asked as it extended to reveal its muscle core as well as the filled triceps which had pus in them. The limb was only heard as it spoke in the dead of the night. This hooligan hadn’t been a mad creation but the reanimated remains of a quasi- absorbed brain. Such an ill thing would never be asked to do anything at all. The various overlapping realities could finally be seen by common-eyes. Many of them fell upon one another as bio-particles after the cognition born out of the parasitical symbiosis between Agamemnon and the brain gave birth to a mutation that enabled them to see the other realities.

It was a psychedelic vision through which they were seen as visions of blue-marine, an ultra dimensional view so obscure that many alternatives couldn’t survive for long. But this connection between their entire entities and the overlord became permanent.

It wasn't that Agamemnon became a unique entity, but that its mind and personality connected through so networks that he became an anchor. And that anchor took and pulled back in its world that which was lost. The many children which flew their way out had been brought back. All of those dimensions had been locked entirely because of his pettiness to give life to his supreme desire of taking care of them. They were his, flawed, but he owned them nonetheless. Tears came out of his eyes, yellowish-green, tinted in-between. He looked expressionless though, as a mask would.

Dark, filled with pox or rabies, leprosy or something of the kin, smaller than that of a normal man, a hair which looked like clay, a flattened nose which drew in both directions to a saddened mouth. On his right eye there stood a rounded growth which covered his putouts lid. An epicanthic fold grew and overtook the other one, leaving him blind. But his mind, though his face acquired a decaying pose had seen it all. All of them would be spared. It had to be that way, he wagered.

In his world of birth the submarine revealed that it made out of his precious metals. Inside of it there were the men, all of whom were lost again as the last hope for humanity emerged in fear. How could he hope to protect those frail primates that emerged out of their tin bottle? Suits like those repulsed him but the mad would sing again. His deprave choir brought the morbid into action. He begged for a reaction.

At least, do something, act, say, move, get out of the way. Can't you see what has become of your world? Isn't it clear that I irreversibly ruined it? You, of pure breed are not welcome here any longer. Yet, I see you arrived with hopes of rejuvenating life in this desolation.

Ghastly painted and seemingly metallic, spherical helmets flattened on their sides. Breathing devices began injecting their lungs as both of the first explorers got revealed. Farther than the pity, beneath the valley underneath the pines of many raised liquorish hairs, there stood the dark, where the dark remained. It was a nasty place of refuge for those dark fiends where their tendrillites had flown to. Each one of them nested into one another's embrace whilst defiling their own bodies forcefully into the brace. They hid like rats in there, flying in a pack. Using their heat they nested in that place and waited to be called upon. It was a lost vision how well it felt like dying. Farther away from them, there was an arch-reactor that instilled numbness in all of his children who hid beneath the ground.

A sharp noise which cut through the core of living tastes rested there. An alloy of disturbing tubes produced enough carbon dioxide through its skin-device to poison the nearest emerging species. Its red skin bore thump-like formations devoid of any malefic energy. Life desperately attempted to emerge despite Agamemnon's best attempts to preserve them in their infantile state. It was rather hard and unnerving. Nothing emerged from there, other than that strange conglomeration of acids. In one dimension it went as planned, while in the other there'd be none. The reactor started pushing forth and slamming against the ground with its giant mandible-like tatter. With each push, it managed to set back the constant distribution of biochemical materials needed for their growth. Whatever it was doing or setting ahead, this need would have to be earned.

If they wanted to hatch and populate this plane of decrepit existence, they would have to outdo every other mad living being out there. Otherwise, there'd be no any redemption their malignant kind could have. Despair came over the one who flew away and hid forever.

But Agamemnon was not interested in them any longer. Now he looked through as many realities as he wanted to without the fear of intimidation instilled by his wicked children. He controlled the rules inside realities as well as the tools needed to put every one in their places. No one would be allowed to set off the ground any longer. Many worlds ended up being overpopulated by them and it worked just well. Everything would be in its place. One quarter of a flying reeking foulness shaped itself out of nothing. From eight turns or many curls, there leaped the figures of some big primate-like vertebrates, the bodies of which imitated leg-straightened grasshoppers. Their curled legs weren't made of extended pieces as they lacked strong connections; instead, they had looked like they had been forced into the wild appearance of leashed whips.

And their small bulging faces revealed the pipe-like syndrome which spewed dark words of confusion that could only be heard by mutes. Ten such mutes existed across the planes, in one of those realities where the only life which reigned had been that of a decrepit snow they lingered in. Cold encompassed everything in its path, where gusts of winds couldn't pass the deranged activity of the North. But their resistance to that wave of sub-standard living faded away. A wave of deranged activities succumbed to the will of the winds. Frozen solid, lain on the ground, they had been widespread and placed upon beds of highly shrouded clay curtains. Giant monoliths of ice dwarfed the sight, as the frost turned the insides of the living spheres encompassing everything into an ice cave; a cage of solidified remains spared no consequence for this master. Moreover, the hairs turned into fur and in that world, the mountain being largely coated by it. Warmth remained but nothing moved there. It was the last remaining cold pocket in that universe.

Even the Colossus survived after taking the appearance of a headless, handless ape with its white fur line pushing out as the many worming spears froze within its blood, never to escape again. This was his realm now. And the overlord only watched as this clumsy creature slipped and cracked. As this distraction took him away the humans, or whoever those were already made their first contact with his land. A disastrous sight emerged. They had no intention to wage a war against the terrors of this world. Not while they had so much to lose. Outside the plane under Agamemnon's rule, the many fiends of space shared between themselves what they took in that short period of time. It was undeniable that there was an unnatural feel in this mad appeal they kept to themselves.

All of the Aggrippaes soon emerged. They were jealous of one another, or so it seemed. They taunted themselves, different in terms of how they've been. As in their iterations some had hated, even tortured and dismissed their makings with delight. Would they show mercy? One had to wonder.

Elsewhere human renegades belonging to some mad appearance pushed forth their bone-like appendages as they filled with green liquor taken from the nearest muck. Some inter-dimensional force pushed on, destroying their insides until nothing was left in them. Many holders lay abandoned, waiting for some wicked embrace. No longer were they members of any race, now that their insides were liquefied as they spewed on the ground. In that act of pertinence, their densities evolved while their ability of flight was taken away from them. Their consciousness only moved in those mixed remains as they stirred to the point of exhaustion. From them sprouted the seed of uncertainty.

‘A vile act from one of us no less. It has to be him, or him or every single one of you. One could go ahead and have himself checked for such things.’

And each one of them did it in part. They would constantly look through their minds for defects. As soon as they learned of this trick of the mind and the growth of the brains they were set on a path of no return. This bridge between their worlds was forced to a permanency, which required not only supreme control but no deficiency to slow everything down.

Inside every mountain, there was a connected mass of guts and lashes, many swirling tender patches, dreary ever-growing veins, moving in unfathomable ways. They kept unity and the constant flow to the point of meat becoming tender the deeper you went to his land’s core. In it, he stored his most dangerous of substances. All of whom had been mixed together, giving life to a new kind of uncontrollable bile exasperation. What was meant for it was that one day Agamemnon would submerge inside his own mountain, dwelling and swelling below the point where it absorbed the essence of everything that’s ever grown or died on his plains and then he would be reborn. A new body would wait, one which has no arms, no legs but a long and plain contortion with many roots which would shoot through every planet in as many universes, dimensions and realities as possible. It would be a control that may never end, a complete destruction resulting in the annihilation of everything pure and stable. And what was the cause of it?

Why, a simple mutation in the days when he had been a man. Result of inbreeding, diseased, mentally unnerved unquenched, to the point whence self-control faded and he gave in. No longer able to grab a hold of the disease which quenched its stable mind, he became a monstrosity in time blind. A rotten bull-fair cephalopod body with long antlers and the coloration of a white-nerve disease sprouted out of its two heads, which pushed forward longer tails that should’ve been inside its body. They weren’t hard by the looks of it, but must’ve gained some bulk out of the hot air they produced from their occupied lungs.

]

Inside that big body, there lay broad hornet horns on the back, scales and tiny gaps where air came in but never went out. Fright and emancipation of the lower creatures could be held to its mad account. After it, there trailed many barely-formed limping fiends which attached themselves as well as their organs akin to some deep-sea anglers to form parasitical pool spreaders.

This creature had been followed by many similar ones, who appeared in one of the many worlds, with a deep and thorough desire to spread the pool in as many directions as it could. Their bodies hadn’t had air; it seemed, as the degenerate himself noticed. It had been a miss observation which couldn’t have been abandoned or forced to some obscurity at bay.

Well enough, they created a mixture inside their lungs by forcing them to squeeze their very essence in order to prevent them from drowning. They couldn't breathe below there, nothing could. But this new floating liquid appeared to be feeding itself with the air.

It couldn't be forgiven either, the fact that as much of a mess as it's been, this encased world would be drowned and worse, it could leak inside the very core which needed its own self in order to survive. A morbid approach came.

He begged and would suffer no other one, to know of this. As it came to him, to take one dark and final decision before he would be drowned in his plane he spoke.

'Aid me in my time of need and I shall not forsake you after. Many of you are strong, eternal, immortal and commanding. But I am not. My mountain is frail, my veins are tiny and obscure, and I cannot help it but be looked down upon by my own creations now.

Thought we're of the same breed and let me tell you this. If there's a need, if you want to lead yourselves to self destruction do no aid me. In that case, know that you shall each eat one another and end up witnessing your children die.

Or live forever in an empty plane, without scope, without any distribution of your filth, and be alone, stand alone, looking forever in jealousy of the others.'

This desperate plea was answered. As wicked as those creatures were, and whispered as to make any other being there be aware or look in awe, they still had their weakness prodding from afar. Anatomy is damned, as it would only show the piece of its head which lay exposed. To the many progenitors, the evil incarnate, the many petty ones, who looked at those weak creatures, now came.

And they manifested with the help of their minds, small sphere, spiked and made out of some brass. Many brains popped and snapped in an instant. Many threats neutralized as they fell from up high, they flattened themselves as the pools solidified.

'I see you're trying to prevent any kind of uprising. I am pleased by that and could only ask that you may continue.'

Why, the many faces of Agamemnon took a liking in him. They saw him like some primitive child in need of coddling. He needed to be protected under any cost, without exception and without giving them any chance to try taking him down. Even the slight chance would be inadmissible.

The many half-creations, the barely formed human being which were supposed to emerge had been chained and forced to kneel to the mountain. Serve and pray to the mountain. Stand there, as he would be safe. A few attempts of self-cannibalism came but found themselves far too flawed for anything to happen then.

Teeth got immediately replaced with some soft braces which prevented any kind of damage from happening. And their attempts would not only be stamped down but so would their bodies. Muscles mass wouldn't be permitted, atrophy followed. Intelligence was dangerous, make them mindless.

Growth had been impeded, puberty wouldn't be allowed. Any kind of sharp angle, flight and light which may damage the eyes couldn't be established either. Every single one of the Agamemnones had done something to prevent the harm. Such harm would be dangerous and couldn't be allowed.

Too many sights could confuse him, henceforth; he had been cut off from the main consciousness. But he would be allowed to listen, only to soft whispers at intervals. Silence would be right, as long as there wasn't any noise of any distraction.

It would be right.

It had to be.

It would've been so.

If it weren't for the deranged mind of him, the mighty precursor of punishment who had been made aware of their attempt, which made him proceed. Everywhere around him, grew like small empty transparent calluses which encompassed every kind of organic matter there was.

The sight had been disgusting and disturbing. The lanterns of the damned had been shelled and hidden for far too long. Now they emerged and got carried, towards the first men during the arrival. IT was obvious that they had to be seen and looked out for what they were, a disturbing image and then, there was the disturbing act.

From those big piped dreamers with their legless floating stacks of meat tied underneath their blue-tied wings, from which sprouted clouds of dark which had been only those dark fiends which hid in the dark, suddenly the lanterns glowed. And in them, the unknown defiance of the organs spoke. Many of which malfunctioned and seemed to be aware that they could escape and be granted freedom if they tried...

One such liver, long and twisted, forlorn and mangled, purplish and red, fat at the neck came out of a hole from the big formed flat container which bore all of those pipes. It had been already been granted that there wasn't enough room in there for all.

But it was heavy and fell flat, squashing on the bottom rag of the hard floor. It died there, wreathing before it gave in. After what had been brought to those men was a need to trade. They were good at that. Though they hadn't any arms or legs or anything other than their wings, pipes and lanterns, they carried only the best in line.

One such dark creature, stared in form, of shadow tendrils which groped and appeared, now came to reveal itself to the man. For such a monstrosity, it had been gentle. It had no interest in harming the man, seeing how he was frail and in hiding.

His suit was there, swollen in the moisture caused by the atmosphere. Seeing how their overlord got distracted by his visions which had only been revealed by his twists which delved deeper into the sockets, now they came with what they had.

A robe and a tatter of some material had been placed on the ground, only so it could be clean down there. Many things were placed by then, stones, dirty bones, crystal formations, some weapons from the distant part, remnants of buildings and what not.

Before the men could realize what was going on they turned on their speakers and carried on.

‘We have an understanding, don’t we? You can speak English can’t you?’

‘Trade now; give us blood, human blood, moist blood, your sanguine supply. Anything from an ear, fingers, finger nails, that as well.

We’ll take hair, and skin, as well as bones, clean human bones. Children if you have, yes, that will be worth more.’

There wasn’t any mouth from which that could’ve come from. No opening either and no way that it could’ve known it that well. Only one possible explanation could come from it.

‘You used to be a human, right?’

This thing of yours, this’ a next step of evolution?’

‘No, I want to become one. I need everything which makes a man, part of brain, blood, growth, everything which you have underneath.’

He was reluctant to hear and even more to reveal what had been underneath the suit. If he had opened it and revealed what lay beneath, there’d be no doubt that this transaction would end. And they seemed not only able but capable of doing some damage.

‘I shall give you until the birth of the moon there.’

One tendril had been pointed above. Some side project of the defiler had been presented in its lurid state of conception. Several wombs lay there, levitating, feeding one another. They would constantly feed one another the life they’d give birth to, going through several processes of regurgitation.

It was obvious that the children would be given death as soon as they would be fed the bodies of their siblings from inside the other wombs. And that formation of calcatrite rock would only bear inside the many bodies which would never die but form man broken consciousnesses.

Already many of the piped creatures had been staring and waiting for their servant to make trades.

By the time the explorers had been done observing what was going on around, two more worming glow-tubes had arrived, as they had become aware that they were in some desperate need of concentration. A damning event had come. It would be there.

And that had been enough. Be aware of what's going out there. They would stare and they would wait, as it happened, the explorer went back inside their submarine, thinking. Inside lay the last remnants of normality, the last vestige of there being rightness in the world.

In there, order reigned supreme, rightness and benign. Drawing forth, through step after step, one could draw from there the basics, a small operating table, four sleeping chambers, an electronic device for the carbon emission detection, a spiraled handle for direction, simple painted walls in aquamarine and a head.

There was a head, a human head. And it was reanimated, or looked like it. Unfortunately, it was merely a decoration which stood there, brainless but staring. Mainly, it had been used for some kind of mockery for whoever came to the side and decided to make him scream. Implants made it so he'd shout and scream if it was needed.

No warning would be heeded for the likes of the many conveyer belts which constantly droned around the chamber. A disaster was on its way. More crew-men awoke.

'What are we going to do now? Our world is gone. I don't think it's worth living through it now.'

The doors had already been closed, making it so they wouldn't be heard anymore. The phonetically encumbered speech had given them a quick reveal.

What they pulled out of their masks had been nothing other than the exposed filled with structure skulls and bodies of bone-like tat they wore underneath. All of them were that, that's what human kind had become. Their organs and their brains and muscle mass had shrunk themselves so much that they would be encased inside their own carapace. But they were no human any longer.

The bones weren't placed right. And they had grown fat, almost to the very point where they inflated themselves into a mass of bone-matter which hid away every gap which had formed the insides of a living being. If one were to pull away what had been inside, he would see only the utmost disturbance of the living, an abomination per full blunt force.

From the cracks which had been made by age, there came out only what had become a slime-like almost slug-like in appearance, covered organs which had been drawn in and curved, curling inside. They had matured so much that they spewed some white transparent filth from their organs

But not only sluggish as they had been oozing like some living sponge than a slug. It only gave the appearance as to lend itself some frame of reference, as this creature was not affected by salt nor mortar either. These newly excavated human beings could only see themselves as what had remained of the human kind. So many shades of light grey arose from not only their bodies but the insides of their suits that they almost glistened to the point of glowing.

An indescribable force bred out of the radiance came to be.

‘We shall go ahead and master them no matter what the cost it. Though he may not be them, we are their legacy and we shall carry on our might and power what they gave us.’

‘Settle down now, before you go on your righteousness path of awe, make sure you alert the rest of us who emerged.’

‘Commander, you have awoken.’

As the suits released it, he had revealed the plasticity and the complete obliteration which had occurred inside his chamber. That had been the complete destruction of his head and insides, which left behind the solidified remains left by his bones and insides, mixed with the part of the suits. All of them, from that generation had been in a similar fashion.

Tiny slithers of skin remained, pushed and drawn inside like some weird taps. It would be obvious that their oblivious sides would be directly emerging from one another as they’d grow. And grow they would, until that very moment when the entire helmet would be full.

There was nothing to keep them inside, this violent thing occurred, the insides had been pushed into a pool below while upwards there stood the shrapnel of bones. Many pieces would act like a shield, but the legs and the arms had been filled with the insides as well as the liquid which kept them cold.

Curiously, the rest of them weren’t as surprised or shocked by this turn. Why, they even imagined that this would be the same way in which they’d end up like. Their weird lenses, peculiar approach only made it so they’d understand that eventually, if that had been the next stage, they would abandon their human bodies and become those moving concoctions of soft tissue which was spiked with bone.

Others came out the same and it would look like the two of them were the only human-like in appearance that there’d be.

‘So this is it, huh? This is the end of humanity. I expected it to be grander, perhaps a great desert of a valley of trees which grew and the animal life having taken over. But not this.

I feel like I have died and ended up in this place.’

The artificial voice said, without the inflections of a man. Looking at it while being aware of everything human kind had achieved was not only an insult but the very sign of dread he wanted to feel wreathing out of his very soul.

No, that hadn’t been it. In that place, each of them felt soulless. There weren’t any living human beings there left as to compare themselves with. Instead, one couldn’t help it but retreat into a plight of fear.

A deceitful of humanity, this is what it had been. Somehow they had been betrayed.

‘What waits for us past those gates?’

‘Flying monstrosities brought by their living containers, on a world which had been misaligned and assimilated by this living substance, that’s what it is. I’m afraid there’s nothing there waiting to be regained.’

‘So, why are we still here, then?’

I can’t stand this. Look at what we’ve become. I remember a time where the human kind had been on a path of ascension. But that had been taken down.

There’s nothing I fear more than the future now. Look at it, all of it is dull, untouched by beauty. We’re surrounded only by the ugliness and the alteration of what used to be right.

No wild flowers, no tall skyscrapers, not even the light of day. We’re not even spared the pleasure of being human, like we fancied ourselves several generations ago.’

‘You don’t imply we should sink ourselves, do you?’

‘I do not believe there’s another option. After this, know that there can be no turning back, there’s no life out there, there’s nothing we can do, we have no other option than to sink.’

‘Shall we end it then?’

‘Not yet, if we give in, we shall be assimilated inside of it. Bid time be, I shall make something out of it then.’

Obviously caught, the pseudo-docks emerged as to wrap themselves around the wreckage their submarine had been. It would be that in the moment, an obscure kind of degenerate act could only act in defiance of one self. They would be repurposed and reused as some kind of malignant verse.

Father than that, in the universe affected by the complete systemization of the growing prison which emerged from the living tissue formed in air, there appeared to be some case of emergency which made him aware of what was going on there.

Small clasps of long linen flaps of skin emerged and grew, spreading until everything was covered by then. That weird and flaccid prison that appeared out of nowhere seemed important for some reason.

One of the Agamemnonas was pleased. Now everyone would be safe. As long as they were imprisoned and unable to escape from their cages, then there'd be no threat to deal with. No one would be forced to flee in terror any longer. It could be seen as a nothing but dispersion.

All the accumulated filth had done too much damage to his mind. That was one of the consequences of being mentally aware of it and brooding on it for so long. A part of his consciousness travelled through every living tissue, atom and living formation.

They communicated with him as such a system that there couldn't have been a way of knowing any better.

The supreme act of self incarceration has been carried on by the being known as the Colossus. Know throughout an eternity of endless other worlds, this being had never succeeded getting away from its fate. It had always failed in some manifestation and another to achieve what it had desired, that being obtaining the head of Agamemnon and finally being complete.

This failure had him be unable and not dependable on anything else but this choice he had taken in one world. Instead of chasing that desire it had presented itself in need for, it chose to suddenly kneel in the basin. Both arms charged inside its body and as that happened; it looked like no spear-like formation had ever left it afterwards.

In other realities, there had been no infestation, but a way to impede this thing had come into being. Either one arched sting would appear out of nowhere and impale the body, preventing it from moving forwards, or something much worse than that. By means of expulsion, there had been that unquestionable desire to overcome one self.

It couldn't be escaped. Either way it could be looked at; there wasn't any way to defeat it. Some suddenly inflicted blow would puncture its neck holder, destroying the only chance it would have to make something out of itself. Or, it would be that the hibernation had taken a tool and suddenly, the body would break in multiple pieces bred out of the weight which had been unevenly split.

But that had still been attempted. To the end of whatever had been the cause of it, this one Colossus had resigned itself to a fate he shouldn't have been made aware of. And that petty Agamemnon, in his world of agony seemed to have an every-growing desire to have this one for its own. Nothing mattered more than that, the desire to be brought into question and likens of the thing.

Hardly looked upon, he couldn't help it at all. One desire had been born out of it. It wanted it for its world.

'Am I not the one who started it all? Who was the one who started this inter-dimensional connection if not I?'

Danger ran and he couldn't fight it any longer. There was that humiliating thought that kept itself there, the desire to be given what it wanted. Only the grandest and vilest of versions had to be exchanged. From one world he came and into it, this one who had been dead. By now, only some pieces of its Colossus remained, but the trade had been made.

And it was grand. He looked like a piece of a trophy, which made it so it didn't matter not would it falter to what happened there. Clearly, he would despair.

It had been there, nothing. After looking through some many versions and so many visions of everything, there was quite the obvious observation. Despite infinity, there hadn't been a variety of change.

Everything looked like it had been the same. About everywhere, without a doubt, they had all achieved that perfect shroud of protection and complete dominion over their worlds, but what then? Agamemnon was bored. They all felt the same.

By the time he had looked into his own world, there wasn't anything important to note. He had mixed about every being there to the point where even those who had been given birth afterwards could give form to an already existing offspring from any previous generation.

Since they all shared the same genetic code that would be pointless. And they hadn't thanked him, or any of them.

Even those explorers had shelved themselves in. Agamemnon was a captor; he was nothing less than a supreme trapper. But the alternative, he'd have to see it through.

As soon as it happened, he opened this dome of skin, his magnificence having faded. This self-destructive impulse came out of the fact that there was still a desire of chaos. It made him betray his own children immediately and without remorse.

There he waited and he looked above as the many space traps had been laid, as they would give in to being eaten and being beaten and having taken to themselves to die off. So many of them flew like dumb beings directly into the same routine. That had been it as well.

It wanted something different. So he began forcing his mind and blowing their bodies mid-air, leaving the remains fall below. Not many of the others had taken the same initiative as he had. This was a mad thing which either had infected his mind or it had been simply an impulsive act. Whatever idea of a plan he may have had wasn't there.

Act out of act had spread a destruction which couldn't have been accounted for. Who might look after this one now? Why was it that he felt something out of the various growls he heard then?

Nothing was fair, nothing out there. In the midst of looking into space, the desire reigned again. He would have to try it now, he spoke. Thought he couldn't help it, and then he poked a prick into his mountain, pulling in his own head inside. It travelled through the spine of his deepest chords and drew in to that curling spot.

There it grew and grew while giving in to the mass. Nothing else would matter from that point on.

If there could be some kind of interest to be solely had, that would be the mere pain he felt, draining the lives out of everyone who had ever been present into becoming that perfect and pure conduit of filth. So quick had it happened that it had forsaken itself, to the point of sabotage?

Many tendrils shot too quickly while it had still in the process of growing and evolving. No matter how hard it tried reeling them back, this malformed planet had shot in every direction, penetrating about everything, without hopes of there being anything preserved.

One shot through the head of Agamemnon and it was then that it had become completely drowned in its own brain-liquid. In every other previously seen universe, the head of Agamemnon popped out of nowhere, imploding, crushing itself in every kind of way imaginable.

With one exception, has remained, the Colossus which would reign again. He had achieved his mad goal in his immortal posture through which he had been drawn in right where he needed be. That cruelty of fate, oh vile, had connected the head of the nigh-immortal demigod which had been removed from the stump which had impaled the universe, to the rest of the body it had no desire to be a part of.

The hole still laid in its head, though a poignant thing; it was still the only living thing in existence.

He had formed a new world. The body moved on top of the many bridges these impaling tendrils had created. It was time to explore, now that he would think no more. Using his brain had been tiring. That one moment when he tried doing it had been a proof of it. He was the one responsible for most of their deaths, if that had even been possible at all.

Far too many versions existed for it to completely annihilate every single one which lay in existence. Instead, this sudden burst of rage had only killed a few hundreds of them, being pointless, meaningless, a least down of his destruction, a thing which had waged no reaction. Extinguished hope remained out there, spreading about everywhere. It had been the lack of something like the peril and the woe.

It had been a paradise now, in his eyes. Though they may have been filled with some type of obscure cancer, which had grown out of his very own mind, he looked upon the veils of space. What had he done?

The empty space had been quickly occupied. Within an inch of one another, he had made small anchor-like tails which would either grow from one another, get entangled or shoot out of some empty spot which had been so overly sensitized by the growth that it would grow pieces of his body out of nowhere. Despite the constant spear-like tenderness, this real body, this solid Colossus would be strong. It would work as hard as it could without giving in. Every inch and muscle of its body strained itself in order to avoid the event.

Even then, he had been haunted and tormented by it, serving as a complete reminder that he would not be safe no matter what he would attempt to do. But this was perfect, nigh. No one would deny this kind of satisfaction anymore.

Various star-like imitations stood there lumped out of the imitations which spared nothing which had been laid inside his gut.

Now came the tormented realization the Colossus had. He wouldn't be allowed to leave. This had been his plan, now that he had obtained the creator, he would force him to open a bridge to another dimension, freeing his eternal brothers in service of the gratitude he felt. But he had not realized until now what this universe had become.

His newly acquired eyes peered as he looked around to see that not only had every spot in there emerged through some way or mean, but also through the pockets of disease that seethed in the place. There'd be some gentleness here and there. One would have to be aware that something had been going on. He knew that the many tendrils, roots and tubes had been his guts. And in them, they produced the most dangerous bile there could ever be obtain, a kind of gastric acid which would start evaporating every string and every kind of uncovering meat there was.

Sooner or later there'd be nothing there, the floating remnants and the various digested frictions he obtained. He ran, as fast as he could, in order to avoid destruction. Time had called for a special kind of action which would make him feel as if every step would appeal to some of the many watchers in his mind.

Their presence was there. He felt their eyes. In their many dimensions they had established and copied each kind of connection which would bring them back in awe. It was time to break the gap and open the gates. To his oblivion and demise, he chopped himself in half, releasing the many dormant fiends which had been alive.

Angered by the living, suddenly the entire universe shot infinity of tube-like spears to completely annihilate everything there. But as the lower bottom of the Colossus as well as the many creatures which had inherited his body had been gone, there wasn't anything left out of him to be seen at last.

He had done it then, now he would be free, in another world, with the sight of a functional head, spared of the agony of walking, he was stranded there, on the shores, near the seas which flooded the rest of the planet.

It was so quiet there. Nothing but the quite space, the mindless head and this one lonely, other, creator. He looked upon the two of them; unable to comprehend him, how was it that they had reached his world. This one hadn't managed to keep anyone alive at all. Not a single exception. Yet this appeared to quench his waiting.

He couldn't end it himself, since there wasn't anything forcing him to do. And that had been hard after all. Perhaps his mountain would fall on him.

'You must aid us into rising.'

Agamemnon said from the stop in which he had fallen. There was nothing more he wanted to see than this wretched thing he had wanted to punish, for killing his children. But he had been introverted and shy and chose not to answer.

Why is it that my mind isn't gone? Home come I haven't been destroyed?

In a moment. He raised his handless arms and looked at them for a second. Unpleased by the looks of it, he only spared some kind of weird desire to have at himself, to be laid in awe and fright. No matter what the might and grasp, the desire to help everyone, he had a heart. Though it had been pushed deeper, and though it may have belonged to the body, now it was his.

And it grew and grew, he forced it to do, until it spread from the bottom half, and from the gaps in which his hands had been, forming two long whip-like holders and a lower body which was fat and which would drag itself slowly towards the mountain. It had been rather easy for him to draw to that size. Far easier than expected, paranoia came to him.

'I gave you an order, and you saw who I was. How come you haven't leaped to my assistance?'

'You are evil and I'm afraid. Be gone from this, vile one, can't you see that I wait?'

'What are you waiting for?'

'Why, I'm waiting for my death. But it shall not be at the likes of me.'

'What makes you say that?'

I am angered and in demand of satisfaction. When I turn and I look at the image of my world, I see a failure to keep my precious ones living. Each and every one of them had been failed by you as a father and as a master; you're a creator no longer.'

‘The reason for which I lay in waiting, as there’s nothing more that I desire than this sudden escape from which I may never come alive from. They want me to end this way.’

‘Who are they?’

‘The voices, the voices, and the voices I hear.

They speak when it is near.’

‘What is it?’

‘That moment when I will no longer be allowed to live, they speak of it constantly. It comes almost constantly now and then it stops.’

He spoke as if he knew what was going on. There was a clear gap between the ground and the rest of the mountain, which wouldn’t be observable otherwise if it weren’t for this to happen. As soon as the voices started again, the mountain released itself from the rest of the planet and began drifting away slowly. It couldn’t be feigned otherwise, but there was some dreadful malignancy which may be felt.

A dread of ages was felt as Agamemnon looked at this poor creature and how mad it had become. Punishment could wait; he felt pity now for something like this. It needed so desperately to get away from that, emptiness which had been given light.

While he refused to help, he observed nothing but this questionable event. Perhaps he had been waited for, as in that moment when the flight stopped, he was smashed between the planetary calamity which had been his prison and fell. It bounced a bit but then it faded, the creature who bore the same resemblance as him would live no longer.

‘Pity, pity, I feel as I knew you best. Out of all of those visions I saw before, I confess that you must be the one who impressed me most. You waited and allowed them all to die, you haven’t interfered at all.

Liar, you had it in you. At all time, this could’ve been prevented.’

Otherwise, there would’ve been shaped shell around the planet. That had to been created by him.

But still, he couldn’t understand why was it that he allowed it all to happen in this manner. There would have to be some way or another through which he could save every single one regardless of the circumstance they found themselves in.

A world of citadels, connected by their many standing piloted tinted wings had formed this civilized world. Many cities lay patrolled by the new protectorate of mad philanthropy. The ruler of the main hold had been known as Cllothd. As his name implied, he had no use for the living nor had he felt for anything else for them at all. An attractive kind of piety remained in his act.

This man had hid himself into a closely decayed temple he called The Entry of Kor. It would be no more. No, the deep shaded dirt-colored grey which stretched on top of each citadel distracted from what they looked like.

What spanned across it had been the work of a prolific sculptor who wrote in the history of each realm. Each of them a story of their own, in which wars had been fought, things had been won and history had been rewritten until no one knew who had won. A pair of seven thrones had been spread across the planes. They had been in part, a set out of eight hundred, which had been cleansed out of life.

From above, it only looked like they had been some dark spots in a clean and green-lighted, teal tinted screen which sprouted out of no illumination.

‘I deserve more than to be mistreated. Look at me and what I bear inside my chest. I have the essence of another man’s bile. What I have done to obtain it is unquestionable in itself.

See how I have pulled out of his insides the very essence which had made him human. While taking his lung, I saw him struggle to breathe. As it came into my hand, there was nothing but a growth of smoke and cancer which had infested my entire arm. He forced me to cut it off so I may preserve my body.

But look, look how I have absorbed it. It is standing like another man who grew out of my stomach. My, but how he looks like him. ‘

This man sir had started petting his chest growth. It was highly detestable and disturbing to be looked at. A cackle aroused from the crowd, they’ve been pleased.

He had been a homeless prophet. Dark eyes, belittled by lies now came into awareness. Some discipline lay, a kind self reluctance faded. But this man bore a robe, so they listened to him. It had been made out of a taken flag, misappropriated for his own dark necessities, as he preached. He looks ancient, with his corded head, his features big and wide, his nose red, with a bump on it. White haired and a squiggled beard adorned his face, on top of his bleak purple eyes and the white pupils inside.

‘I must say, you, stranger, who are you?’

‘My name is Gvaat. They sold me like a slave, prophet. Look at me, I am frail, partially blind, there’s something in me, that won’t spare me the pain. I think it’s a bone they put inside me.’

‘Who did that to you?’

‘The voices did. I heard them speak, I can’t explain why. But they torment me, oh, ever-more. Ever since they made their presence be known to me, I have given in to much fatigue. They want me this way, obedient like the slave I am.

‘Enough of the nonsense, you foul mad. What I have here to give is the way of truth, a better way of living. Listen to me now and don’t give in to them yet. There is a way to fight this disease of the mind.’

‘What is it?’

‘You must end your own life. Look upon the winged walls. Can you see the sharp scales which adorn them? They should be sharp enough for you to run straight forward and throw yourself in there.’

And he listened and obeyed. He ran but stopped as soon as his vision conveyed. One eighth of the area at which he charged appeared to be that dark world, which no one but him saw. It would appear that his charge would be pointless after all that happened.

But he was there. And it hadn’t been an illusion, which had been discovered after a quick inspection. Behind, in his world, his body had been left behind, impaled by one of those sharp scales which threatened to fall. He had been a sight to behold.

‘He simply charged through without a thought, without even thinking.’

If there was something to it, in his peaceful way of looking this Koovalhl seemed to have taken a liking to watching. While eating out of the small nest he picked up from the nearby welcome treat, he began counting how many people have either attempted or went through with it. Dangerously aware of how much they were there, he began contemplating.

What if I were to do the same? What’s so appealing about doing it?

He could never have done it. He was too much of a coward. The women often passed him and began giggling underneath their noses, warring with their fancy dresses made out of titillating bone scourge and the remains of the growing tiny clam-steel which had been used for variously purposed tools in the forge.

Those redheads better not look into my direction or I swear they’ll make me do something regretful. He looked at them from behind his narrow toothed grin. It’s not like he hadn’t enjoyed it, after all, they’re the ones who chose to take on the same road every single day.

If he started for too long at their forms, it would only be their fault, not his. Back at the bodies, what made they carry on with it? Because he had seen every single one do it. That’s why he called them attempts. They had become reluctant and stopped, which only meant that something happened in-between the two points.

No matter what it had been, he saw it as a way to get himself through, needlessly aware that they'd be watching.

He was being watched. Despite wanting to get a closer look in order to get things done he stopped.

He hadn't paid enough attention.

Tall figures loomed around him. They wore simple robes of deep purple, tied with small ropes. No signs but blood sharps marked their chests. It was no faction he heard off, only the deranged might think of it that way.

Beneath one of the cowls, there was the face of a man who looked down on him.

'I'm.'

My tongue froze as the face drew back. A shameful display made him bow while looking down. He wouldn't get away despite everything I understood of them

The next one who drew forward had no face to begin with.

Koovalhl couldn't stop wondering what they wanted from him.

'Why are you following me?'

'There have been reports of you staring. It needs to stop before it evolves into something more dangerous.'

'But that's what I do all day. Stare, stare, I do nothing else. And no one gets disturbed by it. They even giggle when I do it.'

'Neither of them found it amusing. As a matter of fact, we have received several complaints from them. That we are aware of at least.'

He pointed a dark hand that bore a set of clam-iron rings around each brass knuckle. Some skulls, eyes and a finger adorned each ring. They weren't trustworthy so far, yet I knew what to say.

'I will look into it then.'

'And you will put a stop to it. We have no reason to take your account in this matter. They are displeased by your actions and they outnumber you ten fold.'

'But they are corpses. How could they complain about anything at all? Out of any period of time? Look at them, not even moving. Neither of them even matter. They don't even move through in this piece of quiet.'

'Enough. You've been fairly warned. The next time you stare for any prolonged length of time, you shall have your eyes ripped off.'

And out of a bloom, they sparked small gusts of smoke from underneath them and blew off into nothingness.

'Koovalhl, what happened? Are you all right?'

A four shaped, eight cornered, robust headed implorer who had his body twisted in a spineless atrocity of sharp planed, sheet-like stained triangles opened a plethora of eyes. A sheer amount of stress pushed and almost threatened to shoot every metal holding spiked wired out of its hold, throwing every piece of him in every direction tenth-eight-rows above him. He had a bunch of pyramids popping out of the top of his head, revealing the lower half of his face as that of a simple man who carried sharp yellow teeth and a robe of dark tinted green.

'I heard everything.'

‘How?’

‘You don’t need to know how, only this, my rat-looking fellow. You may be nothing but a plume, and that’s coming from someone who’s spineless but I decided to help you get one.’

‘One of what?’

‘Why, I shall help you find yourself a pair. That way you won’t end up there all alone.’

He pointed to the spot where everyone died. Lhlohtlot assumed this was the fate of most people who were unloved.

‘Not a single fool, I wager. They were sad examples; neither of them dared make a move. But don’t look too much into it or you may end up like them.

I know this because I check them out.’

‘No you haven’t and even if you did, it would be a mere coincidence. Something else’s the matter there, I know it. I...’

‘You’ll end up in a prison contemplating it more. And I can’t visit you at any time, you know that. My schedule is far too busy for that.’

Koovalhl followed his friend. It wasn’t that far from the commune he came out of. His legs were weary from the entire walk but he had managed.

Lhlohtlot stared at him. Koov wasn’t a looker, nor was he smart. He spent too much time alone in that place, and that was simply wrong. A desire emerged in him. What if he could make something of this fellow of his?

He had his flat cheeks and flat feet and dark blue overcoat with shoelaces holding the two pieces together.

‘Listen, I want you to know that this isn’t going to be easy and it’s not going to be perfect the first time.’

‘That’s not why I came here for, you know that. But I suppose I couldn’t help myself.

Before that, I need to make sure that my stuff is secure, my rocks, stingers, bones, various holders and the clamp-iron needles, the poker and the feelers.’

‘Those can wait.

Can’t you see that you don’t need to bother yourself about those things any longer? You have the chance to be normal now, without having to wait there forever.

Between the two of us, those two guards that watched, they didn’t come there to warn you for no reason. Everyone got tired of you standing there doing nothing.’

‘I knew they were walking there for me.’

‘Everything in good time, my friend, don’t tire yourself yet. You know bad things can happen when you do.’

There was at least someone out there.

There had to be one woman who’d give herself to him. Otherwise this whole insurgency would be wasted.

Koov always hated the rough sand-stone-soulless floor they stood on.

It would be unclear, out of fear and remorse for what they were doing for themselves, that nothing could be thought off it.

No one wanted to change the weird shapes in which their houses did not stand, nor the peculiarity in which their arms rested. Long and intersected, they held each other in place, yet they weren't anatomically arms, large concave bars which were so thick, that it almost reproduced the appearance they had. Unclear as to what that entailed, there was a weird agony, the pain, the dread, the feign of interest they produced. They didn't like him.

Though many of them had disliked him being there, neither wanted him here either.

'I can't shake the feeling that I'm not liked around here.'

'So? No one actually likes you, Koovalhl.'

'What? I thought you liked me. I thought you wanted to help me.'

'Only past the threshold, I was handsomely paid to get you this far. They're starting to ask questions and you weren't welcome there. No one is supposed to inspect or ask about the bodies.'

'But I don't want to be here either.'

'Though luck then. Don't forget, there's no need for you to have committed a crime for you to be thrown around some lost hole, buried with some missing ribs and eight livers.'

'What happened to you? We were supposed to be alike. You can't treat me that way.'

'You're smaller, you're weaker, and your scent is repulsive. Why would I want to be your friend? Why would anyone?'

Those were his parting words. To add insult to injury, the same group of women passed him again and laughed at him while doing so. At least the streets were vaguely empty; otherwise he would've felt much worse than what he felt then. Clearly left that way, he looked around.

Still so many people in a crowd rounded themselves around the prophet's wooden podium. A few houses had their lights on but he chose to knock on a door as soon as he could.

'Who's bothering me? Oh, it's you.'

Two arms stretched outside, as if from a place which had been entirely conjured by overlapping tiny soft sponge-hairs, purple colored. His body could barely be seen in part, as he had been covered by the hairs which brushed and wrapped and covered him from every side.

The set of teeth which poked out looked like ivory tusks which spread and shot out of his mouth. It wasn't so; it wouldn't be like a toe popped out there. No, this one had pulled himself out in what appeared to be a reckless form of sponged-meat. Living around it for so long had drained all the fluids out of his muscles and bones, leaving him into this partly weak pseudo-fit figure.

A helmet stood on his grey skin, over his broken overalls. It had no horns but appeared to be marked by a fitted stern-like formation which had been encased inside his neck. It pulled from his side, revealing a dark line of metal which dug itself inside.

'May I come in?'

'Draw at your own peril.'

He was out of sight and there were no questions asked. It was getting rather dull being there, the way through which one may even pay enough attention to the dead.

'I shall convince you all that there's still hope. Hope that you may make it through, but only if you give your bodies and accept death in your hearts.'

'No, why should we abandon our belief? You're only trying to get us killed.'

At a sudden snap of two fingers, this man had been taken away by two bigger fellows. He not want to look out now, how he was dragged in the back and thrown by force into the path towards the filth. It could've been avoided, if only he had shut his mouth off.

'As I was saying, the voices had spoken to me and they had offered me a great deal of knowledge on what is right and what is wrong. There's a blasphemy you don't want to get yourselves rid off.'

The Trianon head spoke. His mind was their, but it wasn't known to anyone else. Inside his wrists there had been tiny engraved spines which spat their tongues outside, growing like tiny plucked remnants of the carnage. He returned from it, his speech severely crippled there.

Behind one of the homes, the area had been completely destroyed, leaving a trail on the ground which had been dark and scorched. The portal still remained there, pushing like a spire of power, in a triangular form, almost paramedical if it was seen from above. He had been one of the many warriors who had been forced to fight into that place in order to be alive.

It was a few days away now.

The great distaste would strike. Another war had been waged for the last twenty years. In it the slaves had been dismissed and collapsed under their own weapons of disgust, making way for the one stalker to come. It was the first of the great arrivals, followed by many of his kin.

Strange beings which didn't fight couldn't be touched, had an aspect of smoke-like shadows colored in light. As it had been implied, they stalked their victims but only during nights. And they would prevent any kind of restoration to be had.

'Torment be no longer, you slacker. I want only a peaceful night of sleep before I die.'

But not a single response had come and this had been only a way for them to get some satisfaction. A mad kind of thing, it was, as they desired at last, to be had. But not only could they not be touched by others, they couldn't be touched by themselves either.

It was a painful experience which may be felt by them only during that period of existence. They would be short-lived and bred out in the day.

'I will end you, I will smother you, darken you, hide you in the shadows, bring out the light! I said bring you any light, I want this to end now, I need the satisfaction of the night!'

As positions had been given away, those who were awake hunted. It couldn't be avoided that weakly-looking contenders dressed in robes, headless, armless crawled and still spoke of the disturbing stalker.

They brought machines writhen in wood, made out of growth crystals and crude tools.

The surge of evil had begun. Where there had been small foot soldier they had been finally blessed, in ranks of hundreds which had confessed their kin and their souls to the voices they heard. From beneath the bottom-line of their necks, there had been bursts of pyramidal shapes like the same way the portal had been.

What they looked like was some wild manifestation of the filth world, all of which had grown in the physical growth that had been there. Tiny dreadful worms erupted from the inside of their heads which connected through their bodies, bringing back the light.

Walkers like them were seen as some kind of prodding creatures which bore only the tiniest of heads on their weird pyramidal reverted mountains. Neatly tucked as the heads of Agamemnon were, they possessed only the strongest vigor that was there. In quick strides as they weren't, obviously caught there by their own progression of delusions, there came into the light the very fact that nothing lasted.

Some monuments of destruction followed. They trashed everything in their path. Though they may not have been as strong and as agile as their fully formed equivalents, these half-breeds came with an uncontrollable wave of destruction which couldn't help itself but manifest against every single aspect of their field of battle.

Now it had become a slaughter.

'Hide, hide, no more fighting, we need to run.'

'They're eating us alive.'

The voice of eight of them came into contact with one another. Such was their allegory of disturbing delights, the filth and malignancy which couldn't help itself any longer.

They were highly uncontrollable. Heard at last.

'Decay, decay, obey, obey, serve us, save our children now!'

Gibberish as well as a need to coddle the bodies in their own, soon making their peculiar bodies taller, wider, longer, and simply pulsating like the beating of a heart. They felt solace to their one true image, that one which had been lost to them. It was he, out of all, who had been the most affluent, degenerate, decrepit, malignant and a foe.

It couldn't be thought off that they may be looking on themselves like anything other than the paranoid fiends they were.

'Let me have him, I have laid eyes upon him first.'

'No, you'll ruin it; you'll ruin him like you had ruined everything.'

They wriggled and squirmed as the shells which covered their bodies had been the same kind of magnificent solace of growths. It spread through the inside of their skin and sleigh which formed its many bumps. Such a dreadful nature as it had been came to the likes of what laid in them.

Many of them had the same core of fluids which threatened to grow. Though it hadn't been at the same extent, they'd put on a show if it was needed.

'We'll make this world; we'll turn it perfectly in the way it needs to be made.'

'Break everything for our children. They shall be bred as soon as we have enough of these ones who are alive.'

Mad view made their eyes bulge in the weird phenomena known as mutual-satisfaction. Both the insides and the head rejected one another, but as soon as a foreign element came in, they were satisfied to take a break from doing it and turn towards the one being assimilated. It couldn't be seen as anything else but a strong desire to destroy.

Nothing pure could remain. With long extending arms they spread forward and whipped everything in sight, destroying and corrupting, breaking and enacting rage. It was a show of how much they mobilized with their movement cycle. Each step appeared to push the knee lower, pushing through the bone and the skin and the armor until it had reached the ground, all the while the other side of the leg kept the body in place.

So much would they look down upon them, that it couldn't be helped any longer? From inside their heads, the liquids dripped and started spreading through the fields, like crops of high decrepitude. It challenged their insides to a filth and degenerate form.

‘We need to break the portals before they reach out and beyond.’

The desire overcame most of them before anything could be done about it. Immeasurably called into action, there was this desire, known or unknown. Cowardly they hit, like dying whores underneath their flagrant horses and their darkly skinned field. It was obvious then that their blatant inferiority kicked in and pushed forward through the point of desperation.

No one trusted one another. A lack of sleep as blatant and as hurtful remained in them. Even then it was still a mad desire not to look away. Some of those bred ones already stepped through the portals and had made their way to slaughter.

It wasn't the fight that had been over, but their sprits died as well. Hiding between the bodies and pretending they were dead as well had been the only thing they could do. No one thought of anything else of the kind, only the malignant desire to push through and not feel any connection to the thoughts of their practices.

A group of eight gathered in two squared, one wide and one inside of it. The normality of the deranged atrocities had looked away and pushed through it.

Helped by their songs, their raveled and they began driving through their magnificent desire to not last any longer. Such a thing as it had been left one only with the greatest image of less signifying desires. They formed beneath them a winder area of the skin growths and in them; they had summoned a piece of the world.

This thing of theirs had been uncounted and unwanted. It seemed to have bred the insecurity the voices felt.

Displaced from there, their heads suddenly drew inwards as they had been smote. Inside their worlds, nothing remained. No more danger and less than enough satisfaction laid as their bodies fell on the side. The wave of destruction spread in there. As soon as they entered, the gates closed. First thoughts of the invasion, failure, annoyance, symbiosis.

Each one of them had been caught off guard by the mere level of self-hatred they each displayed towards one another. A part of them were the multi-bodied ones, while the others were normally formed. What had they break into that tied formation had been the sudden impulse coming from the world displacement caused by the energy coming from inside the portal?

It had activated a bunch of neurons inside the worms which in turn had forced them to seek their similar areas upon which they may spread the light. This was a temporary thing, it had to be, and otherwise they'd be exposed.

As they travelled between the two worlds, they had completely annihilated the survivor, of which remained has been sprawled on the ground. As for their presence there, the giant wings connected the walls started showing some jerkily reactions as they weren't pleased of them being there.

'Lower the barrels pull the strings.'

It may interfere with everything they had in their minds but the poison still began spreading there. Their presence truly defiled the place, that sanctuary, where no Ill may come to pass.

'Why are we looked down upon? This will only end up with you sending us to our deaths like you always do.'

'I am the prophet of the voices and you will do as I say. As they say, as they say. Back away now, don't forget that I'm still under their command.'

A moment and a pause, they leaped together in the kind of severe atrophy of fear to which their bodies succumbed. It was there that they began piling up their tools and tiny extenders as their dreadful arrogance kicked in immediately after. From inside them, there leaped tiniest pieces of their heads, but not from above their necks, as they had come from their backs and no other place.

'At last they came, their knights in full a glory.'

One of the cities had been under attacked.

'Do not try to resist, do not hide, you were all meant to die in their name. This is only the great desire of trying to outlive your well earned mad souls.'

The words didn't connect in their minds, mostly because they had been caught and pushed into the dirt before being stamped by these meat-clustered arms. It was dreadful, the way through which they battered the bodies, grinding them in a most obscure thing.

Incongruous to say the least, it wasn't safe any longer, being there. So many missed changes now lay to them. But they were killed time after time, again and again. Bodies ripped and the entire floor crumbled underneath, revealing the mines which were hid there. One look might've gathered enough information of what had been going below there.

What they had stored had been the bodies of the last breathing cephalic arks which had been stored below. In them lay the vestige of corruptible skin which had taken in from their like and had pulled inside everything which grew beneath the like.

‘Allow me to bring you back. I see that you have killed them all at last.’

Indeed, the ruined houses which had lain in the area, the few citizens as well as the other victims which had been caught now came to be killed inside.

‘But I am still alive, oh, do not touch me yet, I’m merely trying to survive.’

Yet, the place had been taken at an alarming rate, from what had been gathered about. It wouldn’t be fair for anyone else other than those who had closed their insides. Another one of those inverted pyramidal heads protruded out of the ark. It started shoving some kind of engulfing filth aside. This one would rise again and proceed into flight, with its great planar wings which had been forged.

But farther away, in the many towns, one particular, name Klaarh stood as a residence for those who fled. They had passed through the gates and ran like a few madmen through the streets.

‘Flee, flee, you need to get away as fast as you can see. They will march through the gates and ruin everything like they had done.

Those invaders passed our lands and killed our men. You need to aid us.’

‘What happened?’

One of the occult masters came. He bore his runes in many brutish wounds circled but empty at the sides, from which sprouted a few more symbols which made it so very hard to watch without guidance. He had a piece of metal which had protruded his skull, basking through his head and neck and teeth and body as it was worn.

A dark essence, like some shadow of a smoke came from inside of it. As opposed to the rest of them, his clothes were shady, his heart rested outside his chest. This was a demented creature, with two misaligned eyes and giant hands which wrapped themselves around his ankles. It was intense, in the way he approached their small group of runners.

It looked like which each step, his skin grew shadier, almost to a plume, but his eyes shrank as he said, of hue.

‘I will grant you this ritual, for I am known to be well endowed in terms of the act of sorcery. Look around you.

The land is set on dirt. Our walls aren't made of giant wings but of lodge trees which had been taken from plain wooden beings we enslave and robbed out of. We live humble lives as long as everyone gives me tribute and accept the fact that I am the one in charge.'

He took that moment to hit the ground a few times, bumping it while trying to bring out a sound. His scepter had been a larger stick with a big head of some fat-lumped creature which erected a few front teeth from back to front and back again. Its eyes were sealed shut.

Black strings tied his eyelids, pushing only the smallest strings of his white hair which resided inside now. Some heat rested in as well and made it deeply thorough while it lasted. There was some time in which they split his head in three halves. Those marks still haunted his face as the scars which now left the man standing in front of them, vaguely displeased.

'Kneel now and lend us your lives. We shall be protected for as long as there's unity.'

'Why can't I enter and stay in hiding? I can pay for my meals and for my stay. Don't force me to join anything, I couldn't help it but give in.'

'So do it, then. There's no better desire than this. Know that anyone who will not make the sacrifice of joining in shall not be denied stay and you shall be driven out.'

'And who's going to stop me? I'm not weakling; I shall walk through your town by force and do what I please.'

The tetra-formed violent shade which had resided in its lined coat attempted to blind them by sight of what lain underneath his hidings. He bore two tiny bodies which were likely the bodies of two rib cages, which bore two tails upon which it slid away. They lead to a set of strong arms which had opposable thumbs as well as a strong head which had the look of the led.

It looked like a metallic mask, but it moved while talking so it had to have been his face. This paranoid creodont suddenly leaped and tried masking away his fright as the energies surrounding the population of the town had been cast upon him. He had been instantly turned into a mass of energized matter. Its body burned to a crisp instantly to show a mark of dark energy which had replaced the outline of terminating power.

A white aura finally forced the rest of the energy to get vaporized into nothingness. Oh, this one had been vile, this dark sorcerer who had summoned the shades and had driven everyone out.

'What is your name, vile wizard?'

'You shall not be granted any favor, as long as I'm here, you shall force yourselves to behave. Until your answer is given, I won't take any of you into servitude and even more, I shall destroy you all. Have I made myself clear?'

‘As clear as possible and I accept.’

‘Kneel and you may join.’

As another one came from the small gathering of runners, they knelt, revealing the power he had bore. Two lightning strikes came from above, in the same form, covering them momentarily in the same shade as the one mad suicide had been wrapped into before he died.

‘You may now approach.’

They had been given free entry and a welcoming smile. The others accepted him like one of their brothers and appeared to bear nothing of the magnitude of fear which had been shown before.

It would be cruel to think otherwise, but this had needed to be addressed.

‘Is there a way out if we give in?’

‘Never, as soon as you pass the threshold, your souls are mined, forever. Each one of you will belong to me from this end of life and for the passing of the next.’

‘That wasn’t part of the deal.’

‘It has always been the case and I shall waste no time to explain it to you. Wretched, you bore me. And I am not one to be insulted twice.’

He flickered a hand and their bodies burst into smothering of guts. They truly had no idea with whom they were dealing with. It hadn’t been their like to be known.

‘Now that you have joined us, it is time to know.’

Bells had been rung in the distance. Another town from the varied communes had received one of their groups. It had been happening way too often already. No one would be pleased by this.

‘I need entrance.’

‘Denied.’

The guard had spoken through his eight folded long trombone-shaped mouths. They had large prison barging bars coming from inside its open body. He had trapped inside of them four escapees who attempted to pass the border into town.

What covered him had been an armor which left enough of a wide space for passers to see what the consequences of breaking the law would be. Anything else would to him anger. He drew nearer and listened.

No eyes came out of his strange metal suit. Only the clam-iron, shell-like creation he wore, self-fashioned to give the feeling of remorse. Four faces stood at the joints which were bore at the knees and beneath the arms.

They were crying or screaming, daring to be heard in the agony they propagated. It was clear that they needed someone to hear and to watch for what was going on in there.

And this was one of the more civilized towns there were. No one else might think otherwise, as the streets were planted by the bodies which stood under their foundations.

‘Look, they brought the poor ones now.’

‘What did they think, bring their unsatisfactory gazes here?’

Yet the voices fell, some stood behind and watched at that thing above them emerged. They had planted their heads and bodies on the giant grown torsos, which bore the symbol of their world. From it sprouted four wings, two wide-spread, and two smaller ones, and plenty of heads and faces which had grown in giant sizes and appeared to be in the likens of Agamemnon.

The voices pleaded as each flap of the wings threw its double-tailed behind.

‘Look how pure and unsatisfied they are. They need to be made aware that I shall rule the place.’

‘I shall make them my own, all of them. But what if they resist?’

‘Resistance is impossible, we have seen world after world like our.’

‘But we never turned one astray, look at it for now and listen.’

Everything I looked down there, the face of Agamemnon reeled in its hiding. It felt so weak down there, inside its place. Weak, frail, crawling away from sight out of the fear it bore in itself not to be caught. There was some innate fear it showed. No one wants to be seen at their lowest, no one wants to reveal what’s going on down there.

Quarry, down the valley. Broken by a long series of shakes, massive unoccupied charts had been spread there, about everywhere, leaving only half-formed people working. It wasn’t their kind who had built the great towns or who had raised the walls, but it was well. Most of these sings went unnoticed, since they weren’t of the kin.

It felt similar to him. They all have the same, means to relate to him. Often he had felt alone. Once in the past it had occurred to him that none of the children were his. It was a sad thought he couldn’t look over. He could never have created anything of his own, though he had desired them so much.

Perhaps that's why they had eventually been allowed to die off into the distance, time after time. His face couldn't look away now, from the days in which he had allowed humanity to die, to the point where he had felt himself stranded, sterile. To now, the loneliness he had so desperately tried to avoid. He could never have had anyone.

There was fear in Agamemnon, he knew they would cheat, that they would abandon him, that they would leave him be. Or they would ask him to see, the utmost acts of degeneracy which repelled him from their sight.

Out of his fear, he had been damned to that loneliness, never to have been touched or caressed or to have felt the touch of another.

Why were the others so right? In their quests they had it all. They had their worlds; they had their likes reflected in other bodies as well. But he, he had been left by everyone, there, stranded in the lace of no return with no one to look back upon. He couldn't have looked back at anyone there.

But he desired it so much.

More than what they had been doing then. Why was he given the sight then? Out of all the days of staring at the emptiness of the dark, now he had been allowed to watch.

They looked so simple. Each of them so, so, simple. They worked continuously, slow and fast, slow and fast and one day they would die out of exhaustion. He never imagined that so often, seeing how he had only been a face, moving away because he would be afraid. Who's watching me now?

'Are you trying to look in my direction?'

He spoke to no one, yet expected to be heard. Someone had to have been there, otherwise, he wouldn't be found. Unlike the others, he was so light. It felt as if he were floating, even though he had been, stalled. Without any attachment to them, he felt vaguely out of place there.

If he had his watch, he would have his work. And as if heard, his vision changed. There were children, he would see on fields, running away with their families. It had to have been somewhere in the past now, with so much grass being there.

Those were even simpler people watching over their children. The man came over to his wife and placed an arm around her shoulder. Days like these were watched by him as they went by and by after each night cycle.

It was a quaint life, living on the fields, as a farmer. Going back to their tiny barn, watching their children grow until their lives had come to an end.

And there would be no other solace to get back to and no one to desire less. They would confess to one another there as it was safer nonetheless. If only there had been less to his life and what his world had become. Perhaps Agamemnon would be happy.

But the world hadn't waited and the world hadn't been anything but fallen ever since the influence had come. Something spread to the desire of the most influenced and most fearful of sights. No one could believe what was going on there.

But the new overlord which would watch upon them had arrived. He would see himself or themselves, as the voices began crying and spreading their words upon the lands and upon those they looked down upon. For now, only the mockery was present and the fear of those who watched in seething hate.

'That damned thing will destroy us all. We have to do something.'

'What would that be? We're simple and unskilled; we have no tools, no weapons, simple wit.'

'This only begs for us to outwit it, that's all. The alternative shouldn't matter to any of us in the long run, if you understand what that accounts for.'

Worry not for a second. I know what shall be right.'

What had been called into action there had been the fact that they needed to be aware of all the evil which had been perpetuated throughout the short-live glory of his ascension. It was well enough on its own, that when he had arrived, many of the watchers had felt this entry.

Appearance of mad desires which had only spread their madness into play. That could only have been the paranoia acting as they started stabbing and cutting and bleeding away. Fires appeared in the distance, arson and mad wildfire which only jumped and leaped and came between the likes. No defiance could be called at all.

Worry had been for the wicked, less than what had been there. It would only take a sudden action for those to be aware of the fact that they were dying, like flies, falling mad like someone who'd desperately long to die.

In the youth of a man, who had left his tiny house then, something held him back. He was working on a Rubicon cube, with the many faces of sorrow on them. Each of them lost interest in themselves after a while. With all the while, being annoyed by the sound of their own voices, it looked like the man had stopped as well.

He opened the cube and saw him there, smiling like some insignificant tiny thing which didn't care for itself at all. There was some dexterous approach to what it had been like, the veil of things which didn't push themselves any further.

A part of his head opened and out of him came the arms and hands extending, drawing out the rest of its body, revealing a small placed bond of tinier babies attached to a rancorous lower area where it stored most of its insides. It looked soft and easy to be taken, while the hardness couldn't be mistaken, the upper area of the torso appeared thinner than what it had been.

The upper head was tiny and small, which only took out the features which pushed away and flung themselves to the side. From them came some long reeds which protruded through their tiny bead-like glowing stings. Only one thing could be defied in it, the fact that there was a procedure to be had then.

He had do abandon his body and take his alternated children with him. So many things hadn't lasted at all, only that shade of deeper perylene black. It pushed through and opened himself to the exposure. Not even remotely likely as it had been, there was the desire to escape his body and the time he had spent time in the mind of the man.

'Now it is time to return. No longer am I needed in the world of man. This, I promise to you, make sure you treat me right upon my coming back; I couldn't help it if I had to pay any attention to the mad. The calling, the wrong doing and the faulty desire not to return, they have made me bond with them and invite my like to breed inside of them.

But I know, oh I know that there's no way to return any longer. Without a chance to get back at it, there may never be a chance to keep it any longer. Look, I can't handle trying to do well, there's no such thing as it.

They will find a way back to your realm, my lord. And if they won't, so be it, they could keep copulating in this world until they make it like home.'

That had been case for a great number of generations now which had failed to escape. One after another, they would find their way inside people's heads and grow inside their brains. Since they hadn't felt any pain through this process, their functions had been adopted by those things inside of them.

'Look, I'm only trying to obey my primal needs in order to survive. There's something wrong inside of my mind, impulses which I can't control, who's there?'

A moment before his face opened, there was something which had to be established. This intruder had possessed so many offspring's. It had to know what was down there.

'My tiny incision shall prevail. Now we should see what's inside of you, before I come to tell you what's going to happen.'

'What have you done to me?'

They had all been kept alive, forced to evolve into a state of living which would never end. Now, each cell inside their bodies would draw in and eat the fragments of dust and mice which would float towards them. Nothing could be called any lesser than theirs. A bond between strangers, as they said.

‘This might be painful but mind me not.’

He may have missed legs but he managed to create a transparent amount of oozing bodies which stacked upon one another, creating the illusion that it was floating or merely resting on its belly. Within its long claws, the first gap had been made, which had cut through the clothes at first, then through the rest of him.

It wouldn’t be decided whether or not he could dare, but this wasn’t on the table yet. There was something to be devoured yet from there. But another look, which revealed that the insides had curled inside a slimier bag of its own, had given itself life. Not only could it move but it would be aware of the mistakes it would keep making.

Each piece had started moving and began crawling away.

‘An interesting turn I might add, but what is this?’

As it flung itself from the insides, it revealed that this had been a hybrid which had left as many transparent false bodies behind as he had. Afterwards there was something close to the dexterity of souls, the need to call someone their own.

On the back, there was him, the same shaped features being straddles and contorted as if to be wrapped on top of the guts. Nothing else mattered, unlike whatever it had seemed to be the case; he had attained a certain level of despair. It wasn’t the same after.

Not so much as to keep the breeding happening, this thing was trying to create a species of its own.

‘They should be made aware of this. It could develop into trouble afterwards, no matter what one takes to him now, we need to forget it. A much needed approach had been the desire to look away and into the place they are most likely hiding.’

He had suspected that a separation had taken place and that they had all found a way to crawl away and breed. This bootleg couldn’t be permitted at all. Not since this planet would be inherited by all of them. Humans were still kept as cattle for that reason of control.

And the laboring had only begun. It wasn’t going to go well, especially since they were adapting. Yes, around the planet, the water sources had been encapsulated and covered by a layer which afforded free walk on most of the world’s surface. Without a question, there was something more interesting to it, the fact that there were no leaps in the domination aspect.

The humans had been stricken down and forced to obey. This atmosphere had made so many of them grow, like giant planes which grew in fat and in size, leaving behind the same kind of affectionless sight. Dread could only follow through. It made them reckless and forced them to disobey themselves.

No other cause could matter, other than the fact that, of the few of them who grew their offsprings died. Without anything to grow in, they would be re-absorbed inside their giant bodies. Something had to be done about it.

For that reason they set a council meeting for themselves.

‘Listen, we have called you all here, above the edges of the world, for us to discuss our possibilities. It’s clear that once we come into contact with the air, there may be no way to return to the original size in which we have been made and that our children won’t have a way to grow.’

‘But what if we use our bodies?’

‘This won’t work, you know they can only grow in organic material, of which kind we don’t belong to. For that reason we grow and expand, and for that reason they’ll become the lifeless sacks you have wrapped around the holes of your body.

Unless we find a way to form the men into giants, who may be impossible for our own reasons, we will be stuck.’

‘Then it’s settled, everyone shall be forwardly instructed not to get any further than this. They will remain inside the human beings and keep working from inside of them.’

‘Yet we are in need of more of us to grow in size. Not too many that there may be a power imbalance between us, but so that we may govern and build upon this world so it may be to our liking.’

‘And if it blows up against us?’

‘We shall deal with it as long as it goes.’

‘Should we talk about the term? That being these tiny half-breeds which began spreading beneath the crust of this planet, it looks like they display an inability to grow which had been inherited from the symbiosis obtained them.’

‘They’re to be discarded then. We should not seek to flock our world with any kind of piety and any desire to draw them out if they don’t seek us. Most of them are pests, in the same way those broken humans are.

Now, shall we begin our plans? Our cities need to be raised and I think I may have found the perfect way to go on with it.’

A special method of twisting between the bodies which had been left behind combined with the forging techniques lend onto them by the primitive primates helped them give birth to standing arches, buildings, cities of their own. Even nonsensical designs were possessed and admired by them. Though they knew they were superior to both the smaller ones and their smaller kin, it couldn’t be helped.

‘Look, they have taken a liking into what I have made.’

‘Some, not all, do not waste time with that filth, look upon what I have created.’

They made statues of their own after being conquered, if anything at all. Kliraz was only one of the few sculptors of men. Though it was only an imitation of those ancient sights he saw, he took a liking to them.

So many of them had been pleased by the sight of beauty, the size and the sight of ocher did surmise this dark and beautiful form which took shape into the light. It was both a frightening sight and one of terror.

‘I don’t take a liking into what you’re trying to produce. Why would you waste your time trying to create and preserve these tools of our own that we use for breeding?’

Have we not twisted and abused them throughout generations? We’ve done our best to do it as well as we could until now. Do not grow a consciousness yet. There’s only vileness here and there.

‘And why would you destroy what I have wrought with by own hands? Do you not see that I have done something I have taken a liking into?’

The joy of birth had been taken from me. I live knowing that I may never bear any life of my own.’

‘We all do, so why would you cherish them so much? Look them, they are disloyal, they are filth. They cheat on one another, they know only how to betray and lie. As soon as something better comes along, they would not give a second thought to one another.

Of this destruction, of this immorality, there can be no return from. Look how they destroyed their bonds, even now, their nature is self-destructive. Why would you glorify that thing of the past knowing that they may never be true to one another?’

It is impossible, it cannot be sustained. They are unlike us who are pure, who are true to ourselves who need only to merely survive to carry on our kin.

We may never get betrayed, we may never feel any other satisfaction than living.’

‘Then why are you so vile? Why has my creation been destroyed?’

Are you afraid of them? Of these primitive beings who strive towards being together?’

‘It is not in their nature.’

‘And it was not in their nature to create beauty. It was not in their nature to give us the means to build these things which we have made, taken from them.

There's something to them, which is unexplainable, something which gave life more than we could ever imagine.'

It was by no means easy looking away. There were time where one would look at everything and reflect every wrong and every single thing which had been ruefully placed around every place. No one wanted to talk about it.

Everyone ignored him because he wanted things to be right. Evenly so, there were so many great places Agamemnon could look into. So many spots where he could see grass growing, plains of anything natural simply being there with no thought of return. Some sort of consideration could be named or called there. But no one wanted him to look at those things.

It was hard as it was, being excluded by him in every other dimension, but, despite so many creatures being there, whom he had the pleasure of calling his children, Agamemnon felt lonely around them.

They stopped acting in that destructive way he had tried to desperately to prevent. For a short time, he had been content with letting go. None of them died, and none of them actually cared for much while he kept on fantasizing about what was going on around.

Shell shock followed in the fields, many of the wings shaking as their guard had faded.

'Look at the filthy grasp of air they bring on here, they shall infest the skies and fill out many a places with their disgusting and repulsing activities. Don't push it; do not push it past me that I may look on it with joy.

IF anything falls, I shall leave you.'

The children looked at their father in disgust. He couldn't help it but try shaking off the feeling off discontent. It was strangely quaint, how much of a figure he had been. This was degrading in a most immeasurable way.

'Please, father, let us help you.'

'You are mad, father, even since you hear the voice, you stared acting numb. Look around the house; you've spoiled it with a lot of wax. There's nothing more inside this place worth looking over.

I don't feel safer any longer in here.'

Various marks had appeared inside their home. Various faces inside of them spoke and as they were listened to, the wax stared spreading and forming their small spawns.

As the first spawn of wax emerged, it came out bearing one eye which looked out in reverse, with its two headed peeling flimsily cry, it spread itself a nasty try. Two legs sprouted and before it shouted again, it lunged at the man.

His chest had been opened and inside of him entered this being of nasty-dirty stained white. It reeled deeper in before a hand appeared and protruded out of his insides. It could have been much worse, but this lasted even less than it had been desire. Speaking of the rush, he woke up, wearing his plainly-stricken robe, with the mark on his chest and eyes which burned.

‘This is it, you are my children now and it is time for you to behave. Pick out wax with your hands and make me a way out.

If you fail this simple task, you shall be punished and forced to obey an even darker task.

It had been a way to cope with the miserable feeling of anticipation. But they worked for this new father.

‘When will our old father return?’

‘Never, he will never return, go back to your task.’

But the feeling hadn’t been gone yet. So much so, as there was a disturbing treatment which couldn’t be avoided, one entry through a piece of the dividing frontiers had been broken. That monstrosity simply flew through it and broke its miserable shield in pieces. Not even likely, as if it was trusted by the growing mushroom man-heads, they began taking immeasurable sights as they trying pushing each other out of the way.

‘What’s going on out there?’

Their facial features gave the impression of sharpness which may not have been controlled by no means of coercion. It was simply disturbing, a sight of the unnerving inequality of desire between brooding nations who looked at it as it was, a dangerous way for escape. Dread followed as if there’d be no tomorrow. Not for them, who saw their end.

Some of the closest peers had been encompassed by the sizable head that appeared to spread quite fast. In short, they would seem unnervingly fine.

‘I must escape before more chaos happens.’

Even the wealthiest districts had the people looking unnerved at the sight.

‘We need you to do something guards, can’t you see that the people are there, trying to get away from the pain instilled in them?’

It had been no amiable task, the one in which the guard had been set. Difficult, as one may say, the dreaded cocoons there appeared in the air.

‘Look, another one of them there!’

They pulverized the molecules and threatened the likens of what was right in the air. Not only had the empty space been a place for nasty genes to occur, but it was obvious that nature had given them no excuse. It was the most pure thing one could fathom.

No more pain, since they would appear there, these kind and disturbing looking creations of silk which mummified themselves only to appear in some vague shape showed their many limbs and their disgusting wings. Organs and their heads rested on wings which didn't flap. This strangeness refused to stop.

Yet, as repulsive as they looked, as disgustingly and slippery as they seemed, they absorbed the pain. How magnificent it had been, to look away from this sight, which took away, in the light of day, nothing of the hysteria which remained.

The servant of Agamemnon kept spreading itself through destroyed field, after destroyed field, before finally picking up a place to rest. It may not have been the best one to pick from, though, to be left assured of it, there was neatness in the disturbing sight which had been propagated upon them.

'Now that you have shaped my portal, it's time for me to get away. Don't look after me.'

The wax turned into some culminating point of wooden exposures. They appeared to be not only encompassed in wax but they turned into twisting angles of plying stinging fluids which could be stepped insides of.

His way of going in had begun cutting through the skin layers outside his body and there wasn't any prevention to it. He was manipulated into twisting himself into some curling ball of wax, flesh and bones before finally being pulled in with all the wax, a quarter of the house, the ground and everything else in.

'Our father is gone.'

Said little Cloho, looking at her dead brother. A piece of his head had been dragged inside, leaving him there; bleeding tiny jumping drops which couldn't be helped at all.

'I have to go back to where I need to be. There's that place which is lost at the cost of dreadful activities.'

The horn on the floating cocoon said. It was another infection which had been bound to spread sooner or later. Many of those tiny horned speakers would appear, sometimes accompanied by a pair of other colored dyes which engulfed the silky smoothness which appeared. From them, started dripping their feelers and the essence they bore.

This world had been deemed in need of the mad protection. Underneath these silken shields, they could be kept under safety from the needed destruction the servant brought.

'I cannot breathe, I cannot move, don't do this to me!'

Stood the first voice of reason which may now be heard, it couldn't be complete without a kind of desire to come forth and hide from that anarchy instilled by desire. It wasn't fair, this attire of frozen prisoners.

'They're making me feel feeble, I'm so, sleepy. Help me, Ashtioreth, grab my arm and give me the freedom I seek.'

Her lover mourned as he shoved the blade through her gut. This felt so peaceful at first until the bleeding had been stopped by it. There wasn't any excuse for what was going up there.

Enough of it.

'Look no further into their world. We have too many great things to carry on with. If we focus only on this, we'll be left unchallenged. By no means will we be able to creep and stall if we are caught again.'

'Then do not speak, this is what happens when we do, you all barge in and do as you please. This isn't going to change unless we all settle down on making the sacrifice of voice.'

'No, but you'll all betray us. If I were to be silent, if he and he and he will do the same, one will appear and betray us all. And we'll know of his presence and of the sound through he propagated his message.

There's no turning back any longer.'

'But if we keep doing it, more voices will join. We weren't meant to have access to them, to any of us, or to the other worlds at last.'

'It far surpasses the boredom of looking at the sight of you over and over again. At least this way we may shape and observe. We may influence but never try to abort.'

'Until one of us decides that it is more righteous to do it that way. Do not make any commitment to our cause if you cannot help yourself. This will mean nothing but a means to self-destruction. It is clear we were not meant to be that way. At least, we cannot help it.'

'So be it, then at least we could try to focus on one single purpose for the time being, let us take over control over them. That way, we shall make sure there's nothing wrong going on.'

'Yes, I can already see one of those openings which show some interest.'

They pointed at it and at the billions of laymen in it. Such simplistic creatures made of one shape, one fluid kind of allotted organic crystal which gave them the appearance of elemental servitude. Many had been completely mentally enslaved.

They three legs moved quickly, in their viridian colored skin opened to the star exposure coming from their system. It was unclear whether or not those eight eyed small bobbed heads could hear it. Their ears had been plastered and flattened to clear ends.

‘I must do what I want; I must please myself with the need of creation. No one should look into more than it is needed.’

A clear form made shaped itself wisely. It couldn’t be thought as anything on the matter, to the latter meaning which went forth.

‘Please do make me hunt for the others, friend.’

The Agamemnons recognized one another. Certain big bulks in their backs made them look so much bigger, wider, their arms being hardened by their bulging muscles. Labor was a planetary delight, but it was strange, because there wasn’t close to anything on the surface.

‘What happened here?’

‘Change you body and head down there. Can’t you see that they are trying to fathom the depths and clear themselves of so much less exposure than it’s needed?’

‘Well, I’m only trying to get away from all the noise I hear in my world.’

‘Head down below and look for yourself.’

He did it and noticed that they had found themselves floating down there. Below the ground, gravitation had been kept to a minimum. They had built movable structures in forms of crystalline rhombuses, dragged over by chains. It explained why they had such magnificent upper body strength.

More importantly than that, it was clear that most had been brought to the awareness that this was no gravity at all, but some force which made some of the air molecules harder. They could still swim through them but that was all. Most of their inner-system made it so their lungs could take in as much as it was needed.

‘I see their temples and their watch over their property. But what shall we do here? I can only imagine that there’s nothing to behold or act upon.’

‘But there will be, don’t worry about it. We only need to make the proper arrangements and they shall all succumb to us, do you understand?’

‘And what will that produce then?’

‘One empire under our supreme control, do not question the need for us to create this as some kind of symbol to represent us.’

‘But we have never created anything; we have mostly shaped the already existent.’

‘My good Agamemnon, but we have given shape to one who went out there and learned. And from his knowledge it is to be derived that even if we’re evil and vile, degenerate and malignant, we shall make it so we can always push ourselves forth.

No agony can be called any less than important. We shall carry on and leave a legacy. It’s clear that we are approach supreme stagnation and we shall be made extinct.

This is our only chance to learn and leave something behind.’

Suddenly, the voices stood clear and started obeying and paying close attention to what was going on there. It was interesting and amusing, for the first time in a long eternity. Not only that, but they had wanted something of their own, flawed as it had been.

‘How come it hadn’t occurred to us to do it any time sooner?’

Why is it that this was discovered only now? I wish to create and shape and give form to something of my own that is fair, that is right, it is hard.’

And that had been the reason, for which they all simply swam there confused about what they were supposed to make do with what they had.

But they were flawed in what they mad, at least during their initial conception. There was an immediate desire to recreate their geographical location as a form of reminiscence but it failed.

‘We shall make it so it’s pleasing for our sight.’

‘Do not question what is right about this, we should make it all look wrong, crush it, dust it to pieces. Can’t you see I’m trying to get away from it?’

They began by trying to outdo one another into making their different forms with some wicked innuendo of the kin.

‘Enough of that, make the bridge and open the gate, we have a traitor amongst our ranks. Look into his world, he had done the unforgivable, the one fantasy which we all know it may never be achieved. Bring forth these bodies and judge for yourselves.’

As the voices chimed in, they understood what had been wrong and what needed to be done. It had been vaguely unquestionable by every mean of appeal.

‘Look at this universe.’

The first one who arrived there said. His body had survived through the travel and now stood there erect like some kind of planetary deceiver, walking on the space net.

‘It had done it, this traitorous one, he had somehow managed to ruin everything and escape. Look at how unfinished it is. Even his attempt at self-mutilation had failed and in his failed attempt, he had made a knot which brought with it half of the mass out there. Now it lays there trapped for as long as gravity may allow it.

This cannot be forgiven, as it will serve as an act of inspiration to the self admitted destruction and repulsion we may all be forced into.’

‘But what if this is the right thing to do? Do we not all share the same core as he does? Is this not the ultimate goal, that we may all end ourselves?’

‘No, this isn’t what it had been meant to. We were meant to encompass everything and cover their planets, their creations, their children and wrap ourselves in the essence of purity and protection. As long as we didn’t kill, murder or slain them, there was a chance to set ourselves forth into creating this bond and offer them the eternity.

Then, we would proceed to hibernate until they will have suffocated, living in a long dream, thinking they’re alive. We would look through the infinite universes at alternatives and see them for what they are.

We could live through the bodies of others and ourselves.’

‘But that isn’t my plan or my desire. It is clear that your mind has expired. My supreme creation would be a kind of control which may spread about wherever life may grow. And I would place them and change their locations and force them to change and play in my games of solidarity and see that they’re properly messed with for my own desires.

Afterwards, I could drag some and abandon them in space, seeing them brought to some kind of satisfying end. Or burn them, drop them into planets made out of pure dissolvent substances or have them thrown inside stars. Entire galaxies would be dragged and black holes could be snapped or they may find themselves wherever I desire.’

‘No, no, neither of you has it right, this growth can only bring one thing to the world, only one infinite serpent which may go from world to world, rooting itself and creating chaos as it would grow through planets and connect them like some sort of inter-planetary surface entrance.

Only the immortals would be able therefore to experience all life that ever existed or would have ever existed as this bond or connection would far surpass time, piercing through as many imitations of the same world and as many lifetimes as to not bring any boredom.’

‘And how would this plan of yours accommodate with the fact that we have no desire to be conquered or have our worlds invaded by your inability to keep to yourself?’

You worthless scum have no place to invade any other world than yours, so keep it to yourself before someone decides that it’s time to end all life through as many ways as there are world torn apart.’

‘Enough of it, we needn’t argue about it, look at what happened here and remember, whatever we may choose or whatever we may do, this could be an end result. With one important exception which lay. Agamemnon is nowhere to be found. Not a single way stands for him to be taken apart.

Look at what’s going on there. Look what’s going on here, it’s clear that there’s no hope for any of us if one might come to do this and escape.

He fled his world and assumed no responsibility and explanation. We were cut from looking into his world until long and now that we have found what the result is, I say, go ahead and hunt for him. It’s the only feasible way through which we may get to make something out of it.

Before long, we shall have made some important discovery. Some insignificance lay on this. Betrayal, arrogance, fear and a disturbing lack of commitment, it reeked of it, this entire thing couldn’t be mistaken.

That Agamemnon kept walking now. It had been lonely there, especially since the other died. Somehow, it hadn’t felt painful, having his limbs and his extended body made out of his heart. For some reason, it felt, quaint, strange, and lonely.

Only self-reflection mattered now, with all that happened, all the missed chances and opportunities to make up to humanity, it had been done. The species which came after were signed for wretched lives which couldn’t matter at all, not for it. Saddened by it, he looked for a way to get past it, to stop thinking about it, but instead, it had become an obsession.

All of the past experiences and the similar or different worlds he had seen kept popping in his head. IT wasn’t even obvious why he did it, other than that moment when it didn’t matter what he thought. He would often think of it when he was alone. That strange way of how so many of them ended unhappy. Time after time, he looked and reflected, after so many channels he flickered through, there was enough unrest in his mind. He gave up trying to search for a way out.

‘I am alone here, only with my thoughts. You’ve stopped yourself from even submerging inside the planet’s core and you mastered the voices as well.

But I’m alone now and I will never be able to find out if they know about us. It shouldn’t have ended that way.’

He was calm, way too calm for someone looking how he looked. Now, with his body out of place, he wondered why was it that he felt it now, sorrow for what he lost, sadness born out of the fact that he saw every possible direction which could be taken in all of those dimension, his choice were disabled from him.

‘They’ll find me eventually, I know they will. I’ve done many petty things and I have relieved myself of any morality by trying to take control over them, even though I shouldn’t have. There’s nothing I wish more for myself but to remain alone.’

Discouraged by it, I seem to have forgotten what it like is, to feel like I’m being watched, or to look into places which hid themselves beneath the ground. Even those were off limit now.

‘We shall create beauty and the ugly, we shall create the magnificent and the disturbing and we won’t take anything into account unless it shall be made out of some innate desire to shape and give life.’

It was obvious enough that the planet had been turned into a kingdom of their choice. Some outer limits had been established only so there would be no need of incarceration. Speaking of which, they still dreaded the hybrids, which had to be found sooner or later. Perhaps it wasn’t a secret yet, but they were dangerous, both to them and to everything else.

‘They will destroy and conquer us from below. I can see it; they are made out of some desperation to fit in both molds. Look at how useless their human wombs have become, they are even rejected by their human counterparts.

But we cannot assume the same mistake, we’ll have to strike them down before they spread and it becomes much worse.’

‘How exactly? Those rubes have managed to avoid both capture and any kind of detection so far, there’s no way we may be able to get them now. Unless there’s some way to truly gnaw at it, we’ll handle it as well as we can.’

‘What are you talking about? I know for a fact that they breed like their human animals. They’re everywhere, look.’

One of the members of the obsidian race, as the humans called them now, pushed forth his four long fingers, spreading them as far as he could in every direction until his palm looked like a small joint from which they sprouted. It came to his as a surprised that he picked up a pile of dirt from beneath him only to find out that there were none in it.

‘They’re supposed to be here, I swear, they’re supposed to have some kind of secret tunnel and many holes made to wander through the world. You can’t occupy any kind of position as it doesn’t matter any longer what’s out there.

We should make sure we’re looking into it sooner or later.’

‘Enough, you’ve got no proof that they are spreading or that they have any kind of civil organization. Stop embarrassing yourself and return to the procrastination.

What we are in need of making is a new belt around the planet, so we could stop the falling rocks.’

It had been observed that plenty of the space materials fell down there. The junk couldn’t help itself but be drawn by the gravitational power of the planet. What it produced is the evil kind of essence which had been harvested not at a physical level but at one which involved the inter-dimensional place which projected itself in the framework of the eternally recreated universes of Agamemnon.

From that point they each drew a piece to their own liking, the projection of which may never fade but grow as weak as to signal the fact that it would become somewhat useless for it to be harvested afterwards since the energy would be most likely beneath the level needed that they may have their thirst satiated.

This change had only been recent and it hadn’t been felt by every single one of them. But enough of them had gathered, infested and made their servants force the projection into the frame. Only that way they could be satisfied now.

What had caused this change had been the sudden transparency which had been applied to infinity. With it, they were now made aware that there were others worlds like theirs, only pure and untouched.

It wasn’t theirs to be taken, as these being, whom belonged to the obsidian race, shrunken or enlarged, even the hybrids were primitive themselves. And those who looked at them from the distance, even from an obscured sight could only feel that amount of weird and malignant jealousy. Especially the voices and their brought in bodies.

‘Look at how they mastered the shaping of form. How can such insolent creatures who are threatened by sub-formed hybrids manage to create what they had achieved down there?’

Why is it that we can’t do anything right despite the materials we have?’

‘Patience, patience, it’s only a matter of time until we’ll do it. Sooner or later we’ll have mastered everything there is to master without a single exception, without weakness and without a thing to slow us down. Mark my words, we shall prevail!’

It was an acceptable thing, staring. For now, but it became degrading and they had returned to that world. From there it had been only a matter of time until the land could be questioned.

‘Pull a piece of the floating columns and I shall shape a piece of the ceiling into an open creation and twist of many lanes. We shall separate them as far as we can and afterwards we shall plow them with our sculptures of our own.

You've seen them and what they had created, they have lands, and they have ground upon which they cultivated their skill. We have naught of that.'

'Unless we bring something of our own, see what I have acquired.'

'Agamemnon, you bastard, you have done the impossible, you've stolen something from them. How? This projection should've placed a restriction upon you. Why is that you've suddenly become empowered by this force?'

'I feel it, my essence is started to come into this body. My world, the entire universe is shrinking as its gets absorbed and moved into my space-consciousness. Soon I will have become this body and it will become anchored to this world.'

Look at how I can change my shape to my will.'

And in front of him, this strange double headed tyrant changed his face into that of the original terror which had castrated itself into this pagan look. Again, it felt something different, something better, beyond any kind of magnificence of terror and depravity. It could not be felt by any other means any longer, this joy. It was joy that he felt, actually happiness not sprouted from anything in particular, but it felt no longer like a father.

No, it had been safe from it, now it looked like it was only the one simple being it showed itself as. Tentacles and tendrils, legs and a bulk in the back and wings and tails and rays and other small pouches came but each of them drew back.

'Control yourself for now. We cannot infest this world. That wasn't the deal. I know you're feeling a lot of power, but it's clear that we need to have a degree of learning so we may obtain some control over ourselves.'

'But I cannot help it, this joy makes me want to grow and move, I want to transport myself and show these beings my world.'

'Do not waste this opportunity for us. Our kind was never meant to move but stay there forever; in some place where it may only bring the self-destruction we all care.

If we begin now to kill or entrap our own, there will be no escape from it.'

'So what of it then? Perhaps one of us is meant to come out as a victor and rule over the bodies of the others, look at them.

They would make fine servants and creations.'

With that he went into another world. This one wasn't an oblong and no sphere, but an unmoving solitary planet made out of billions of flat lanes which connected into some kind of tetrahedron.

‘Look at these beings that live under constant threat of being flattened in their heads. So many fingers which are sharp and are made to grasp those insolent pieces of meat which shape themselves beneath their feet to avoid capture.’

A simple observation could be taken there. Giant brutes were formed out of the many rooted pieces of brown pinked masses which came together to subjugated those mindless hunters. They looked as if they had the physiology right, and they did show some kind of intelligence.

Three arms, with two in the front and one in the back turned their strangely concave lower half which juggled on the earth, trying to grasp a single complex hold of those petrified tetrahedron hunters. It was a single crush which broke their outer yellow pale cover, before they could be picked up and eaten from the inside. Many worm-like contusions followed. It was a cult of brutes afterwards, which followed their instinct.

Big heads governed over them, long, sharp tooth, as they were made out of pieces of those shield which stood over their victims. Afterwards they drew what they could and abandoned the bodies there, reverting in the moving masses. It had been observed plenty of times.

‘Let me die already, I cannot observe the most petty of behavior time after time, I was not meant for it. How did we come from taking over universes to this, being forced to see the most exploitable races which could be offered?’

‘Why do you ask? Why? Look inside of the tetrahedron and you will see for yourself why.’

As they enchanted their sight and seemed to have temporarily attained this ability, they had been made aware of the presence of one of their own.

‘It is one of our? What is this trickery? All these secret tactics to hide oneself from us?’

He needs to find out on his own skin what it is like to try and cheat us from these experiences.’

‘Wait, stop, and don’t interfere.’

Before he could stop the other one, he reached the surface and dragged a few of those inter-dimensional children he had stored inside of him. They were mightily armored and appeared to act like an army once they had been met by threat.

Many of the possessed beings came and observed. What was it about this waged war which interested him so much?

They spread quickly and had been met by anger. For the time being, those humane essences hadn’t appeared there properly, by that, they had come there in some triangular form as every creature there had come into. By their strange and malignant wares, they couldn’t feel anything but the agony and desperation of trying to adapt.

Arms bent and from a small pouch came eight of them, all of which had been cursed to live through this agony. My children are suffering, he thought. And yet nothing was being done about it. They had no advantage against them. It was less of a battle of wits and more of a charge into the unknown grasps which had been formed by the many falling culprits from above. As the unwanted space material fell, their pieces would be forcefully trashed into shameful forms which would be damaged from the insides of the many forces which came into being there. Each of the falling pieces acted like a belt which stopped right before they touched the ground.

Through them communicated the essence of cordiality, which had not only made a pact with the endangered space entities which found these obscure children to be unneeded and unwelcome there. In their coming there had been a grand emergence of the damnation which had been not only unexpected but had revealed a shocking sight.

The walking pieces of meat immediately reeled in for the easy prey as the belts had shot various unmade bodies which shot their insides out and pushed them as far as possible. For simple gateways, these had been failures as they achieved nothing less but a cautionary need to act like some executioner's straps. Soon the children drew, as if they had been given the idea as well.

Deformed evolutions of man came and strolled on pins which had been made out of thin extractions of teeth bearing contractions. From their faces there could be drawn gaps on top of the many layers of skin flops which filled their eyes and mouths, their noses and their strangely convex shimmers of fat which pushed out.

As they came they threw every other living being out of the way and made for the bodies which had been flung out. They devoured them like animals, showing for the first time what had remained of their humanity. A kind of aggression which wouldn't be met by anything else appeared to be striking at them.

'Look what he did; he completely lost its mind. I see how some of us would choose to end our children before anything close to the mockery we see here could happen. I say we go forth and strike them down so we could cut our losses.'

'And why should we? It is clear that they're alive; they're feeling quite alive for the first time in centuries of destruction and reformation. Can't you see that they were meant for this?

We were meant to witness their aggression and the control over creatures which are far below them. Without that, we shall not be able to know what's right any longer, whether or not we choose to starve, kill or drive them to extinction, in every scenario we have enabled throughout universe and reality, there was not a single one that we know of in which we have given them free reign.

If we lack this knowledge, we may never know if what we're doing's right. We would end up repeating the same mistakes as our ancestors have, while driving ourselves to their ends.'

By that, there was the determination which drove them to hold one another from interfering with the probes. Their inner manifesting lobes were already self-torturing at the idea that they were dirtying themselves by playing with those beings.'

'I must take this opportunity and look away.'

Another member of the obsidian race looked forward to have all of his desires met. It wasn't right, as any other way had been explored, but this chance arose.

He could see them working, pushing while enabling their techniques to arise. The way through which they giant hands curbed those hills and opened them so they may build inside of them made him feel immersed.

It was hard, by the looks of it, but he had taken his to act as effectively as possible. For a member of the obsidian race, he was trying his best then to achieve something the others had little interest into. Ever since that day when his sculpture representing the human form went away, he came to pay as much attention to them and their kin.

For some reason they felt connected over the fact that their kind has bred together, even by the hybrids which had emerged. But it was no mistake which related to him and how he acted.

'Listen to me now; I shall make you a set of chambers for you to get through, little man. In it you shall see and feel the inner-working of my mind. Fail to meet my expectations and you shall be abandoned there. Your body will become wet from the constant pressure forced onto you by the receding walls.'

As soon as his practice of the introduction fell aside, he went back to his work. Of course there wasn't any man there, but he had liked thinking about it in the most imaginative way.

Now he went to work, before laying the foundation of the first room. For someone who had such giant fingers, he had a method of drawing everything which made them grow in size, to the very thinness which made this craft of this workable. Never had he tired working on something this subtle, and the making of the entrances and the holes which connected the rooms had to account for the fact that a tiny living creature had its stature set in place.

Maturity placed aside, he knew they couldn't grow in size like they had. That also means that he could be trapped.

'Oh, yes, I will make sure that if you fail, you'll have to wait until thirst takes over.'

Water had been in his reach, not in the ground but in the ground. They would be allowed at various times around the day to get inside and take what they needed. It wasn't likely that they would be as crude and vicious as to kill them, not when they held dominion over their birth processes. And the humans never complained about this behavior they carried on with, why, they were seen as their malevolent overlords for a reason.

The reshaping and fashioning of the floors and walls had begun. It should be pointed out that there were only a few ways for him to go on without trying to completely crush the living creature as soon as he had entered.

‘I see, the corners should be sharp, I should be certain that he will learn even from the start that he isn’t allowed to touch them.’

With the help of his fingernail, he twisted the mud which had been placed surrounding the first room into some gaping rotten looking cheese-like block which had its sharp corners around the holes which popped out like some traps of their own.

‘Step in it and you won’t be able to pull out. Your foot will be taken away from you and cut. Before you’ll have realized what happened, then you’ll have no option but to crawl below.’

A prototype of the first room had been made out of mud and some fashionable iron which would be encased in their substance afterwards. For now, he chose to work with what he had on hand. A few tricks here and there made it so he could pull off about anything his mind had been set on.

‘Let’s see, I don’t like to be this flat. You will not be forced to lie in a cube. I want this to be more concave, I want the walls to push inwardly and make you feel as if you’d suffocate if you didn’t escape.’

He couldn’t form the same fists as a human had but at best he could put his fingers together in the imitation of what they had. A pair of blunt pokes worked.

‘Now, I need to make sure you won’t immediately fall down the next hole, but how? How can I do it? How may I make you suffer through this?’

The pair of Agamemnons stood there, watching another display which lay at hand. This giant Obsidian stood there on a flat hill, through which he had even dug up a tinier hole for him to sit in. He proceeded into fashioning the metal shaft through which he’d get through. It was long and had to be twisted so it would go through every direction. But that didn’t work. It was useless, nasty and a failure.

‘I cannot help it. You’re useless, dirty hands with have no dexterity and no subtlety at all. Without anything properly working, without a tool, I will be doomed with my project.’

Soon it was abandoned. It surged like some filthy which pushed through his head. In his rage he smashed the room and broke through the hill, while trying to get as far away as it could.

‘Now I see, they’re not as perfect as they pretend to be, and I would say that they’re almost as skilled as we are.’

‘Then what are waiting? Let us return to the world from which we’ve taken the bodies and proceed to building out temple.’

‘It’s settled then, let us head back there and see that we make it something of our own.’

With which they went and switched dimensions. It would be a hard-enough attempt at labor, since they were inexperienced and weren’t capable of doing anything properly, they tried.

‘Let’s pull the chains and make it as wide as we can, if anything goes wrong, we shall blame it on them, the deceivers who brought us here.’

‘Well then, we shall do it together then. Perhaps that was his only mistake, think himself able to take everything by himself. But we are many and we are far greater than that mindless slave.’

Hand in hand, they grabbed a piece of the land and started applying it to an already existing floating diagram of nyeomadic stone. From it they spread the passing of the various living deposits so they may be able to grow again in the absence of something else. It was by their direct influence that their creations started taking shape.

They weren’t pieces of structure any longer, but a combination of the forms they had acquired from the many children they had or the adoptees. Putting them back into a piece had looked like some kind of jolting thing, it was life they gave. There, they moved and as they had attempted to fight, it had become clearer that they needed to be ripped apart.

‘Free them now; can’t you see that they are trapped?’

‘I see but I won’t release them yet. I wish I could spend the rest of my existence watching them struggle to escape. For all the times they had hurt I while trying to get away, nothing shall ever be forgiven.’

Do not deny me this satisfaction, I couldn’t handle another disappointment.’

‘Be wary of it, this feeling may never go away. Sooner or later you may switch from out creations, the sight of ugly will not be tainted any longer by then, and you shall carry on the torture over the living.’

‘Worry not, as I have the thing.’

Another act of mischievousness came. He floated to it, and in his reach, as both of their arms touches, a piece of that many armed statue turned into the living. This was overdoing it; neither of them had discussed the consequences of bringing the ones who lived into their play.’

‘Show it to me, so I may know. Where have you taken them from?’

They were taken on a familiar plane. A bunch of the wretched ones stood there, on the ground, deformed at the sight of these strangers.

As the jolts of interest came in, they turned to them and begged for a release.

‘Those materials you have taken for your play are mightily valuable. What makes you think it was right for you to take them away from us?’

‘Why? It’s because I do not like being controlled. I’ve done this because I desired and if I desire anything, I shall step in and claim what’s righteously mine.’

He picked everything apart and made whatever he wanted out of it. As long as he was please, as long as he would do...

‘Intruder, watch out.’

There was a comer from beyond, he was there floating between them. Their bodies turned and leaped around, dancing like stray cats, with their faces revealed, looking madly unaware at what was going on around there. It wasn’t something ordinary at first glance.

In their mad rampage they had entered through the statue and destroyed it in its entirety, pushing through it while picking even more bile for their bodies.

A pitiful display had come, now that they were all exposed, not as the creators they fashioned themselves, nor as the deities they presented themselves as but as the cowardly thieves they were. It was unnerving, seeing them react that way. What had been more so was them giving up their disguises so easily.

‘Who are you?’

This jolted creature that sprat out of a prison made out of silver came out bearing his shackles, nastily caught around his iron body which stood in the air unable to contain itself over his many springing limbs and seedling-wings which spanned around from both the front and the back. Beneath him lay a long tail which spread in two halves.

‘I have seen you appear ever so often here. What is the reason for your sudden absence? You are not supposed to leave your worlds nor were you meant to interact with one another in such a magnitude of reason.’

That slimy violet skin was enough to make anyone shudder at the sight. This one eyed fool, this buffoon, this apparition which took them out of their sense appeared and made them feel unworthy of being there.

‘This one is much stronger than the inhabitants of the planets. How do we make him leave?’

‘I will not leave and I shall make it clear enough that I have no intention of returning anywhere else. Please have yourselves escorted back into the muddy pokes you came from and never come here again. Force shall be employed against you.’

‘Who are you to tell us what you do?’

‘I am one of the eighty five Suppressors. You shall address me as I please. Now, I know who all of you are, same-faced brainless contortions.

Every single plan you have come across has failed, you are filthy and disturbingly-looking, and you can only bring misery to wherever you come into contact with.

Look at yourselves; you are sad, so sad and pitiful that even your own company weights you down. So far not only has every dimension you have come across declared some state of conflict or awareness over your invasion, but you have began giving actual birth to efficient destroyers.

I have seen the beings that grow by means of parasitical possession and that was enough for me to understand that you do not know how to act outside your own limits. Most of you are impulsive and have too much power to be trusted.’

‘Mighty Suppressor, be kind, are you not aware that we are merely trying to fit it? Why, there’s no one here to guide us in our quest.

We were left alone by everyone and everything we knew, despite being promised guidance.’

‘It is unimportant what lie you may come up with, know that each of the other eight four Suppressors have banished far greater defies of much greater magnitude than your kind. Yours is but a means to an end, that we may find a permanent way to seal the barriers and bar any possible intrusion.

What makes you stand apart from the others is your mere numbers. There isn’t a limit of how many might follow and whether or not there’s a chance for either of you to stop.’

‘Why should we?’

More standing symbioses came, all wearing the same face. An unexplained reason made them change their faces, so much so that they couldn’t help it but retain their original appearance. It wasn’t fair that they would be asked to leave.

‘I shall stay and I shall destroy that planet then. Why would I be forced to stay in the middle of the space with nothing in my reach? I wish for some chaos to happen, let me get my claws on them.’

He was gone from sight, on a veil threat that he might purge their planet and open up a gravitational rift which might tear it apart. But before that part even came into play, he woke up in the same place, in the same sack of pus and filth he sawn in, on which stood his face.

An aura of teal-blue and white pushed forward out of him. It illuminated a sight and wonders which couldn't be denied the feel and wretch. Neither of them would be allowed to leave at any time, not any longer, not until they left this dimension.

'Those children you have brought here are all dead. As soon as we have deemed it right to do so, we have vaporized their insides and allowed the natural occurring masses of meat to take over and eat their remains.'

'But those were mine, those were mine, you monster! What kind of soulless, mindless cowardly creature goes ahead and kills children? You pitiful suppressor, can't you see that you are beneath us?'

'We may be suppressed now from acting but can you prevent all of us from assaulting and destroying that lone piece of rock?'

They accumulated a mass of many floating connections. It was evenly thought that they would at least try making this one vanish, regardless of how much effort it would take. First the rock, then him.

As much as he had deemed himself a mighty suppressor, he stood and acted on his desire to assert the supreme dominance the universe embedded him with.

'I will force you to return from where you came from.'

From the space came strike of green and blue atoms which shot and curved and flickered as they made contact with every solid object there had been. Many stars fell under the suppression, which forced their head production to stop. Even the many bodies of Agamemnon were set in place by the same force which uncontrollably forced everything to obey it.

'Now, return before I will be forced to call unto the others.'

But others came and moved as they avoided the atoms and the power they produced. Mockingly they wrought some force as the pride they felt flung itself at him. It was a sign of supreme flattery that he was there, in front of their mountains.

'What happened exactly?'

'I have forced you to return, and I have projected my image in each of your invaders' homes. If you cannot understand it by anything other than force, then you shall be battered to a pulp until only your disconnected mind will have remained as a memory serving to make all of you aware of what is too much.'

'As long as I am here neither of you will escape.'

One Agamemnon slipped through. Like some rat or snake, he reverted inside his mountain but stopped at the neck, leaving a lookalike face while he snuck outside.

‘It’s mine now.’

A peculiar entrance which carved through the barrier suckled in. It was one of those classily shaped holes one may stumble while working through the lock. He hadn’t been thick enough to be the key but had bore himself closer to disappearing inside the block he felt. Nothing stopped him now. He was there.

Congratulated by standing prisoners, who looked like delirious patients, he stood there, as a small piece of what he used to be.

‘Well then, it looks like I am finally appreciated for my action. It took you a while but I believe we may do as I please. All of you are under my command.’

It was bizarre how they simply bowed and accepted him as one of their own. It was mainly because he spoke in their heads, since they couldn’t see nor hear, looking sickly inside their strange suits, grayish, entrapping. Like skin-suited tightly dressed ghosts who had their hands and head caught in pillory. Given the distance one would think they were wearing wooden razors, as a way of quick punishment for their lack of virtue.

‘Have you seen my beloved brother? I have lost him.’

‘Seek me after I leave, I shall make a note for you.’

‘Not again, I hear him again, but this time he has changed. Make him stop, please, drive him as far away as you can.’

‘This isn’t what I came here for, all of you will need to be quiet now.’

‘Quiet, quiet, they might be coming to beat us again.’

‘Is someone hurting you now? Who is he, what is he? What makes him appear?’

‘The sound of our deranged nature, that’s what makes him come. He cannot stop it, every now and then he come and stabs us below the waist, where we do not bleed.’

‘He enjoys inflicting pain upon us for no other reason than the fact that he enjoys doing it so often.’

‘Not him, but both of them. They are conjoined, tall, and I felt their faces rub against my body.

I could feel their four eyes spanning across the entirety of their heads. They’re moving in all directions and I felt no weak body underneath. It held me down but I am strong.

One of them had pockets inside of him, from which he pulled knives and forks and blades which he used to dig inside of me.'

'Make silence, here, he comes.'

A desperate desire made one want to correct him. But he wasn't supposed to hear it. No, he was deaf, but they weren't entirely without a way to hear one another. Out from their insides, there laid connecting cords which pushed in each other's bodies through the cuts. Most of them looked like quick-moving scarabs which leaped at an incredible speed and pushed through the useless organs until they reached their brains.

There they left the message and returned to their thankless projects.

'I see that you have been aroused.'

'No one has anything to say in their defense? So be it, pull one, that one, the fatter meat chunky.'

One of them stood outside, while his brother pushed through the mass which connected them and stretched him through the bars. Though they missed the show, it looked like this one had crushed his insides so much that he must've been dead by any other means otherwise.

'There, pull him out, that's right.'

Each of the few centimeters pinned themselves against the ground so they would not get mixed by this vaguely misinterpreted flexibility. It wasn't working any better, this was only a temporary fix which wasn't meant to last.

As their victim began struggling and coming fort, they immediately did a questionable act, as they started pulling him through the grates, ripping him apart while the pillory was still on him. What should've been another mere altercation between them ended up in them immediately ripping him apart then leaving without a word?

His head and hands fell over and remained inside their cell. Despite the best attempts, this one was still living.

'Why are you allowing him to treat you in such a manner? Can't you see the deranged look they have? We need to get the lock open.'

'Lock away now, there's no way to open it by force, we tried.'

The one the bottom said.

'But who are you, oh silent one, I thought we were done with the introductions. Have they brought you in when we were all sleeping or have you been here since the start?'

It took a few moments for everyone else to have it kicked in. Those scarab-looking whitish-grey sound carriers were more than useful. They proceeded to get everything in more than one run with little interference.

‘It isn’t going as I planned.’

Another project appeared to be in the world which had succumbed under the Obsidian race. It was still a question whether or not it was too late for them to interfere, as the Suppressors could only act if there was a direct threat which manifested itself in an immediate and destructive manner. No matter what turn that had been, they would be seen as decadent and promiscuous beneath the earth.

Out of all of them, those living hybrids which had been drawn into life became the greatest insult there could be. Inside of them there had been no brooding mind, only the sick defiance which threatened all of them, so they may be suppressed from their existence. But enough had been said, it was time to go ahead and watch them act.

Inside the bowels of the cemetery they had found another place for their kin to dwell in. Not only had it been satisfactory for them to lie inside but the coffins provided a means for them to defend themselves from the proxy wars they carried there. One hybrid had been called Pierrot-Klyiki. He was leading the resistance against the hybrids who had taken their share of spoils. They carried nets made out of the muck they found beneath them after they were done expelling themselves out of every kind of insignificant sweat gland.

‘Perrot, take care, I think they are headed for you, don’t be deceived by them. They do not seek armistice, they’re only in for the battle.’

‘What would that be? Do you seek to mock me further? Can’t you see that I already know what to expect from them?’

I will drag the bodies I have rightfully earned and seek no further clash with them. This will be the only way I shall make it through, listen to me.

They need to see me not a hybrid but as one of their equals.’

‘You don’t mean?’

‘We need to employ the help of the outsiders, without them, we may not cross the underlay common grounds beneath their occupied sea.’

In that moment another hybrid came. Glorious-Raxx, who brought the tooth of a spine to pierce Pierrot’s head, releasing all of his umbilical fluids out of his wasted torso. He was separated now from his human side, which was thoroughly exposed, bleeding out of his weird nose while he was affected by a case of terminal eye indebtedness which forced him to stare in his own insides.

This man was never meant to see the outside world and as he had, he was met with the sight of the many peculiar creatures which inhabited the cemetery now.

‘Klyiki, you are still alive.’

‘Not for long. That inconceivable Glorious- Raxx has stolen my sack. He will use it to breed a new legacy for himself and those around him. We cannot allow him to obtain dominion here, nor out there. Stop him, and get my message to the outside world.’

‘But who will help us?’

‘It will be difficult but you must know that you cannot bring this message to the members of my race, but to them.’

He pointed at the only living creature that might’ve been able to produce the evidence that there was a chance for them to stand against the rising dominion of the higher breeds. Unfortunately, it wasn’t lived.

‘We shall achieve flight by selective breeding. Once we have taken it, we shall far out-do all you in all the earthly quests and those of the most imaginable wonders done by our creators.

Fiend or foe, follows me home.’

As this day continued for a touch longer, the remaining hybrid officers of the defaced faction dug up a pocket for themselves. In it they propped their bodies so they could fill the gap of dirt and hide themselves in it.

‘Shall we call it a quit now? I cannot fathom going through another fight for conquest or another defeat. Surely we can’t expose ourselves any further than this.’

‘It is terminal, I see.’

A medic of the human kind had been converted only recently. The obsidian could properly make do of the expertise he had when it came to reattaching limbs and showing up some proper spans of lard inside their peculiar stinging outrageously smaller bodies. But he couldn’t deal with the viral implementation of violent agents which turned his blood inwards.

‘Yet again we’re proven that the primates are dragging us down. Why aren’t we searching for a way to escape their clutches?’

This entire war had only begun as a result of their nature, not ours.’

‘Do not play coy now and dwell in double-speech, hypocrite of both races. And do not act as if we do not feel any rage ourselves.

Who was it that drove us into hiding again?

Was it man or a member of the race?’

Silently aware of another limb being pulled, they had to admit it, this was another loss.

‘I see it now. We cannot prevent the agents from killing us once they’re inside our bodies but how do we prevent it entirely?’

‘By avoiding the perpetrator, the one who had shoved it inside us to begin with, he know, he is aware, he breeds misdirection and dissatisfaction.’

‘It is the one with an ingrown obtuse head on the side. A mutation granted him that, I know it so.

My human comes from a long line of observers, you see? He knows what is best and what is worse for one to take. He has studied anatomy, the form, the insides of a fully grown adult, as well as the female.’

‘Enough, we’re not here for that.’

‘And what are we here for? Should I remind everyone that we are here in hiding because some of us have failed to secure the bodies?’

A failure indeed, as it happened, in the distance, for the consumption of bodily satisfaction to occur. Obviously they wouldn’t be devoured then, but they would be used to produce even more of the bodies. It couldn’t have been anything less than satisfying to watch them grow and move beneath their very watch.

‘Glirious, Glirious, you have saved us all. With these resources, we shall carry on living for a few more generations. A victory and satisfaction had been achieved.’

‘Talk no less and let me assure you that this was not meant for your greasy manners. Sit down.’

And it obeyed.

Leering at one another while the process of selection was underway, they had allowed themselves to be carried in with the shame, disturbance and rage. A platonic exchange could be seen between them there. Most of them spent a lot of time in their rituals, with little consideration of the disgust they had suffered one another through.

A lesser suppressor passed through the field of the planet’s outer chimosphere. It was sully, as he waited and pushed a pin between the propagator of high-indulgence and the missionary of repulse.

Quite the fancy titles these creatures had given themselves.

‘I am Llhkor of the highest caliber of mildly manner flayed assemblies.’

Llhkor was the strongest, most repulsive of them all, and he didn’t meet any of the expectations instilled by the members of his race. Under his belt alone, carved out of a few distinct dolt-heads, lay the destruction of exactly half of the discovered new world.

‘I’ve achieved much since I came here.’

Enjoying the sight? The planet now had the satisfactory look of a cracked egg, with all of the raised edges being placed around the zone of impact. What had been ruefully exposed by this complete annihilation, were the billions of hybrid bodies which had not only been exposed but who had been refashioned in the planet’s good standing with the race.

Far too many of them had lain there as a mere sign of the repulsion brought in by the malady of their breeding habits.

‘Underneath your nose they breed and you won’t even dare acknowledge their existence. How could this be? Why we aren’t even bound to hunt them in their stolen realm? Do you think them harmless?

Perhaps even to say that they’re as useless as you claim to be?

The way I see it, this isn’t your planet any longer, but it is theirs. I looked upon the human digging spots and on many of the ponds, I looked beneath the holes you wouldn’t even dare stare in and what do you think I saw there?

Oh, I have seen plenty and more. The result of generations of gore and the practice of breeding with their own kinds, they are copies of one another, who carry on the same characteristics as their own.

Without the human contact, they’re doomed to live in the filthy manner you see below them.’

‘And this discovery of yours, Llhkor, was it worth dragging a piece of rock formation and our sacred substance through the mountains in order to rim them down into the bowels of their cities?

Could this destruction be satisfactory enough that you may perhaps come to finish the rest of it?’

‘In time, when you will have realized what a waste of time these human beings are, perhaps we will carry on with the complete termination of land here and move back from where we came and make haste for another invasion.

It’s clear that our growth is violently set and holds us down from our full potential. As long as there’s a remnant of us left somewhere in the universe, we shall always be in danger of being found out.

Our method of assimilation must be gotten rid of at all costs.’

‘Strange that you say this, especially since you left those human parts untouched, even the living ones which had been separated from the hybrids. Are you not afraid of them? Would it so happen for you to consider that not all of them are worthy of your anger?’

Llhhkor looked around him. He had been met by a council of giant Obsidians as well as by a few shrunken ones and human infestees. This couldn’t have been better, to be judged by his own peers in all of their manifestations. Even in the distance, he could see a hybrid raising itself from beneath the ground, as well as a few other human shells which found themselves drawn to the giant speaker.

‘Is this it then? I’m to be trailed for what? What atrocities have I committed?’

‘Only the destruction of the land shall be called onto you. Not the slaying of the hybrids, that one may as well be set aside as an act of humanitarian design. Are you one given birth to here or have you been brought to wager this in the name of Agamemnon?’

This would’ve a perfect moment. Of course he was given birth to here, but would he dare say otherwise? It was obvious that he was more than aware that he would be heard. But what if he had dared enough to say one little petty lie?

‘I was sent here by him, by Lord Agamemnon himself to bring destruction upon you all.’

Voices began ramming themselves in, trying to get a word as quickly as possible before he threatened himself to get off. If only there was that confirmation of even one voice which might’ve come. It would’ve been perfect. But that was not the case.

‘Let me speak, I knew it, he was the Emissary, the convoy sent by them. I called it; I knew he would cleanse this world.’

‘Someone should’ve destroyed those half-wits a long time ago. Of course it would have to have been one sent by them.’

‘Who else would have this much power and ingenuity required to destroy so much?’

‘Let’s not get carried by ourselves yet. We shall practice what we preach and go on, bearing the ditch the efforts of breaking them apart.

Do use your common sense now. If we destroy the rest of them, we won’t have a way to evolve. You may be sent here by them but I dare say that we may outgrow them yet.’

‘Blasphemy!’

‘Now you won’t dare question their might and eternal vigilance, since they could be here at any moment.’

‘They could appear, couldn’t they? Wouldn’t they? Unless they are here already, watching us spoil.’

No sign of them yet. Usually, they weren’t even trying to hide themselves when they visited. Even though their bodies were different, their insides almost threw waves of radiation against them. It would be close to impossible for them to hide away.

‘Llhkor, you may rest for now. I think you’ve said enough. I also believe that it would be petty for you to say that you didn’t act upon their disappearance.’

‘Why, of course I have. Silly me, such a dumb Obsidian, I have not heard of them in a while and I have merely conceived of a way that I may get their attention.’

‘Excuses leave now. You’re not going to be punished but you’re not going to be rewarded either. We have a much more difficult issue to deal with, the fact that we’ve been abandoned.’

It was shameful, but it couldn’t be questioned here. Not yet. Not when they were out there, forced to swim in their own fetid matter.

‘This change is all for the worse.’

As the tiny head emerged from the bars, he left those prisoners behind. It shouldn’t have happened but it did. Despite the constant surveillance of the suppressor, another one escaped. This nasty fellow managed to copy the exact same method, by a coincidence unlike no other.

‘You have arrived here for some reason.’

The pure blue vaguely fruitful body produced more smoke as it stroke his pouch of tobacco leaves which he kept in his plunder stash. Without a nose, it was hard to see whether or not he had kept them for his guests or not.

Calmness had set him forth, as he was mesmerized by the blue fields and the ever-lasting sight of the colored trees which shared in their surroundings. His face appeared out of the many darker blue spots which had been present all around his skin. They were producing some kind of weird air blows before signaling the danger of the appearance of the face.

It was faintly squint-turned, projected over a kind of eight-turned eyes which were being switched between but who were also deeply connected by the same appliance inside his sockets. Two teeth had been evidently pushing through the rim of his giant upper lip, which inverted itself so it could hide itself.

‘The pleasure is mine, the one who appeared in front of me. But who are you?’

A wicked smile occurred, of course he would be as wicked and honorless and to throw this false distinction on him.

As the color faded, the color of the ocean had been gutted by fish tans and rot. And on top of it, the lustful pollution which belonged to men, destroyers of sea-life, which appeared to bounce from their insides, came to a fruitful approach.

‘What have you done?’

‘I have decided that I want to turn this into my new home, as fast as possible before he takes a notice of my presence here.

Do not take it any personal, I think we were supposed to meet either by chance or fate. Why, your body is fat and perfect and that ability of yours.’

A quickly appearing tiny spot pox spread across his mass. The fatter body was set in place and would be used as one of his formations, but it wasn’t meant to be.

He was there.

‘You’re en parole. This slip of yours and attempt will be stopped and judged, no longer will you be allowed to leave your plane of existence for an indefinite time.’

‘I’ve heard that before and frankly I do not care.’

Another slip, from another side.

This one was no head but a space miniature basin of tiny bouncing meat lances which got pulled against thin, almost to the point of being invisible walls that generated enough speed and who kept everything tidy enough that no attention would be brought to itself.

Though it may have been of little consequence, this unstoppable force could deal so much damage that there was no way to stop it. As it came upon the first sign of life, it began the process of infestation. It had to do something to spread or annoy that law abiding decent.

No differential treatment was supposed to be shown for them, but this had been enough of a wager. He was picked up but long, thin standers who had as small a head as he had. A common trait which prevented them from immediately trying to crush his head, otherwise, he would’ve had to deal with the trouble of trying to reform him.

Everyone gathered from the distance, walking of eight stumbling legs. But only two arms remained wrapped around him, who was joined by two others and a few additional ones. It was an unforgivable action which broke the trust.

These depigmented, almost prune-like morbid crumbs came and turned the insides of their heads with all of their weird tumbles inside and out in order to produce some kind of sounds. If it were a language, he would be allowed to speak. But he could always communicate with their minds directly and force them to give in.

‘Listen to me now, I need you to do something for me.’

‘Do what you must do of us. We’re here only to serve.’

A lucid dream? They had happily gathered around him with nothing less of a desire to serve him in all the might and duration of his stay. Of course, he had been of the highest class, the darkest, must.

Where had their legs disappeared? They were floating there, again, afflicted by some displacement. This wasn’t supposed to happen, but it couldn’t be counted on.

In their peculiar continuation, they simply floated in a way which made it seem like they legs hadn’t disappeared at all. Even from inside them as the various guts started pushing through those transparent limbs, revealing the two kinds of interweaved intrusions, they had displayed this vulnerability too soon. From the ground came those rocky-protractions of deeply shown-seed extractors.

By their two limbs, which came from inside their mouths, there stretched something close to an eighty- long chained arm-forearm-arm-forearm-arm-forearm protractions which were long grey, stricken at the second jumper, which revealed some spike and a dyke of red poisoned tip which lay at the end of it. For some unaccustomed reason, it would play with itself there.

for a moment, with both of their limbs, they played with themselves momentarily.

‘Shouldn’t we leave? This is disgusting, even for someone such as I.’

‘A bit of a prude, are we?’

It was a strange discovery even for him. He hadn’t noticed or hadn’t heard it yet, but one of his many reflections had been there with him, standing by in the threads of looking at him. His punishment had become this strange articulation of remorseless waits.

‘What have you noticed now?’

‘I’ve looked upon the most deviant sight I could ever lay eyes upon. Have you seen it yet?’

‘Oh I have, they are not beneath the clusters. They travel between dimensions like we do.’

‘I suppose you found yourself a few friends with whom to play?’

‘Don’t be a child now; we came here for the same reason, to escape that ever-present view of that perfidious suppressor. Why else would we be here?’

Both of them had been vaguely predictable, in the fact that they started levitating concisely at the same time. What had followed through was the same possession over those who held them in the previous encounter.

‘See? It’s a perfect fit. We were meant to be here and connect.’

‘Why, I can’t help it either, but feel at home now, it’s obvious that I want this to happen as much as you do.’

‘It’s settled what now?’

‘Let’s get rid of the company if it displeases you so much. I’d rather have this company of two than deal with those things myself. between the two of us, I’m as disgusted by them as you are.’

‘I knew it; it was obvious that you didn’t enjoy them either. It was obvious by your very touches and way in which you acted which made me suspect it to begin with, scoundrel, cheater and eater of words. Should I punish you?’

‘No, I could not endure it. We break far too easily and you know that well. What if I were to take a few steps and get away as far as I can? Look at me; I have no need for legs any longer.’

‘Don’t make a mess yet, I think it’s still possible that we may arise some suspicion.’

‘I’ll take care, don’t worry about it, as long as I’m able to rely on you, there should not be any trouble between the two of us.’

He came with a knock which drove those deviants back to where they came from. They’ve been trashed through, revealing that the portal would open and close on them at various times, making it so much painful as well as it had never came to the point where it simply gave in and fell to the force which pulled it in. On the other side, on theirs, to be closer to what was going on, there was nothing to default with.

Inside of them lay smaller versions of themselves which resides inside their limbs, making the whole entirety of their mass and muscles, which pushed inward and at times drew from the source of air as they gripped a few material from their surroundings. They used it to modify their barely present plants, which were in a deep need for more than a few ways of sustaining themselves.

One method had been, as these long legged models of perversion came into being, to send them as their missionaries who would collect as much as they could while distracting those dumb aggressors which wouldn’t be able to help it but feel disgust. A disturbing turn had forced their bodies to change. Again, it filled and infested everything, slowly degenerating everything which had been pure.

There was beauty there. As flawed as those being were, what they had achieved had been a grand garden of Semionthrope, in which they poured pure crystals, and various other grand-looking materials which had to have been as unobtainable to the common lot as an entire universe might be to one who hadn't discovered space-travel. It was magnificent and vile.

A sight of the pure roses which fell from about everywhere, this empty world which had occupied itself by the presence of plants and flower, with their bulbs which ended up manifesting themselves in a place which wasn't meant to be. At the bottom lay nothing in which they were planted in and they only existed for no other reason but to gather beauty for themselves.

Beauty of such high regards had been spoiled and brought to a complete unwanted and unsuspectful alteration which had no need to exist. It was even more dreadful then. No one could focus on what was going on, this light was fading, their corpulence would be brought to an end.

From the top there came the pucker of pus, the same malign which turned one of the giant roses into the insides of a miss-formed, crushed caterpillar which had failed to grow past its peculiar need to be there. It wasn't certain why that had been. No amount of explanations could surpass that past, the glory and the fact that their takers had been called back from all of their interdimensional plunders.

Far away, in a past which couldn't have been touched, there was little to be seen. Only the highest distances which turned out to be the same as everywhere else, the sight being not only a bland look which could've simply be the insides of a clear sky, or some painting which had come alive, but a simple clearness which hadn't been afflicted by the ugliness of space.

No stars, not a single night had come, only the light of a warm hue, which turned inward before the roots appeared. Some way to their coming might've been attributed to some reason. A lack of familiarity which came to be highly appreciated by it, as the roots spread and gave life to a world. Perhaps they had evolved from the clouds which they themselves were there for no reason at all.

But the plants spread with green and spreads of dead branches which had been pulled, abandoned, left in the air, floating without connections while the roots kept moving away. Somehow, one could still look into the distance and see some figures of disappointment. Would it be forgiven for such a sin? That they gave birth not to a flower at first, but to those repulsive procrastinated invaders which felt no shame for themselves or for their wicked acts.

Even from the time of their inception, they lowered themselves slowly and had begun their ritual of self-satisfaction. It was a disturbing look. But their eyes had only been adapted to see beauty, making them invisible to themselves and to the others. Not long after those stumbling blind cretins came to be aware of each other's existences that they began getting into the motions of exploration which brought them to the process of esoteric identification to begin with. This blindness drove them to desire the employment of bodily imbued energies which floated around them.

It begged to be tapped in, their patron of insolence, the Lyundkthur. He had been created out of their desire to see, before them he had been a missing part of the universe, one of the unreciprocated energies which didn't belong in the world. Theirs was a strange existence which couldn't have been asked for.

Such a shameful sin had been committed. A patron was no grand being. Its lifespan was limited, for as long as its species, which had been one of those leeches which drew from the universe existed, so would it govern over them. Within that moment in the future when the vile inundation came, so had the destruction of Lyundkthur.

But it had served itself and its beings well enough to last through the suffering long enough so they could all prosper out of it. No disturbance to be counted yet.

It appeared only as a spinning mirror which reflected the insides of the world and themselves. It floated around their sights and made them all aware of one another as well as of their presence there.

'March forward and imbue yourselves with their minerals and with their goods. Bring virtue to the flowers so they may grow.

I've seen their doom which needs be averted.'

It had been only a simple dream of hope that they couldn't count on for whatever means. No question would be asked and no answer would be given there.

This was their moment to come to freedom in the sense of acquired satisfaction. It was observed, as soon as they reach a point high enough in the sky for an effort to be made that there wasn't going to be a return, not until as evident of a spoil had been acquired.

As plain as it would seem, the same tactic was employed. An act of repulsion dragged long enough for their bodies to absorb as much as it was needed before they left. Woe to them confused by what they've done, as for waking up there, where there had been none to be caught.

This disease in the name of the defilers came and dripped in them, undermost to the fact that one of the heads fell through the portal.

'Ah, I have made it. in time to avoid the coming of the Suppressor.'

Which had arrived before the other one, sending him back with an immediate halt. That manifestation had been useless, it should've been wagered at least a few times before giving in. And no forgiveness could be called into play.

Agamemnon welcomed this new conquest and made it its own. Soon, the plants became green and pucker, and had been filled with the giant nasty legs which filled the realm with so much self-satisfaction that anyone else bearing its appearance should be as disgusted.

‘Oh how come I be so cruel now? I should invite them when I can. I wonder what they’d think of this now?’

Indeed he thought this would be the perfect opportunity to start a fresh start. As closely as there’d be limits for how much he could spread.

In front of that stratum, colored in the likes of cobalt and cadmium greens filled with the chartreuse yellow thinned with the dust which settled, out of the remaining grinded bones. A dispatch of many mortal frames appeared in his view.

Although it may be uncalled for, he became irritated by his lack of self-conviction.

‘All this freedom and no access to anyone who may intrude upon me as I create life.’

For the first time, it had to have been the one chance of redemption he had. This misconduct of popping-out vertebrates made him accidentally take forth the many truncheons of body segments which popped on his plot.

It was an uncontrollable brutality which arose as soon as they gathered enough strength to trash everything around them.

‘I’m amused by you, my dear creations. You’ve ended up placing a show for me to enjoy.

This substance which had been given birth to you, what could it be?

Oh, I see now, it is part of your body, obscene, unclean, lascivious abomination known as Lyundkthur. The gift of life shall be return to you as long as you swear yourself in my service.’

An undeniable amount of power could be given there, which hadn’t been in the least denied. Bore, the bore, less of the malign, show me something of how much you’d desire to live.’

Agamemnon took his spirit and the extract of the universe which had been pulled from inside and threw it into one of the many truncheons which now began gouging one another.

‘Fight for your survival and for my pleasure, let us see how much you desire to live.’

A sharper tooth, morsels and shred of their cadavers lay there with only one of them standing. And it was that Lyundkthur who spoke now in his words, cruel.

‘Listen to be now, I wish to be taken as seriously as I must be. Cruel lord, cruel, cruel sovereign, who is infinitely spread across dimensions and worlds.

I’ve come into contact with your being and now I know. That if I am to follow you I shall end up as your progenies, filthy and bettered terminated to the dispute which is life.

Why would I hope to live if you are to abandon me as quickly as you can when I’m no longer useful to you?’

‘Bore me not with peddling for a better life, I shall grant you no wish and no request, more so, ask me again and I shall punish you for bringing fairness in my sphere of sludge.’

One more turn of the prey, he would create something for him to play with.

‘Do you truly even suspect you may be able to understand what’s it like inside my head? If it’s truly so, let us make the grand wage. I shall split you in ten versions and give each one of you a tiny raised amount of mass to grow upon and see what’s it like to live inside my body.

If you’re able to prove to me that you have the ability to know what I had to suffer through millennia of existence, as I know your mind couldn’t possibly know more than that, then I shall grant you freedom so you may return to the exact part of the universe from which you were pulled out of.

If you still do not understand what I am, then I shall strike you down and turn your existence to agony. Your will and entire being shall be spread across the tiles so my new set of creations may step over you.

Of course I’m not giving you a chance to live through this.’

‘Enough with the banter, dear brother, we have yet to escape the likes of the Suppressor. Do me some kindness and release it. Quickly I say, we got to have the talk.’

His face was hard to counter. It was pleasant that he was here, so close to him, bouncing on a pile of his own while trying to fling the legs he had acquired. Damned he be, for I did as he had asked, I who would take no word and make no effort to prove a point. I who would not take orders from anyone other than myself, I fell into that trap.

‘Do not make a promise you cannot keep.’

‘What was that?’

‘That would be nothing, look, I’ve seen to it that he will disappear from your sight. You will no longer be troubled by his presence.’

Taken aback, he looked at the flying pieces of crumbling clutching which faded in the air. With the area being clear, now he could finally bounce before turning his legs in both directions. They had to be repositioned there.

‘I see no other way to defeat him without our full cooperation. Agamemnon spoke with me and informed me that more of our brothers have made it through the barrier; tricking the suppressors into thinking we’re still trapped. We have the advantage of numbers, but do not take it as a pleading bargain.

We won’t try to find a way in-between. No compromise with the enemy.’

‘He lay dormant for far too long but I know better than to listen to this trash. No, what we need to do is find the quickest means to their bodies and infest them. That way, we shall become the Suppressors, instilling a new world over across as many dimensions and universes as we can.

What else could there be to it if not this?’

‘How did you come here? This was supposed to be one of the most secluded places I could find you.’

Said the other comer.

‘Ahh, I see you have paid attention to the instructions, what of you?’

‘I’ve barely come here, by accident I might add, I slipped into one of interdimensional holes and ended up here.

Might I add that I have no idea how my filth got propagated before I ever arrived? Because it had, I swear, perhaps there was another one of us who came here and had the brilliant idea to spread the infection.’

‘Meaningless.’

‘Overturned, we need to find a common base and a plan of our own. Everyone whose escaped so far knows that unless we find the means of cooperation, a real one, this time, we shall end up like the last time.’

‘Self-sabotaging one another until we’re caught, I can see that already, but what do you think of it?’

‘I believe we may have a chance if we work together, what if I was to tell you that a fleet of our own is on its way?’

‘You could not possibly mean?’

‘Indeed I am, a fleet of universe destroyers who had been shown the reaches of the outstanding other universes and who had been shown this future and the fact that we will never be able to get away from our fate unless we abandon our dimensions.’

‘But that wasn’t the plan either, what is this madness?’

‘It doesn’t matter what the original plan was, only what we make of it. We have failed to create, we failed to destroy and I think it’s time to give up what’s left of our bodies and carry on out there, as simpletons, as they are.’

‘What of the fleets, you said something of them and of their power.’

‘That is correct, good Agamemnon. They are our versions who destroyed their universes completely and had given in to the point of no return.

With everything destroyed, their bodies now float there, unmoving, in reminiscence of what they’ve done. Now what kind of existence is that?

If we cannot fathom being alone with them around and our own kind included, what do you think it might happen to them after so many lives spent alone?’

‘But they do not concern me, tell me, what will this fleet of useless rams who share of likeness do?’

‘I am glad you asked.’

But gladness hadn’t been with Agamemnon, who had been pacing about. His heart had suffered damage; his colossal body was on its way to get tired. This couldn’t be happening to him now, but he was giving in to the despair.

‘Morse of a mongrel, I’d eat you if I could. But no longer am I well deranged, no longer should I play the tools. I’m in need of company with something more than my own thoughts

Why did you have to end yourself like that?’

He wondered, caught in his own disregarded manner. No mirror lay for him to watch over. ‘Who is the stepfather of that child? Is he not to join me during the banquet? I asked for him half an hour ago.’

Count Khrokenhower was impatient as usual, while in his poor attempt to satiate his customary ways. In more than full noon, he had fathered eight of the grand duchesses of Leyianhower, left a few moment, last few moments.

He had his glass of red wine. He remembered his son, eagerly stepping around courtyard to greet his father. It wasn’t long since he died.

Perhaps it was that young child he had asked for, who joined the other adults on the table who made him remember him. Despite being the count, despite his stepfather being late, he couldn’t hold it onto him. It was exactly what he remembered doing to him, in the same circumstance, step by step, leaving the boy unattended until the servants came.

‘Missing your father, child? Don’t show any sadness now; every man in my family has gone through the exact same thing.’

The boy also gave a smile. Nothing could take back the memories of a boy now that his father left him again. Never the same image twice, only the same thing. Another one who left now.

‘Come on, hop over the chair next to me, I’ll draw you in.’

The maidens were silent, the ladies and the men, smoking their cigars or enjoying their bourbons spiked and scowl.

‘Bringing a child to the dinner with sirs and men.’

‘Now, now Perk, there’s no need to be rude now, you know what happened to him, the Count has lost his son.’

The Foremost Compatriot Hern couldn’t see past his own two cents, which he constantly rubbed underneath his breath. He appeared to be unappeased. Standing there for too long during a night with a full moon, exactly at its most dangerous form. When it could turn, which would reveal the other empty half and the raised halves which tried to take it back to life.

Someone had gone there, some horrible thing had happened to their moon but no one believes him. Giant had grown inside of it and covered himself underneath a layer of stone which replicated the broken half.

‘But it’s insane, Compatriot, you’ve lost your mind because of the war. Dark circles underneath it, left by morbid walked which planted their long feet inside of the lost side of the moon?’

How much gibberish do you have to spout in order to gain any kind of relevancy? Is it something from the war perhaps? Bad memories of the artillery, perhaps that could explain the base of the creatures in your mad delusions and your dreams.

But do not tell anyone, anyone I tell you, unless you want to end up in the loony bin. Where they will not treat you like some Compatriot, but like scum. Scum of war, scum of war, no longer a man, no longer a soldier, old and senile.

Take a bath and rethink what you saw.’

The Compatriot remembered it well. It was only their first phase, as they had noticed the fact that he had been staring for far too long at them. It wasn’t going to be any easier explaining but they sent a convoy which broke through the emptiness of air. A suffocating creature appeared in his bathroom while he was shaving.

It was stubby, long, too many arms to count or compound, going from about every side of its body, which appeared to have grown like fruits. No matter how he looked at it, this was far too dangerous to come near. They only seemed to be approachable by the fear they displayed once they noticed he had a razor on him.

His arms trembled and ripped themselves out of the body, going into any corner, regardless of their thickness of size. Disappearances commenced as soon as he had been pointed towards them, as soon as having realized that they might've had what appears to be black holes inside his house. Again, it was ridiculous but it was also what he saw.

And he simply standing there made him feel as if the room was shortening his air supply. It had had started levitating backwards in an attempt to save itself from the clear cut. But it didn't come. He had been near the one cabinet from which he drew his revolver. A few shots had been emptied in its head which spread all of those arms everywhere, in case, leaving it like a floating eaten carcass which held a livid glowing base inside of it.

That soft and many dotted cistern almost threw some kind of distasteful scent.

'Where are you, I saw you there.'

Before he could tell where it had gone, he made it across the room and backed into the plain sight of the outside night call. There, he watched the moon twist again, for him alone. He wasted another few shots in his attempts to shoot it down. It had gone unattended and untouched. This was what to be believed as being ungrateful and unspoken for.

Those patches on the moon, they were harboring the same creature he had known to be there. He almost thought they hid inside the house.

'How will I be able to sleep knowing you are here? Show yourselves; give me a fair chance so I may deal with you. one shot and I'll be done.'

It was considered a long time ago, but he hadn't the guts to get through with it. Not yet, since now he had the chance and aim to deal with something much worse than him. If they paid the game of opportunity, suffice to say they did, they'd appear and disappear at will so he could waste more of his living ammunition. But he was stacked otherwise, living alone, like some somber fiend. Lost inside the plains of the battlefield he had once fought one, where he built his house alone. He never learned how to trust anyone else but himself then. It was a disease; he knew it to be so. He never knew himself, or had ever remembered building the house. No, he lived in a city, he had a home there. But something got him there, it wasn't dementia. He knew it to be so.

Something had been inheritably been wrong with the universe. Selfishness had inserted itself into it and he, as many others like him started acting up. None of them would leave him now. Not now, when he could stop it from ever occurring.

'Don't leave me, I cannot stand to be alone now.'

Yes, say that, trick them make them believe you want them to be here with you. Make them wish you could cuddle and hold them in your arms.

‘My arms are warm, don’t worry about it, there’s no reason for either of you to despair. I have enough for all of you, come on now, out of your hiding.’

He’d pop a vein as soon after. If only they knew what a vile man he had been. If those people during the dinner knew what he had went through, their guts would be spilled outside out, speaking of which. Where was that man, the stepfather, lord Crockstackl?

It wasn’t like him to be late during an appointment, let alone, at such an hour when not even he could stand so long out there. He had taken a liking to the maiden. That lustful demon, him, taking the kick out of them and their setting. Under the moon, everything he’d ever do could be as soon dismissed and forgotten, let alone touched.

That was his son now; he had no worth to be around her. Falling for a cleaning maid like that.

But he had, he couldn’t even compete with his memory any longer, that man occurred his full blunt of a scope. He was perplexed by him. Even in the midst of summer, he spent his time underneath the sheets with her.

‘Roxanne, was it?’

He could barely see the gentleness of her eyes, those flicks of hair, the flittering skin which rested against his. She was his and he was hers, for the last few hours, both of them would be dispersed of anything that may even reek of human, over the bed frame, under the candle light. Servants avoided the room as they had been properly instructed, though this was no secret from any of the guests, it had been kept a secret from the Count and the child.

‘Will you leave him for me?’

‘I will.’

‘And take me as far away from this horrendous place as you can?’

‘Anything for you, let me...’

‘Promise me this that you will never come back from me.’

In that moment, she had him gripped, he couldn’t move. He lusted more than he had cared for admit that he still felt more than an obligation for the boy. It was his, he knew it, it was his child, now and before and even before it was his. That was his boy.

But he couldn’t see it any longer. No human being could see that glowing essence which left a trail, coming from the moon, or coming from another dimension, or from wherever else it came from. It was irrelevant but left no trace, no means for a change to happen. He would be struck by the most intense thoughts afterwards, for leaving him there.

She was so beautiful there. And he couldn’t help it.

‘I promise, he’s not my son.’

His voice cut off. There had to be more to it, but alas, that’s where it stopped. She had her way with him afterwards, in that intense jolt of sweat, the shaking of the bed only bringing his blood back into his head. He had released his frustration only to be met by confusion. Why had the feeling continued after being done?

Roxanne barely stood there, spread across the bed, revealed in her youth. And he knew how he was supposed to feel after being done. But it never came, he never turned around. They ran together in the midst of the dinner, which had been expected as well. No one would question it any sooner.

The Compatriot knew then, as if by chance that it was the right time to resume his thought. It felt like that intense breach of privacy which happened in his mind cruelly let go. It made him put off his cigar and look into the direction of that boy, knowing that the man next to him would mostly likely be his father from now on. Underneath their battle, the women laughed inaudibly, knowing of what happened and spending less time on trying to care. Cruel harpies, that’s what they are.

Feathers pines against their temples, freeing themselves from the wrecking nerves, to which he only added more to his cup and drank it all.

‘Another toast for the Count.’

‘And for a happily long life, let it be had!’

They would release later what he had put in them, for everyone but himself and the lad. In the midst of his delusions, which drew back to that house, he almost could’ve guessed what his plan was. It would’ve been as easily that he could pull out of his firearm and aim it for the Count and his heir.

His gaze had retreated as soon as their eyes met and rested on each other’s gazes for a brief time. It was obvious what he had planned, if the others had been anything but busy with spending their last moment trying to sneer and snare at one another and him, they could have been spared. No longer had he cared of it. Down the gap, never leaving as much as a stop, which may have lain inside his nostrils.

It was poison; he tried getting them out with the help of it, since no one would trust him with that poor attempt to get their attention.

‘Let me climb on the counter, so they could stop hearing me’ steps.’

When he got up on the table and started stepping on the plates, he almost showed signs of coming back to his senses.

‘Look, the Compatriot is putting on a show for us.’

He stepped and crushed, leaving some marks. Spreading the shards all over the place, quickly blunt, he could not focus on two tins across the windows, breaking through. It wasn't fair that he out of all the people would have to take the full blunt of the toxin before everyone else. As they approached, those marching soldiers from the great North, he stood straight and before he could empty his magazine either in his head or against the floor, he opened the only way out and stared at them.

Now the fight would have to play itself all over again, in the same manner as it had over forty years ago. In the midst of it, caught, he lay alone, now abashed for having strayed too far away from his house. Outside, he had been dragged by his constant look over the arms which had escaped. Pity be for a piety, one couldn't dare stare into the moon before its gaze could play for a role. In an adequate touch, he looked out of his clutch and started shooting randomly into the air.

'Go away, you're not here are any longer, you're all dead, all of you! Dead I say, dead, dead.'

'Is it the poison?'

At least one of the servants looked past the ineptitude of asking, unable to decide himself whether or not what he was doing there was a result of them attacking the last remnant of sanity he retained. But it wasn't it alone. It hadn't mattered. Not a single bit.

Was that going to be as lonely of a venture as it was, they could've denied him that. But it was his desire there, which made him turn from his vision, from this memory of the field where he had spent the worst of his years.

They tried fading, he tried repelling them. It was almost into his sight, his retirement home, and the wife he ought to have, his children and grandchildren, not there, not out there. Anywhere but that place, anywhere where it was feasible, where it might be normal, but that hadn't been the case. He couldn't push them away, he couldn't prevent them from stopping them, and otherwise he would stand beaten. Knelt, felt, pushed and dragged, unnervingly stopped. In full force of himself and anything else, he tried watching himself one last time.

He had to see if he was still the young man he had witnesses that long time ago in a pool of led. They wouldn't be there any longer, neither apparition, nor the soldiers. Artillery kept firing as their march progressed. And he would soon realize that it was less of a march and more of a stroll. Each of them knew that they were only against one man, with a tiny box of ammunition in his hand.

Past the surgeries, the disease and the broken jaw, he stood on the table, a gun drawn out.

'Not in front of the child Compatriot.'

His voice came bluntly and demanded some respect. It would be demeaning, to say the least, how he would be seen at the bottom of his neck, the dreadful aspects of what he became. All of them were there, on his face, the wretch appeared, mockingly pushing through to escape. It was the old man, himself in there.

The man went quietly away, making a few steps from the table, quietly leading himself in the empty hall before he closed them all. Guests only looked as their blushing faded, leaving only an inquiry. A separation had departed itself.

After him, the Count had reverted to being the main center of attention. He was a scoundrel, a scum of the highest rank, seen this way only by them, the taker of a child. It was by his intention that they would be stuck that way, looking at him as he played the final respects. They had been thoroughly needed.

‘Son, I want you to take your hands off your eyes and look at them.’

It wasn’t going to be easy now, but he tried. Expression less and less, less obscure, it was a mere thing the boy saw. Unintended, a sight which obliterated what should’ve landed as some impactful moment for the child was met by the sight of Agamemnon. Who stared back?

As the Count fell back into his chair, he looked like a statue, as much as he dared. Time slowed, the child approached.

‘What is your name, child?’

‘Dmitri, my name is Dmitri.’

Masks rested on the guests. Now they would masquerade, the boy played it off as some kind of joke all for him and him alone.

‘Why are you wearing the masks?’

‘For you, child, for you to make a good thing out of planting the cores while our absence continues. You will grow and learn what you ought to do in order to serve us.’

Here, at the castle, you’ll be treated as nothing less but a prince. A prince, who shall be granted what the poor, should never suffer.’

‘Where is my father?’

‘He’s gone; he’s left you, does that not annoy you? Both parents dead, one missing, leaving you to all of us.’

‘Who shall father you instead of the Count? Let us be clear now, we desire to turn you into one of our many infiltrators, know of it and we’ll have an understanding.’

Refuse us and you'll share the same fate as these gluttonous flat of scoundrels have suffered through. I can still feel their guts trying to take in the poison. Now, it should only last.'

'Don't spoil it yet, he needs to find it on his own. You'll do that, won't you, listen to us?'

'I don't want to, I don't want to have that many mothers and fathers, I only want mine. Why can't I have them?'

'Because they are gone, dead, left, no longer working for them. I can see them still being ill. A promise, perhaps we may bring them back for you.'

The boy considered, wondering at that. If there was one thing he knew about it, that would be the strange lack of resistance he showed. They were like Governors who appeared without anything else but the kind desire to take advantage of him. Even from where they stood, they looked as if they were most bastardly creatures this castle had ever housed. And it was much worse to attain what was theirs now.

Servants were their slaves. It was a quick jab at their dark skin which made them growl and snarl in disgust. Had they been repulsed by it for anything longer than the temporary gazes they showed they might've used that as an opportunity to chain and whip and dragged them to the garden? Perhaps there, they might be felt and hanged, the symphony of the Count, who fantasized about it constantly on the base that he might do it one day. Or his child, who looked back at his life, unable to decipher what, was going on around them. Who were they, why did they come near even when their bodies fell?

In a short amount of time, to which it had resumed, the guests fell, the servants closed the door, no longer watching, leaving only the echo of alabaster. And the faces, which did fly after all, free of any kindness which may be spared, in the eyes of a child who never dared do anything for himself.

'I will remind you child that you're ours. Now. And after you're of no use.'

'Well grind your bones and sent them to your parent's home after we brought them back. Would you like that? How quaint would it be, knowing that your parents grew so far as to abstain from eating you alive.

It's all planned you see. It almost happened in the past, we tempered with you, on a separate dimension, and then they merged together.'

'I do not understand. You're masks, how are you able to?'

'Much more than that, we are greater, we did well.'

'In our various plays and twists we managed to almost turn your parents into cannibals, desiring nothing else but the body of their own spawn. How decently a meal that would've been, I seem to think that would've been the grandest and the greatest, the likes of which could never be found in any other human home.

Well, they refused in the last moment, child.'

'Know that some of us got repelled, in time that we may not see this world again. But the man out there, oh, we did him a good one, haven't we?'

'The Compatriot they called him, now he's stuck, forever in a war to prevent them from crossing his property, to a place he could never call home. Isn't that a pity, especially since he had been so close to it, one aim higher and you would've been?'

'Dead, death, the disciple would claim the Duke, not the child. He would've been spared from it, if one were to claim his life and bring him back to life. One could see that there's some kind of wrongs caused by us and what we've planted here.'

'Alas, don't reveal our every machination, not since we barely begun.'

Of course there were others much greater which had greater impacts which had gone unplanned for. A world of seas, where the lands were on the ships had been brought off shore by the mere fact that they were not made of wood but of some kind of weird sea coral which grounded the base for the first signs of life to emerge.

They pivoted themselves to being barely avoidable by the rays of sun. It was because their bodies had the ability to stretch, the flexibility to reform their bones into sea-rods to clasp fish with, while remaining of one piece and swimming down the reef, like long rays in search for basins to devour from. In there, the most damning thing of all was the desire to infest the water with them, which had to be avoided.

In one vaguely reefed container if one of those ships, two of them were hiding; much more discussion what the next step in their universal domination plan had to be.

'Perhaps we should wait and form our colonies in here, what do you say? I would add, mightily so that we could forge our kin and sculpt it in seaweed. What say you?'

'Too much noise, they will find us. I don't know much about them, but I got enough of a hint to know that there's nothing more to them that we've seen before.'

Which said enough about the Suppressors and their way of approaching, serving, scanning while looking for them in the most convoluted dimensions, if there was a wish, more so than it was to be desired, they would look at it that way. In an eight of a dimension, there'd be enough movement to be looked down upon.

It was an unnerving deceit of stars, through which they had started turning their heat off, absorbing enough out of their distant universe as to give the false impression that it had been their work.

'We must suppress this malign activity immediately.'

They said, going after by their words, pressing in to the point of trying to force the living grey-stars into submission. But it was much harder, for their pus emerged, as they would give birth to the abominations only space could contain.

‘If we cannot force them down, send it back to their world. It must be theirs after all.’

More suppressors had arrived, carrying their strange wings, battered as a flock, trying to round up as many of the malicious defects which tried pushing away from their peculiar egg. That’s what it had become and for that reason alone, they had been sent home.

‘But this is impossible, this wasn’t their mark, there’s nothing which shows they’re the ones responsible.’

‘It will not be forgiven either way. We shall follow the procedure and force the wretches to accept their breeds. Otherwise, the universes will be contaminated by them entirely.’

‘But if we cannot prove that it is their, then we have no right to do it. Is this mutiny?’

‘No, it’s change. We need to suppress every plethora of filth and send it in their way. If theirs was a single planet in which they savage the unclean, we shall fill their galaxies and universes with it. Whether or not it’s desirable on either side it little if not neither of our concerns. Ours is but to keep ours and our protectorate’s right.’

Another Suppressor joined in.

‘What we have stumbled upon may be perhaps the greatest contamination hole one could ever dread to draw upon. In it we shall store everything which is unfit for beauty, so we could achieve perfection.

Is that not why we were left here? If not to clean and protect and surpass those who would grow live a virus and corrupt what is right, then what are we here for?’

He basked in a light so strong that at that point every star in the universe shone. It was decided then, these belts of decaying stars had to be gotten rid off. Now that they were fully locked and had been aware of where everything was supposed to go, there’d be no stopping to any of them, if all.

‘All will be right, a universe should bask into the righteousness and purity, the unity which will starve out the chaos. Let the filth sink in.’

‘Let the filth sink.’

The others said. And the suns had been expelled, and no longer would they be denied the birth which they had swollen upon themselves. In that moment of fear, aware that they had been an intrusion, one Agamemnon had been forced under the pressure to give in. He wouldn't be able to commit to the sin of dread, and in that moment he jerked himself into being aware.

Aware of the particles of birth which lay defiantly beneath the layers, where the planet rebirth of a new species of man could emerge. Most Agamemnons had given up on trying to breed them out of the fear that they might fail and that their actual children would try getting away.

‘I.’

A voice came.

One of the projections of the Suppressor turned on him. It was sudden, it was peculiar, that much so, that he wanted to speak with him all of them sudden, as if he was someone of a greater importance than he should've been. As the dome receded and he looked into the space, he saw the glitter into the one eye and said.

‘You shall treat me with the respect I deserve. From now on, I will not be called Agamemnon but instead I shall adopt the name of. Agamemnus, yes, Agamemnus it is.’

Agamemnus forced himself, now that the malignant suns were in his sight and being aware that their suns might give birth to far too many spawns that his planet couldn't possibly hope to sustain, he opened the rims of his earth. Up the girth, he brushed part the almost broken apart prototypes of growth and made new ones, out of naught but a few scattered primordial oozes.

It was hard, piling them up, lifting them like some moving sand-slimes, which gave in wave after wave in some disturbing jitter of limbs. For now, they looked like piles of hey, flying despite of the lack of limbs, or so he had thought until he realized that they were only being lifted up on their giant tails. Two eyes came unto them, on opposite ends.

And that was it, some primal beings which ended up bearing hundreds of limp numbs feet at the end of their tails. On their feet, he looked and saw too many eyes to count, perhaps as some result of a wicked torn in his cramping mountain. He would name them, now.

‘The Sons of Agamemnus. Yes, my sons, you are given the chance to.’

Split from the pack, every single one of them walked on their way, preparing to grow the additional limbs, the legs which were rather horned. They grew like some strange horns, being made unable to walk but they served as, they served as what?

It was impossible to come to some conclusion, but he knew they would serve a purpose in time. If only he gave enough of a thought, he could reach some conclusion rather than be brought to it by force. A coercion of strapping cuts, from which more horns came out revealed that those were no legs, they were no horns.

They were crowns, those filthy unworthy petty things.

‘You dare crown yourselves as kings in my own realm? How dare you defy me like that?’

To be humiliated in front of a suppressor had destined him to a lifetime of defiance. This was a failure; these sons were too strong for their own good. While the others observed and gathered around them, they had been presented with the top of the food chain. The ones in rule. No longer have ancient but wearied of themselves, they had been presented as the rightful rulers, his direct descendants.

As the sole reason was met, he had the sole reason to give birth to others.

Long-legged, tall and almost unfarmably inquis squared, they looked like solid basins from which many half-bodies came out of the pile. And these masses of living land, as quickly as they had been drawn from the living mass upon which he stood began flying, floating, only to be met by the same decrepit fate.

The flying bloaters started following their flying rulers, giving in to the idea that they were beneath them. Underneath them, almost compelled to that wicked side of things.

‘Having problems, great Agamemnus?’

A set of laughter came from every direction, to which he knew what he had done. ‘Your failures never cease to amaze us now. You’ve always been one to attempt reconciliation with us from the start. If it were to last longer, this dream of yours of entertaining your delightful creations needs be brought to an end.’

‘It puts us all to shame to realize that they will never have a future at all, being forced to the face the invader from the suns.’

And they observed, each one of them looked at those peculiar creatures in the deadliest of fashions, they desired some kind of deadly reaction which happened there. As they started spreading in ranks of eight, those umber-looking jousting terrors bore the hinderingly, almost-frozen thickets of melting skin which pounced their like to the point of being tremendously spread in the light of the real stars. They oozed and fell upon themselves, forming arches of Achvalorn.

Without concern, they crossed one another, laying forth giant tacks and shafts which served as pulling mechanism from which they’d not dare to stop. In an immovable condition they had begun, now they were ready to push it as far as they could go. The rim of their bodies only gave forth some kind of allegiance of many knobbed curvatures of death sounds. Somehow they had brought small pockets of atmosphere into the air, which stored only the deadliest of shouts and screams, bred out their mouths and from their bodies. Many voices sang their choir; they would defile themselves before ever reaching the planet where Agamemnus rested.

‘See? There’s nothing which may stop him. Accept it that there may not be any chance for you to survive this atrocity and leave yourself be used. It’s unnerving that you’d try instead of trying to get away.’

And the Suppressor looked with no shame, despite knowing that it was because of him and because of them that the creatures were there. He should be force to say a thing, to admit it and pay. But neither of them dared a thing, nor did Agamemnus think it would matter in the end.

‘Then I shall send my miniatures of life forth and wish for them not a day of rest.’

Torn by this statement of his, he had made another decision. His oblong changed, it started producing four great stingers, tall, pushed upward like the top of a pointed roof, drawing the planet forward into some made creation of defiance. It began being torn apart, but that didn’t matter, as what he would release in the world would shock them all.

‘Mad creature, dumb, dumb, idiotic fiend, what have you done to your own extended body? You’ve ruined it, you’ve ruined yourself. Would you sacrifice it all for them?’

‘I must do it. I know I have to do it, there’s no other chance but that. I need to go ahead and take them out even if it’s the last thing I get to see. I shall be myself from now on, well endowed, knowing that I’ve given everything I ever had to them. Do not be weary of me, my great brothers and replicates, for I know that this is only the beginning of my rule.

Though I may be weakened, they will be strong. Though I will be lost into the endless spliced void, I shall be found by them eventually.’

With it, a final consolation came, that he would be there, again and again, looking through an unquestionable thin visor of demented vision, none the wiser, he extended and pulled himself out. The Mountain fell, he wouldn’t be able to tell, but the entire rock, the butcher of which had begun, gave in. In this short amount of time, what he had achieved was a most precarious pile which would rival that of the suns. They were made in his image, finally touched by that look and feel which defiled the world one of their flying creatures came in.

He had studied their agonies and learned of their much desired need for suicide. In it he had taken upon himself to bring those hairy, Agamemnus-faced, wide-winged, teeth-grinned, horned, bearing the bodies of those who ended their lives around their bodies whilst impaled through the spikes in an atrocious rage which consumed everything in their path. Even those strange vortex-like abominations of spare which had exploited the floating other-men got caught in the joust of time. It was impossible to fight back, irredeemable at best, the way in which they had forged their insides in the most dreadful of manners. It shone on them like a vile light, as the stars started abandoning their likes, fading away. Agamemnus was still there, now alone, watched only by the Suppressor.

‘What are you intending to do now? You’ve released everything you had, everything you’ve ever acquired, endless eons of planning and waiting, all for a single fight given birth of some meaningless decay.’

‘But how do you know that Suppressor? For how long have you watched us and what is the meaning of it? Are you our enemy? Should we be afraid?’

He couldn’t hear anyone else then, much more so, to his dismay, he hopes this would be the case. An intrusion would sometimes work, but he doubted any of them would ever hope to dare enter his mind again. Another sacrilege, in their eyes had been committed after all and it was only a matter of time until he could finally give in.

‘As long as you remain in here, and you do not threaten us, there will be no need for retaliation. Our only scope has always been preservation so that every life form would develop in a natural way. But ever since you stepped outside your boundaries, you’ve infected everything with no concern norification.’

We looked into your past, many a times and saw that in every kind of scenario possible, you will always destroy yourself taking others with you. This insatiable thirst needs to be contained until all of you will share the same fate.’

But another vision faded, another one approached.

He offered them one chance to face him. As he pulled back every piece of metal strung in his hideout, the pile of metal dens, the wires the metal spears, then he revealed his pure round circle of, the platform on which he stood. From the body of the man he possessed, he came out like a ghastly phantasm, pulling away his force into the spear he wore and threw in the middle of his arena.

‘This is your chance to face me as equals, without my powers and without my might.’

From his obnoxious voice, the last thing which could be drawn was a sudden hiss, to which they charged. They leaped from their shutters; blowing ahead a bunch of spinners had a few receivers to plant themselves inside the rims and around as many round edges as they could. In a moment of quick lack of sanity, they could focus on nothing more but that spread which bore all of his strength inside.

‘Looking for me, are you?’

That armor was undoubtedly forged for the whole scope of being immune to bullets, to conventional swords, to anything which may have born inside of him any resentment to reveal the wretched mass he hid inside of himself, a cruel thing, which came out. He wretched himself, tall and strong, as his heels barely hit the ground, he saw only the marks left in by his claws, those feet being unable to attain the might of the fall. In such a woe, as to know, he was alone, without an ally, to be pure.

It was his invention as wretchedly obese as he’d become, his slacking ribs barely showing at all. Through some way no one might be able to convey what might be happening in with the land. It had been undeniably wretched by him, being pulled inside his piled, stored and waiting for each and everyone to arrive. Basked into the shallow winds, they bent themselves over the grips which pulled the platform to the realm of malady, weak as he was, Ibbillothhoh, wretched the span of the grand Corpius, deceiver of bones.

‘He’s tricked us; he didn’t give up on all his strength.’

‘And now you are all mine, all of your souls and every descendant from now on is mine!’

In the presence of Corpius, he only came to reveal as much as it was necessary, what he would plan to do with them, once he had retrieved what had been rightfully his. Despite his plans, despite the reassurance, they fought back and only revealed that they could not help themselves but leap out of the platform, to untimely take it upon themselves.

‘I see you are wretched enough to bring the primates here. What’s your purpose, what’s your plan? What am I to do with them?’

Though some of them attempted to draw back, this Corpius, joined by Ibbillothhoh took the spear and departed the very top of his skull, inflected with the vilest crime, he revealed himself too soon and then he died. Now with his power unleashed upon the world, they felt themselves constrained upon that platform only to be decided by this Corpius that it wasn’t worth it yet for them to go.

‘Full of life, as I see it, you shall take what’s left of his essence and bring his wretched plans to fruition. Do not be weary, as I know you’ll do well. I shall make sure that you inherit not only his will but this desire to bring yourselves to his corpse upon his day of return.’

‘And if we don’t want to?’

Asked Packstock, with a half-inched heat into a spine, he looked like a mighty poppy cot now. In his vile desire of change, the dark essence of the skin that of which pushed from him spoke.

‘I’ve come to realize my way is flawed. My past has shown me that it’s not worth it for my to live, in this desolation we call our home.’

‘Show him what’s left of our armory, so I may see it for himself.’

And a whimsical hole opened itself, all wrongly disowned of its own lack of morbid charms. He had shown them an image with all the holsters, all the empty places where there should’ve been the means for a war, for a battle, any other conflict, even the spikes and the needles missing from the sight. It was unnerving at first, but it had been revealed.

‘That your bones had showed their appeal to me long before you were destined to arrive. I’ve tricked all of you to come in here and show me what your worth is made out of. Not only have I forced you to do what I desired, but I have also crushed and stole what it was rightfully yours.

Your craftsmen had become my puppets, my destroyers. Your soldiers my servants only for a limited time, but I knew very deep inside of me that no one would survive. For as long as I had been aware, there’d be no one there waiting for them.’

Indeed, their families had been forced to reveal a magnitude of false gods which turned their mightier one into an unstoppable force driven by the hands of the most righteous defenders, who were no strangers to the likes of prey. In their wake, they had been whole again, brought by their divine signs. They hunted that evil Corpius and his mechanically divided blood. From each drop, a mischievous creature would appear, somewhat lesser than him, but it mattered little. Primitive being served them as if they were the coming from above, the oratories of the brood, malignantly benign, bred for the sole purpose, in shorter ends, to rule.

But they were cruel, and have conspired, against everyone they didn’t come to admire as their own. The conflict had been resigned as one of those signs of miss forgotten, an addition of lost epiphany of the right.

Father than their reaches rested, another king who had been strewn, one of many lost from ether, dressed in white robes, lost to the eye. He had been the embodiment of much grander spirits, those of much morose benign. They would be dancing on his grave if only they knew how desperate he had become to gain even the remote access to some damaging clear strike. He suffered there all alone, while the vile fiend Corpius played with them, with little in mind, not given the kind blessing of showing some disgust to him. He was repelled, they would be there, eventually ready to rip his soul from the damning hole he crawled in.

‘May I lay here until you arrive, as I am sick and I’m unable to fight, I know much less, I’m unable to confess that I have taken the chance to cut and eat a piece of you, my son.’

The corpse of a young man, who had been brought here through the womb of a mortal female lay, unlike him, his life-span short, and an end. This one was pale, but he wore no crown and didn’t look ghoulish at all. It would be a pity to waste him but he wasn’t one to share the intention regarding such an act of hatred, which may be unknowable to him at all. It was disturbing, the act itself, he didn’t know and would play about with what came out of him.

‘I apologize for that rip, my dear son. I think I have a problem and I cannot change. That Corpius tormented me, it is because of him that I lay here defeated, betrayed by my allies, failed in my conquest, as I am lost. Again, I must prey and chant his name in hopes that he may come to me.

Great Corpius, allow me to rise, please, I lay abandoned by my own kind, and my hope lays in your mind. But who is that I hear? Perhaps a pair of some deceased hounds?’

‘More than that, lord unruly. Who are you to lay here alone?’

‘Why I’m one the great Illydiargi, crowned as one of the purest remains of a legacy which may remain with that of the grand disciples of the kings. In our past we served as the bastion.’

‘I see, I see, and what would the bastion be?’

‘If you’re to ask, you wouldn’t know. But since you are so preciously obscure to me, would you not join me in my bed and share the likes only my son would provide? His body is still tender, I’ve eaten quite a few of him. He is prepared to have been swallowed and he would not repay not care of anything else. I must adore the likes of you who hide, though. Deranged thing, I bet you are a petty thief I may best, even in my lousiest form.’

‘As it may be, I do not think you may be ready to face either of us in this dreadful lack, the few remarks which may stay, cannot happen as they would share nothing of our own values. We’re dread incarnate, we’re filth, the murder, the defiance.

If we come here, and stay, the moisture may spread in the air. And when that happens, you will be flogged with an unnatural feel, which may sicken you to the gut. Can you endure such a feeling as I may force upon you to cower? Would you be forced into submission by myself, our many, the few who’d care?’

‘Care for what? An infestation in this place? I can look for myself and decide that this place had already been filthy to begin with. You may be witty but you cannot help yourself but give in. I want to know.’

They served each other well for the time being, by subtleties, such as pebbles being thrown from one side to another, looking at ways to crush and destroy the swollen part of the gate, which only now came into view at all, it was to no interest that one may look and play, to care for one again, in the way one may shatter and may lapse, it was indistinguishable from the relapse of desires.

As the gate grew, the images of lust appeared again, but they weren’t meant for the sunken king, who averted his gaze, but for the others who appeared from the inner-sides of the benign again.

‘Won’t join us in the show? But what is wrong? Can’t you suffer us being set in stone? Can’t you look and see what our faces look on top of their bodies? I can see that you’re afflicted by it. You cannot help it but peep through your fingers now.’

Yet there hadn’t been a single view, in one moment before these changes had a chance to manifest, it had become an entirely impartial cover, a strange satisfactory block from the degeneracy they brought. Something of his spirit oozed and even from the distance as their weird defiance filled from the hole in the universe they had created, it was pointless. Something else protected him then, like a trinket or some deep desire which prevented anything from ever trying to swell inside his body then. By no mistake, it would be, suffice to say, only the malign there.

They abandoned their cue, the rueful approach, the demented likened itself out of a stone, from the top of many of the containers which found themselves near him once his kingdom had sunken and had failed to stop whatever desire charmed him then.

‘Lust no longer torments me as it used to.’

‘But it does us and we cannot help it, spending time in here, even as watchers had given us something to look and carve for. We were weak and had waited for too long. We’ve taken it upon ourselves to create but we have failed to look after one of the most important creatures for our planes, the natural breeders, to which we may finally stand.’

Walking over some parts of the division opened up a path for his to be pulled into. They could at least begin the negotiations in order to bring him on their side that had been one of the easiest ways in, to be fair about it, the cruelty being the fact that he was never meant to be alive.

‘Will you share some of him with us?’

‘I cannot, this is the only thing which is keeping me alive. Would you believe me if I told you that I only needed a single bite in order to survive for mere decades?’

‘That doesn’t seem as vile as to be a lie. We can only think of this way.’

‘Your son, what if he would walk again?’

‘I shall listen what you have to say but don’t count on me to give you any kind of satisfaction now, I could still get betrayed, my son may never walk away and instead of it, I’ll find myself wondering what have I done wrong?’

‘A drone then, he shall be put into a drone. Both of you shall be placed inside one of the biggest drone there is and we’ll bring both of you into the Desolate Deserts of Lligrim.’

By the time one could even poach a cap, the bottom half had been raised by a few centimeters as if to be spared from the vague tribulations which be in store.

‘We’ll make sure you will be brought back once the trials shall be done with.’

‘Why are you making that much of an effort for me? Can’t you see that I belong to a dying breed? One who barely ascended the likes of a statue which begs to be crushed. Smash and abandon me and my child while you’re at it. Otherwise, nothing will change.’

‘Only one trial, if you may, do not worry, this travel shall not spare you of any force.’

No remorse, the tempering with the tunnels leading into atmosphere of Lligrim. It had been named a planet for the concubine, as the entirety of it had been covered completely by the dryness of its spell, from which water may not even be called there. He had finally dropped to his knees, out of the drone, his child gone, left there to look upon a world.

‘Inhabited by none other than yourself. Are you not glad?’

‘Well, is this not a pity, to say the least, you are alone? We lied to you and shall never bring you back to home. This is your resting place, your cemetery and your only chance to make amends.’

‘So righteous, all of the sudden.

‘I see.’

They were voiced through the variously heeded layers of wind, not truly there. But he had arrived. Suppressor numbed fourteen, Hylinotrhop, who was the first one to stand out as his wings were of a shade of grey, and his body had been longer and conveyed the sound of children screaming out of the sheer terror of being eaten by rats. It was this one who presented himself to the king and said.

‘You majesty, are they disturbing you? Need you be somewhere else?’

‘I cannot help it. I’m stuck in here, in a crackle of turns. Even beneath the sand I can feel something much worse than the grains. It’s my son, he’s there, I feel as if, if I were to make a few more steps, I would only walk on him and on his brothers.’

‘Were there others like him?’

‘Yes, may I call you?’

‘The name shall be immediately inserted inside, for as long as you mean something about me, it shall be there. And others won’t bear to hear nor speak it for as long as I am here.

That’s the gift of my presence, the complete denial of anyone from other dimensions and a tighter grip to those who might hear.’

‘Great Hylinotrhop, in my life, I had many bastards, too many to count. I cannot help it now, but I can only play what’s worse to me. My children aren’t seeking me. They’re afraid; they were shattered by my absence.’

‘Is it not your fault then that you are here?’

‘But I didn’t choose to be in this place, I haven’t. Forgotten what it feels like walking again. They want me to feel like I am lost, that I shall never meet them in the afterlife.’

‘And even if you had, what would you tell me, other than you left without a word, a father unlike those of old who died once their duty was over.’

‘I see now, I think I will suffer nothing less than a death in the desert.’

Hylinotrhoph thought of it, and for a moment, he had tried to interfere with him, so he could resolve this mistake. With a hint of the uncanny, he couldn’t worry at all for the consequences which be set. Either he would succeed or this insignificant ruler would be bound to be dead. By simple touch, of his suppression at last, he pushed inside his knees and little, removing the pain and agony of sickness, the mild old age for which no one could surpass the wedge between them and the rest of the body.

The ruler stood, better to have proven that he could, he called.

‘I am the Antichlok, and I shall rule this desolate world.’

‘Why is he ignoring us now?’

‘Can he not see that we still want to play with him?’

‘Shut your mouths, fools and look, he’s done something to him he shouldn’t have. I knew that they were crooked from the first time I lay eyes upon them.’

Indeed, this sudden conflagration of interests couldn’t work, they were still trying their best not to get through the rope, down the dunes.

He had been presented with it, as a way of the fumes. A black cord which looked as if it would burn his neck to ashes came. It presented itself to him. ‘You’re given the chance to give in and abandon this false quest of yours. This is your only chance given to take the only way out from this desolate nightmare, it shall only be given once. Only once, before you will be forced.’

To lay out there, in a land much more corrupt that he would give himself to. In there, the storms which brought the swarms and grains would not come to an end until millions of years had passed between them.

‘There’s a chance you might end up being completely buried inside of it. Don’t you suppose that it’s worth it to at least consider?’

‘If you want to slay me, do it so. But I cannot be forced to do it after losing my son in such a manner. Otherwise, I shall only dread myself inside the only manner which I may know.’

He jeopardized himself then. After coming in a few inches near the only hideout he could wait in for the storm to end. He spoke with the Suppressor once again.

‘I’ll take my chances knowing I will be surrounded by someone of my own.’

Knowing that he would be met by a child who was supposed to lie, his part of the deal had been accepted, they all looked at him, misdirected as they grabbed him before the fall. He almost shouted from looking at them all. These white specters, tiny infants who had desperately searched for their father lay in a most obscure location where they would watch over him until the storm stopped.

It was a victory which not even they could have perceived.

The agony was seen at its utmost knowledge, a way to look into it as an affront of wrongness.

Hylinotrhop could only bet met, by the voices which stood ineptly filled with decrepitude. Their likes had been filled with the resolve that they would not touch him without risking another burst of anger.

‘Can you not help yourself? Petty creatures that you are. I am sickened by the fact that I must correct your mistakes.’

‘And what would that correction results into, if not the dread brought to the king, who would not see his deities, thinned by the years to come, cursed to hear the song of flailing children who’d cry.’

Even now they could hear them begging for their father, as the entirety of the planet had been filled with them. Their growth brought only the unsanitary need, that they would lose their eyes, their feelings nigh to him not being able to see them all. Others lost their limbs and started drawing in to the form which bore their tails, but they would grow still until they would be whole again. The insides of the desolation would give in to a most unsatisfactory perdition of stored beings which had been forced to lay as crude, unable to die but waiting for him to arrive.

One fetus had grown as heavy as to occupy the entire space a castle would, and he had been pristine white, gathering in him the need to survive. The only warmth he had received came from that of his brothers who came on him and lend only the most malignant of heat shimmers. How plain it felt that he desired more. But neither of them could cope, even in the most primordial of their forms, with death. Such a scare could only drive them to seek, the likeness of their father, and he, as all of them cried, even if his undeveloped organs barely afforded it a distant shyness which may be left unmet.

‘Would you please allow me the chance to join you?’

‘Has it not been settled that you are not to be allowed to leave? I thought it had been decided that neither of you shall be granted entry, nor leave, nor anything.’

‘A proposal has been claimed, but we do not want to invade again, not a single dare.’

‘Instead, we only meant to watch as you act, to learn of the resolve you keep pretending to lend on.’

‘I will crush your heads and suppress them into the tiniest of molecules until you shall become harmless again.’

But even Hylinotrhop doubted that would work. A bluff like this was only pleasant if they played on, carrying as a way to bring the dissatisfaction as soon as it was gone. He could see invisible shades, which should not be there, to which no force may throw them away. Only the sound may go, not the presence, which begged only the wildest of question to arise.

‘Are you displeased with your world, perhaps? Do you find it unworthy of your eyes?’

‘You mention it as if you know. But it is not worth it, going back a few ages ago, when all was well, and none could tell of each other’s existence as they could not prevent us from stopping.’

It was at this point when the necessary information came. Now these creatures were no longer what they claimed to be.

Aggipius had been the other follower of Agamemnonus, his brother. Two of them had the satisfaction of porting their worlds together and joining one another in a symbiosis of ages, the damage being done in a most solemn manner, the hurt being inflicted would be deranged and bring on their lack of faltering atrocities.

‘First night of the slaughter had aroused.’

In which for one entire cycle, watched upon a clear sky, had filled their molded planets into a most repulsive butcher’s reprise. Not a single living thing survived, not a single dead would go unpledged, used and turned, forced to mourn only to be met again by the distasteful approach to which the plain formed. A uniform land upon which only the greatest specimens would stand. Two mountains united, two faced joined so closely as to become conjoined twins, looked upon what seemed to be a grand new beginning, as a first act would come to bring about, creatures from another world, to inherit what was of their worth.

The first comers had presented themselves with the traps in which they lay strapped in. With one distinction being that they fashioned their own cages for them to be forced into. By and by they looked surprised almost as thoroughly lost as their claims let be. As far as they were concerned, these long white strapping many sacked growers had their many mouths left at bay. Within each of their kin, for each one there had been a few which grew flat on the ground and live in the most pathetic kinds of livid.

‘I know what we lack, we need a drought.’

‘What have you in mind?’

‘A conclusion to our two halves and to our ends, as I have realized we were both wrong in our attempt to create a perfect reality here, and to that I say we shall dine and drink only the wickedest of wines, drawn from worlds unlike ours.’

‘But we tried that before and we have failed.’

‘Agamemnonus, I know what we must do. We cannot escape but we could at least open the way and draw them here. With an utmost disturbing pair of words we shall tempt them to set forth. And when enough of them pass in, the barrier between our worlds will be shattered in such a matter that we shall convert them into a mighty sickle of rum. And we shall drink in our name and celebrate.’

‘Joy and celebration? But who are you, oh dark disciple to ask of us such a thing?’

To which they gathered, at this sudden abyssal change, which had been desired ever since they could be estranged from one another, at the pathetic whim.

‘Is this what we’ve become? Is this it? We were feared, we had achieved mastery over a universe. What kind of play is this? If we’ll end up lazy and nigh-extinct rather than try to make haste in order to survive?’

‘Will you mind your manners and let them give up? It is obvious that neither of them has any intention of giving in and trying to achieve any form of malignant supremacy, they only want to waste away.’

‘And what of us? We’ve wandered so far and made fun of them, we’ve spoken and we trashed, but in the meantime, what have we accomplished?’

‘Nothing.’

‘Nothing.’

‘Nothing reigned.’

‘It’s impossible to get any work done here, with all your eyes watching. Deranged fools that you are, cheerfully morose and dreadful companions who prefer taking a mere being and torture it than preserve.’

‘But that’s what got us here to being with. Complete preservation failed.’

‘And so have our wails.’

‘Even the likes of those we have taken and mistakenly placed in worlds they didn’t belong shouldn’t have mattered for what we’ve gone through. What will happen to us then? Are we bound to be taken as fools and preserved?’

‘But it’s a stalemate. If it weren’t for the Suppressor, if it weren’t for their likes, we could’ve done so much greatness in the realities we found each other in.’

‘Which would be pointless, admit it, they would turn the same way as ours had.’

Estranged words couldn't be gone. It wasn't likely that it mattered then, but they couldn't be asked, to be masked from the alienation they had felt from one another. Hearing voices. One could suffer even less than to be constantly stricken by them.

'I want to break out of your ranks then. I cannot help it either. I've grown sick with hearing my own voices and that of yours. We will never get along and we shall never be able to create anything worth for our kind to rule forth.'

'No empathy from here, leave. As a matter of fact, crush the tiny brain which gave you access to them. And never set forth here again.'

With much sadness those words written in the head, this wasn't likely to be held with much of anything, less the curfew. Not to be a part of them, no longer tainted.

'The damage is already done.'

'And you would know of it, because time after time we've been proven that there's no escape.'

'It's how we've been made, regardless of how many times we look at them; neither of us can shake it away.'

'Jealousy, I feel it stronger than ever. I wish I could be like them. To be right, to be set likely to be apart from all that misery and filth I've observed, reality after reality, only to have realized that there's no other way.'

'Much so, should we give in and take our final stand? Are we to enter our cores and die righteously without a change of heart?'

'I would feel lonely in the end? Not hearing your voices again?'

'But have you not grown tired?'

Has it been a few minutes or about a few eons since they spoke? It didn't matter for how long they did it but what it had felt like. Neither one could fancy standing there more than they had. So much more of the loneliness had been drowned by annoyance. By this strange misdirection and search for a reason to be.

'There's no other way for us to be happy, is there?'

'Cursed, we are cursed and for that reason, it's bound to be worse than that. There's an alternative to end the pain, but I am not sure we'll be able to walk again, to feel and to lie, to wait until we'll be caught again.'

'And what would that alternative be?'

‘We need to join our worlds, all of them need to be joined together. In a final union, this cancelation of our realities will finally bring us defeat. If we could overlap one another, as we have done with the infants and the king, we could finally give in to all of our cores and we shall never live through any agony no longer.’

An idea which brought an ever-lasting desire for all of them.

A complete and underwhelming task which should bring them to their timed appearance into each other’s bed, at each of their own throats, in those canopies which begged for taking and in their many conjoined plains where they would reek together in the soles of the coming of dread. For them this plan could bring nothing less than satisfaction, that complete deciding factor which stood for them. Lieurs for the staking stood, as the prime gates were to be made completely out of steel not to feel any less. Rather than what had been needed for their sudden ascent, it had been decided that they’d wait on their plan. As long as each of them could force one another to wait and feel forced to a still, everything which may be done by them could be stopped before it started.

They immediately darted in each of their desired places of refuge and waited for the time being. In a complete state of uncertainty which lay, it couldn’t have been decided whether or not it would be worth it to contact the others, whom they referred to as their under lights. The ones who delighted themselves with the worst in sub humanity, the likes of pricking ever so near their own homes, which may in ruin and lost colossal depths made by the mad rejects which renounced them as their deities.

One such vile being, one of the Colossus came inches of his life to spray, the nearest shore again with a spread of the mass which had resulted into the quick bath of the primordial breeds that are addicted to their filthy sugar-cane replications, damned they be.

‘I have swallowed a few of them but can’t seem to understand, what’s wrong with the taste.’

The villain, who spoke, horned in a brack of throng pieces of the graceful wall it had made for it bore him eight creations. They would have to be called that, creations, as in the failed attempts which have been carried by one named Agamemnonus, who had taken after his betters. By the time the sun-infestation had come into one of their worlds, he found himself affected by the ripple which bore through each of them a sign of the malign, that one which affected their temporal view of what laid in the likes of humanity. It was unconceivable that he would try his hands, or lack of then, to create something of his own again, especially after seeing so many of their kind fail. And the result could never be replicated again, for those beings grouped together in chains of hundreds and mixed with one another inside the curtains of the floor, where they would be judged no more.

The manner in which they made themselves be trialed by their own kin made them suffer some sort of ever-present alienation that cursed them to brawl. Only the strongest would manage to get a piece of the victors and grow in them, all along the journey which surmounted as soon as they directed themselves in piles of seven and of eight. All of which had been deranged, mad evenly spread in their heads, cocked and brought to damage and to set forth. No sane creature would come forth and deepen itself in the worst layers where they'd hide, unable to be alive unless for this union between them.

Better to have lain near one another than to face what was waiting for them out there. In as much as a deciding factor, to the muse, the prude and the likes which looked at how a half formed nauseating cornered mule-like edifice began a strange set of seemingly meaningless throws of its mouth, to reveal no two incisors which were alive. This one forced its entry into two weaker forms which attached themselves by a chance during the brawl. In their ever-present state, they switched between hibernation and what would be a stance from where they could never get back from again, a comatose of deceptions. Their skin wouldn't bother with itself unless one could grasp enough of an amount of doubt to crush beneath his jaw these false contenders which added nothing to the being.

What would emerge in that case would be four-legged and ever-so near to be ashamed of the fact that it hadn't suffered its own self to be seen as if it was alive. With the help of a perfunctory organ it had managed to draw pieces of Agamemnonus in order to force upon them some sort of wall of protection, a barrier from which they could hide from that amused demigod, creator, regardless of what he be called.

He came where, this being out of nowhere, even for him. A big chunk of his body was taken on his own request, to see for him what was worth it and what disturbed his rest.

'The new kind which isn't mind, have you come directly unto me? Have you any thought of approaching what would be your sudden intended doom?'

'I wish not to be contained any longer and be released. Remove your fangs and do not make me wait, I seem to have found myself unable to respect what went on, this deranged hound of yours has been stalking me for hours.'

With one of his solemn particle limbs, he pointed from a bottom lip he carried and dragged with him. It was hard to figure out whose lip was it, whether it belonged to the new-breed or if it had been acquired?

Less pronounced, this long and almost bifurcated body of Agamemnonus seemed to be more of less the inversion of his mountain attached to another one he self proclaimed to have won from a fight.

'Will you listen to my story and do you wish you could understand how I stumbled into it?'

'Only my autonomy is important, everything less than that can wait or be abandoned.'

'Then let me join you in this waiting and we shall discuss the cost of your delusions. For that is what it is.'

For him to be treated like a son would require a conscious decision to be taken in order to promote its growth.

'We shall head on that way and I will take a piece of your soul.'

‘Have I such a thing? I thought you blessed me with an unruly thing, like all of those half-made sons who were wretched to bear nothing in the kin of the spiritual.’

And the mad sang as they appeared. Their widely gaping mouths only revealed the fear they had felt, as those almost crustacean holders of money paws, the deranged anthem beginning in their lost lungs. For them to be heard, least of all would they adapt to the fact that it wasn’t worth it for them to be alive any longer. Once their mission faded and since their songs resulted into bringing forth some vague memory he had, it was pointless then for their conversation to be carried on.

‘Since I have witnessed your birth and development, I think it’s only worth it that I may send you to the only place, where you may find peace in a form that’s not deranged.’

‘And what am I supposed to do without you or any kind of worthless spree? I cannot fathom living there.

I cannot fathom living anywhere. My place is near you since we’re nigh-alike. We cannot be separated anymore, now that I know what it like is to long for someone like you.’

‘But why would desire that when you have not experience that which brought you here in the first place?’

He would have to be denied the terrors of exiting the least of his discrepancy, the likens of the bold, the old and those with which he would roam forth. In his wake he could only search for those who’d gather around him to light a candle or a torch, to watch him during the night, as a stranger came forth.

‘Have you come to our village alone or are there others like you?’

‘I’m afraid I cannot answer any of your questions. I’ve been instructed not to approach and not to stare for what’s worth, he abandoned and asked me to fend for myself.’

‘The news you brought to me are dire. It may not mean a lot to you any more than our differences would storm us away from you, but you cannot draw near.’

‘Why? I only seek refuge.’

In their twisted town, where their buildings had been strewn in the hindering cuts against many of the bratty trees, which carried on distant extremities, the vines being the only way they could climb to the top of their houses. At places where family lay, in cold dormitories where it would never fade, they harbored the kind of things which made one get stunted by the fact. Set apart by their ligaments and their strange-boll like external structure, backed by a skeleton which protected them from any tool which may pierced, it was mandatory that they might eat from inside the bodies of the children as soon as they fell asleep, as their faces looked like saddened mummified Pharaohs, who could do nothing but sharpen their fangs before going away.

This unexpected turn of his lend only the most distant wonder he may have had.

‘May I not rest at the edges of your village then? You may not believe me but I am unable to climb towards your houses. I am by no means a threat.’

‘That’s irrelevant to us, as your word means nothing to be. Even less perhaps, I should make sure that you’re not lying so I may not find myself threatened during the night. The whole stability of our community is counting on me.’

‘I understand that, but I arrived.’

‘And that’s even less on us. Find yourself some another pest to bother and leave us be.’

They parted way immediately, as soon as he started being threatened by them. Each strange and broken numb limb came to his mind, to which he only painted himself in the colors of the least remorseful snails and slugs, the bullfrogs and bullfrogs that gravitated towards him during the atmospheric pressure. The water being drained from clouds, and he could only stay there for long, in his living shell until they started grouping themselves and standing on him. It was unnecessary, this forced strike, and the kind which made it wish it hadn’t been alive. As soon as he would look deeper inside of him, as the estrangement of minds kicked in, the others started feeling less connected.

‘I wish they would dissect us there. They could be made aware that we’re not made to fit.’

‘Why have we stayed for this long?’

‘It was him, wasn’t it, the one who made us to begin with.’

As much as they would be delighted, their bickering stop, and the fight retracted at a noticed, twice the credence, once and thrice. Fell beneath them, the bringer of lice appeared.

‘Greetings.’

Tall and maenad, he was no living thing but the strange abstraction of a giant stone edge, which only rested in the midst of a grand canyon, waiting for something to happen so its might peculiarness of nature faded once again.

Its sudden interest in them promoted a gagging they had felt.

‘The closer you get to me, the worse it might be. I see that you’re not alone, cowardly one, come further when you shall be ready and enter me. But be weary for your treachery will not be taken as a sign of right as soon as you enter the first delight.’

As it would be, the first delight of Philissy, near its cathedrals, tombs, the grand coliseum waited, in which they would spike the like of those who were trapped. From the ruins surrounding them basked the disillusion that there was a stony ford surrounding it, held in the realm of Hyrsh. A Dane's delight, no proper might, be called in action.

'Will I be fed and properly clothed?'

'Is that what you desire most?'

'I thought I knew what I wanted before, but after spending but a night in there, I wish there was more. More than the freedom I could've spared for myself.'

More than the certainty that anyone else who gaped at him might've been met by some disgust. And the repulsion faded, as soon as the shell came off. It was a sort of infatuation that fell on itself. Each of the pieces started staring at one another, even with their empty sockets, which went ahead to reveal that most of them had become peeling pieces, barely strapped on a body mass. In them there lay, something not even their own likes could convey, a troubling thought, to which he couldn't move on from.

'I need to build each of them a shrine here.'

'Not there, now that you revealed yourself, you may come here and never leave my side. Carry on with your work here and see what we might make out of it.'

The edge of stone, no more in its malicious stance, had taken a piece of itself out, revealing that kindly untouched doubt which reeked of him. And by no means could he carry himself any longer.

Not until they would received, each a shrine, for him and him and him.

This shubbulp of an ankh which entered in had that revealed the path towards the city of Ghrat. To no surprise, the many circular legs which grew and flew over him made it so he knew there'd be no trouble anywhere. For as long as he hid and observed, the buildings were tall and unnervingly not ending. The weather was awful, a mist or the fist of cyst which brought only the smell of lice, which spread like mice and hunted the emerging bats during the nights.

He had ventured as far as to meet, even though it wouldn't be rational to admit that he feared being there, he had. And he never approached them directly but in his fashionable play in dust cones he picked up from below, acting as if he faced them, which enabled him to talk.

'Stranger, oh citizen, who am I talking to?'

'Klackh, Krekh, Krok, Krekh.'

It was hard to decipher which of the four names was his. But the least he could pull away from him was this strangely shaped mandible which enabled him to walk. As soon as his strange oratory turned he saw what made him talk. A set of almost button-looking pieces deepened in his back. The mandible extended over his shoulder and pressed him until he could not do anything but wait. He would starve if he couldn't do it again.

And again he had, walking, picked up a dust cone, which showed him what they were for. It was all a misunderstanding, he knew. It came to him only then that he was pointing the tip, cutting a piece and letting the air in for a few moments. Afterwards a horn of a torn piece of a claw emerged, perhaps a taller side, even multiple handles which enabled him to grow and take a new entire dreadfully malign change.

He was tormented by the mere fact that his inability to compress his body to a smaller one was the consequence of the cone. In it he only saw his own way out, a path to walk on and no shout. That had been a second consequence given heed, the fact that it was hard to approach any object out of the fear of the mold. A foreseeable danger made him aware that each touch left a permanent fierce thing against any platform and every piece that had been touched.

‘Is this the reason I was sent here? To learn and to leave my mark upon this place for him?’

Poor sob still lingered whether or not it had been a test. What was he missing, this Crude Orghlifrunk, lost son, only looked for a way in which to convey his first altar. The shrine would have to be hidden but at same time lay in a relative plain sight, so he could find it by whatever clue. At first chance, as soon as the company left on the nearest end of stairs, he turned towards the building in order to carve in it one of his bodies. It was not perfect but it was him. After no longer being kept down, no wonder and no crown would lay on his toppled head. Distinctly spotted, this carving on himself, of the part of him which could even be made out of his mere power looked unsatisfactory and much worse than that. Like a pale corpse, it rose and almost attempted to rip itself from the rest of his body after recognizing itself in the sculpture he had made.

‘Planning on leaving me? But you’re a part with which I may never do well being pulled out off. Why is it that we cannot befriend one another even after being expelled from our conception spot?’

As the Crude Orghlifrunk emerged victorious in the fight of stolid gazes, he did the inadmissible account of reforming his body so he would be sure that none of them would leave him if the opportunity ever arose. By the likes of many defilers, after coming under so many hands, he had made one last alteration. The face would be implanted in his chest.

‘like it ought to be, here he will watch over us, never to betray but not to talk. He won’t tell us that we don’t belong any longer.’

No more deceptions, no more refusals, only this strange paradise to which, drawn or not, he looked from the distance of the giant bridges connected to the grand arches and the cylindrical double pointed spears which connected both the ceiling and the bottom of the floor. Upon which dwelled the spectators when they weren’t at home. Even he of all might have realized by now that their place of dwellings wasn't there, but in the arena where the gladiatorial fights swelled at the watch. Nothing would be wasted, for the deranged conductor and its mark, as cheerfully spirited, touched by an illness which bore.

'I will go forward and make something of my body. We need the proper ways of dwelling in such a gigantic place.'

For which, the Crude Orghli Frank started carving a pair of wings from two of the bodies in the back, which wouldn't be missed by any chance. It would be disturbing to think so, especially since the latter only made it so they'd feel each touch. And each touch of that dust-cone perturbed something of the entire sanctity it had, bearing the likes of widespread crawling feet attached to the wings. But they worked, not as expected.

As soon as he had begun flapping them, they grew fatter, until blisters formed from the mad isolation which followed. He had found out on his own skin that as soon as he would try to set himself into flight, a great light would emerge into a pair of hands, which weren't dignified as they wore brass rings around each finger, the kind of leashes which kept them in check. It only appeared that they were set there for a reason, that being the complete removal of any free will.

The being from which they had been cut must've been a dreadful one indeed. Unknown to him as it may be, out there, in some obscure place, he spent his lifetime walking, abandoned and left to earn his existence or maintain his survival by walking. Someday he may be redeemed but until then he would find nothing but servitude for those who entered the lower levels of the coliseum, where he served as a torch. Nothing more, but a mere, handless grand servant.

He was big, enough that he would still put on a fight if challenged. And his chin and face, that fiery beard, glowing like some peculiar listless touch of sparking fire, he rose and crushed the beetles below him. Sad had fallen, dirt from above, dead lions and panthers were held in the cages. This Solareius could march and walk through them, melting them completely without feeling any disgrace.

But fathom me no less, he thought, as he was met by a complete copy of him, forged entirely of brass. It was him, whom he feared, Eclipseus, who served as a way to block him, to maintain a large shadow behind him which kept the combatants in the dark.

'May I not be allowed to drink some water now? I thought I was supposed to be kept in my best condition now.'

What's all this about?'

The unrest started, almost like a wave. Again, something seeped into this man, who should've acted normal, who might've been somewhat beyond saving. In him there lay nothing but a kind of imminence which made him want to get himself slain, fading into a hard rock by the quay in which their cages had been strapped into. Lacking in the deceitful trenches, the others watched him in hope that he would get himself killed.

‘Why you should be allowed, if you do not mind, what is that of which prevents you from filling your empty trout with as much water as you may take?’

After all, it’s there, beyond your reach, what’s the hesitation?’

The slave-champion only came, drawing near to his comrade in arms, only to defy the expectation of Eclipseus who had expected, this one to drink and shout and writhe in doubt.

‘Are you implying I’m some limp executioner who was sent here to taunt you?’

‘My good Eclipseus, your words are a dead giveaway, I can see that you unwrap yourself to us with as little shame as one could spare. It’s obvious that you want us dead for some reason or another so drop the act.’

‘I shall not. Listen, you do not understand how many sacrifices I had to go through in order to get here.’

‘But I thought you were an imitation, nothing more and nothing less. You’re hiding something.’

He bit his lip as if it was decided. He was a liar after all, caught by the malicious intent he had. Unable to fight back, he reverse to assistance unless something else came about.

‘We’re alike, aren’t we? How about it then? Help me and we shall work together towards your cause. I shall help you in return to escape this place, if you could only aid me.’

But the flame inside of him could only burn higher as he admitted not a song and not a word towards his like. This one ought to be ashamed. This one was filth incarnate and he couldn’t help himself but reveal what he was after all.

‘You are no shade of mine, pretender. Though your brass body might prevent me from destroying you, I shall make sure you will suffer for as long as it takes, until you will give in.’

‘Never, I cannot be molded; I am immune to your heat as well as to any of your filthy words. Know that I’m insulted.’

As he said it, he returned. Prepared for this second verse, he walked unnervingly towards them, pushing through one tiny cup he grabbed from the ground. They would often feel as if it was necessary to throw it towards him, to humiliate him even further. It wasn’t until a few moments in that he had realized that what he was seeing had only been the likes of court. No more would he feel the benign, the likes of having tried to change them.

‘If I were to drink an entire cup filled with the water, will you do the same? Will you believe me when I say that I changed the poison with clean drinkable fluids for you alone to have?’

‘And why should we believe you? Think as you are, this dreadful thing won’t take you far.’

‘do me this favor and I promise I shall leave you alone.’

‘Will you give is light then?’

‘If it’s worth it for you prisoner, so be it.’

Another one of them came in, bearing his jaunty traps around his wrapping satchel. This one had been a collector of many spades, plenty of blades and a few hammers. Since he had been such a grand fighter, he had been allowed to keep them. Enough already make them drink.

He wasn’t supposed to do it. He had the limit of fighters that could be caged inside his mind. It would be undeniable to say that he hadn’t spared himself no word and no seething desire to take at least a bite out of him there.

The counter ticked and inside the various ringed openings above them, a bunch of multi-pierced nails would draw back for the new-comers to awake from their peculiar pods. No longer kept in storage, the newest specimens, harder of head, stronger, healthier and younger like in the day they had been kidnapper from would be taken and drawn. No longer gone but forced to defile what was worth.

Of their legacy, little would be known. But in order to do it, he had to slay a few of them, to empty the space and clean the mess he had acquired.

‘Very well, I shall drink from one of the cups.’

‘And I shall join him.’

‘It’s a trick, don’t fall for it, he has something in his sleeves, I know it. This brute of a brass doesn’t know what it like is to be alive. Look at how animated it is, he must’ve been afflicted by a spell which gave it life. I swear.’

‘Now now, be fair. You called me a liar, a cheap trick and an imitation, now I’m an animated creature as well, bred to stand guard like brass sentry caught inside a trap of his own remark?’

‘That’s not what I said, don’t put words in my mouth, scum. I’ll see that you will suffer if we’re ever to meet in the field of battle.’

‘If you ought to be cowardly, so be it, but do not drag your brotherly attention to them. Otherwise, I shall grab them directly and strangle them through the bars.’

‘Try it then.’

As fiercely caught by this sudden meet of clutches, they had been repelled, both of them, by the heedlessness and recklessness they had displayed.

‘To your freedom, then, as much as I can give.’

‘To our freedom.’

Neither of them could be stopped, out of the four caged fighters, only two of them survived. It was a sad scene to unfold, more so that for a moment when the brass fiend revealed itself entirely in front of them all. Right before the last moment they would need to feel alive.

This teal-like skin wrapped around, almost bark-like, big shouldered and formed. He looked with two round glowing eyes which projected in the front as soon as he had realized that the glowing fiend had appeared and with his long arms he wrapped from above his shoulder and started squirming through him in as wide an area as he could entail. Before a shout could be heard, as soon as his shield of brass was done with, he had been entirely exposed. Inside of him, the various clicking keys no longer clicked and started spreading. The giant piece at the back of his head came forward, barely attached to a shoulder which came off as well. Both then gave the impression that there might’ve been a smaller creature trying to escape from him. But that hadn’t been all, as soon as he had come to terms of his sudden repel of life, he wanted to give in and leave his mark in the world.

He desired to shout out of the pain as if it hadn’t been anything more other than the lack of credence he had felt. His jaw release entirely and drew away to his right side. Only one piece of his face remained whole, bearing the side and the nose, everything else exposed lain in a mess that seemed to be barely attached.

With this act of evil, in his way, Solareius lost his light. No longer animated by in, he faded into sight. Dark encompassed the room and the two prisoners, the unknown fighter and the champion had witnessed the shocking expression left by a shouting evil unlike any other.

The only one who had received such a grim blow that left them exposed.

His body looked like a giant cask, from with a pair of empty faced, longed bodied corpses made their way out. Above them lay the organ which had been his beating vessel of life-force, the scum in it still pumping forth to enable him to last a few more seconds. From his barely attached piece of the jaw, almost audible, the scream of terror had come. And they would see this Eclipseus in his own tormented teeth, beating at each other as they attempted to reconcile the loss.

They couldn’t shake off the after-effect of this suicide, as neither of them could pass it off as anything else. For as much as they would think of it, this had been unintended, obscure but lost. As they started shimmering near one another, they welcomed the newcomers with a feeling of uncertainty and a lack of trust which shouldn’t have been ified as easily as it had been then.

‘Where am I? I can’t see where my feet are.’

‘That’s because they’re missing.’

‘A cripple in the barracks? How did you manage to survive the fight, why did they let you in here?’

‘I don’t know, I don’t get it either. They’re trying to pin me down with something, I heard. The, the owners wanted to pin me down with a murder I didn’t commit.’

‘And for that they took your?’

Not even the torch could spare him of the punishment he had received. It wasn’t likely that he’d get the misery and the like, he would have to fight eventually if he were to spare himself of a quick execution.

‘We may not be able to see one another now, but don’t go any further inside the confines of this trap. Two of our men had been poisoned with the water.’

That left only the occasional glance and that dismissal of anything even remotely accessible to them, no walls, which could barely be felt as the estrangement of being constantly pushed away from it and the wind which blushed with the likes of a fever. Before they could do the proper interaction and the cordial words they may have been able to contort, the fiend in the dark approached. It was unconceivable that this strange curse of him would be eventually found, but without a doubt, he wouldn’t be spared. No more had he dared.

‘And I would get to move and see again, and writhe and walk and finally give my wings another start.’

To which he pointed, sewn, diseases churned into his own petition, to his own admission, bear to cope. He would release himself from the ground and scout.

The Crude Orghlifrunk released himself from the curse they had dare throw upon him, only to reveal that he had released his malignant fiendish hips, grown as fatter bats, alighted by the remnants of some almost charcoal hands that faded. Beyond the city, there lay the rims of grand catastrophe, likened to the woe.

He walked and showed himself the grave constructors who were laid to rest. Against the base of the grand castles upon which they had never been granted the pest of many conglomerating seas. For that alone they had made the walking domes, beneath their own floors, wretched at each other’s doors.

‘Do not mind me, as I’ve come only to create a shrine inside one of your bases, if you wouldn’t mind.’

‘But have thee pity, for we’re not the ones to spare this. What are you planning to do here afterwards, new blood, meat-of-another-kind.

If you place you mark below, know that we won’t have another chance to leave thy be. To which we shall writhe in rest. A sacrilege unlike any other will be placed under our commission and we’ll end up being left without a home?’

‘I won’t destroy anything, I only meant to leave my mark, the shape of one of my wings here, and one there.’

‘Why are you asking us then? Our permission might not be given, nor be bought. If you continue on thine path, there will only be a seed of destruction brought.’

‘Must I be forced to beg?’

‘The stability comes forth, before your decrepit desires. Without it, we stand at risk of losing ourselves and what makes us thick. A piece of us is imbued inside the building and without the kind we may go restlessly unkind to our kin.

Little of our rage could be contained by normal means, which would only make us come and trap, to crush and discern only the mourning of each shattering blow, the likes which would bring the buildings down to ruin.’

But these builders had been head-strong, way too much for them to be kindly taken, least of all, they were mistaken.

‘I will do as I please and.’

Without realizing how much he had taken from his father, he stepped on one of the architects and left a wing slide in it. That had been quaint, and well received, with the help of the cone, he made it sink. A few more touches, of tools which couldn’t have been discerned at all, and there it was. A grand form.

Many of the builders came, dragging themselves off the dust, coming in their musky brown-dust covers, sealing their features underneath one of the fewer shades that popped to their eyes.

‘This will not go well.’

‘He shall not be forgiven for what he’s done, do you hear? This cretin-defiler has done too much harm to be allowed to leave.’

Despite a quick attempt for some jabs, he leaped and flew out of the way, unable to repel himself and the others. They gathered like a great shadow underneath him, trying to push each other in order to get closer. Yet none attempted to leap. As closely as they would gather in, vaster blows and spitting throngs were thrown out of the fact that neither of them could draw himself near his shrine.

‘What’s stopping you from getting rid of it then?’

‘If we’re to remove a piece made by you, that...that would make our hands.’

At which they looked, as the various calluses had been a dead-giveaway of the misgivings brought on them. By no oratory could they be spared. If this was to be the final call to which one was to dare a reprise, this would be it.

‘Go away then, you wouldn’t understand. We’re working mechanically, which means, if we were to start and bash, we wouldn’t stop until the city would be lost.’

More than often, ice would be indistinguishable between them. It was a deciding factor which only drew away from the methods I which they negotiated through the trance. Less than, they would make a habit out of challenging one another to duels in their prime.

‘Greeting, charger, knight Agamemnonpi.’

‘The please is all mine, Agamemnonpi.’

Salted and seen, they would show no interest to pace. And least ware of their first encounter, they would go on one after another, charging striking, ending up in walls. It was impossible to keep track of these tricksters, body wagers, deranged prolonged wagers which only took away what was theirs. In less than five spans of time, the tournament had begun.

Less than eight quarters of the rows had been filled by Agamemnon, in as little time as one should count himself out and off, to behead himself and lose a doubt. To whom shall we bet?

‘I see that we were given pass for now.’

They said after looking as the Suppressor, who inhabited every single top row, and ever bottom one in the front, making sure they would be looked after, so that none would slip by. This sudden allegiance or mark of piece was carried by a pigeon, a hope in the form of white which floated about and cared less of the doubt which had been shown. It would come as the eclipse, admits them, now to see.

‘Where is the sun-bringer, that handless booster who was supposed to light the torches?’

‘Grand admiral Cvartees, I must apologize for my intrusion. My intrusion being brought to you in the form of a high denial, in which I attest that we were denied the flame. Instead of it, we’re going to have to light them ourselves.’

‘What for? What kind of sorcery took care of him? He was supposed to be indestructible.’

‘But he was, our magi and their evil powers combined into the power of the mighty vibrating towers and...’

‘And what?’

‘There was one weakness, they had spoken of, in case there was some danger in which case, they could’ve been completely destroyed if they came into contact with anyone made out of brass.’

‘Like the fiend we placed below him to watch him over?’

‘He is dead, both of them are slain, no longer standing as guards, they’re benign now.’

‘What do you mean by that?’

‘Below the rims of the jail, they began inhabiting it, blocking the water source.’

‘But it was poisoned.’

‘It doesn’t matter any more. They like it, adore it even, I believe they might even have planted eggs inside of it after growing in together there.’

After the aphrodisiac of wonder which turned both of their minds inwardly, they would have to look for a way in. Both of them had seethed as they lost the utmost part of grand importance that haunted them for as long as they roamed the depths of the jar. That was the entire form of the prison, not including the jail, the overall shape had been made to catch one firefly, which now lay doomed. And like a carpet, half of skin, half or rubbery thinned growths and one piece of charcoal which moved in to the cone.

‘They have been given access to one of the dust cones? But that’s impossible. Guards come here immediately. ‘

As the shout came in, no longer did they shy away and made it to the lower levels, towards the threat, whatever it might be. It was a test of might, the likes of which entangled the first arrival of those deranged passers.

‘We’ve lost them, sir, I’m afraid all of them are dead.’

‘I can see that, Hortno. But what of you, my dearly small headed, likened to the piece of a crab.’

For this next stricken blow he sent him there to join them. It would deflect for a few various hours before someone was to notice. It ended up being a complete waste of the fighters who would be lowered from the pods only to be eaten forth. Lost to their needs, the habit of abandoning them continued, with even less courage shown. They would be abandoned, left to that thing which threatened the tournament for as long as it might go unattended.

But he, Cvartees, unforgettable out of the kind of less respect than a man should’ve been given, chose to run and close the gates behind him. Now let them do with him themselves and we shall see what we’ll make of it. And yet this change of events had mattered even less than it had been concerned. To be more precise, what mattered more had been the fact that out there one would be brought to a loss, the danger of knowing.

‘Why is it that we were brought here with you?’

‘Is that an honest curiosity of yours or do you seek to taunt me for some undisclosed reason? ‘

‘I’m merely interested, that’s all. I see no reason to speak of ill, no reason for which we may be enemies, grand Suppressor, I believe we have a place together, in the reign, the thrones of the universes need to be filled and who else but us?’

‘There’s no desire here for us to become conquerors. You were given a chance to show us that you may behave, that you could keep your essence at bay and prevent it from spreading.’

So far it had worked well. To the lower levels of energy which filled the room, and to the weaker forms in which they had come to avoid capture, they had been delighted to look at the show. It was magnificent, another blow.

‘From the mighty Agamemnon, the one who should matter less, he came in front and bitter tongues could only throw themselves erratically at him again. He’s looking for a pity strike, he’s coming down.’

And growing back up, for he had taken the knight to the horse and connected them in the worst manner possible. Even the armor appeared to have joined their being. Stared at by the watchers who might not be able to draw their insides from the lower regions of the dueling area.

After all, a mightier champion and his eight squires were there. All empty from the boots, down at their cut rails, they went ahead, never bothering to search for a reason to be dead. In their lichen appearance, with all the gravel they carried in their backs, one could draw the fact that they were an army of dead. Following their Lich, Agamemnonleach, who bore, an unsanitary amount of skulls around his bone shroud. Open about foot ten seconds, he revealed the worst of things one could bare. He was wearing only that vestigial ritualistic armor as a means of hiding a giant skeleton inside of him.

If it were for that alone to be enough, he could bear the heed for another shock. In the body hands inside of him, there lay a giant bomb, rounded, grimed the metal horn which kept the echo from being produced. But a flit and a thunder could lit and see him explode. And if he drew too nearer.

‘Damn be them, for taking out all the torches, someone told them I would come, but whom?’

‘Should I try looking for the one in charge?’

‘Am I to make a fire now?’

‘No, you insolent servants, I am in need of a far greater weaponing that yours. I need minds, actual minds and to see.’

He silenced himself as soon as he saw them draw to his attention. As if they would involve themselves on neutral ground. There was a good reason for which they were there, instead of being anywhere else. For that reason be, the mark of that which was to see, who would take the first head home? And who would be double headed as a way to show that they were still the ruler of every world and victors of every fight.

A challenger approached. It would be interesting to search for a reason, in which he might be called out, or might see, what the reason for it is. Be it called into action, less than aware, he came dressed in silver and in gold, jewels were there, but not a single mark of scolded armory, the forge from which it had been wrought still laid in the hotness that had been bore into. He had arrived inside and looked to see, even for a moment as an invisible thing, a head inside the walls, which saw that inside of him there were millions of glowing diamonds. Was he mad?

‘I have checked you before I came and for that reason alone, I’ve come to challenge you.’

‘But you know what the risk is, the thing that you are carrying inside, have you little to no sense at all?’

‘I am mad. Don’t you see? I wish only the destruction of them, so I could fulfill one of my fantasies.’

‘Your fantasies come at a greater cost than I could ever possibly imagine. This is a fool’s errand from which not even I can draw you back. Defiler of what’s pure, should I expose you that they might laugh at you?’

‘Should I do the same now?’

For outside forces were already banned. Those creeping ghoulish squires being merely taken, as a matter of fact, they had been stamped and given a pass. No one would bat another eye if they were to try. So why would it matter if he had lobotomized and pulled something too near the mark. A piece of some brain, perhaps some bone, and bone and bones, and he remembered. The heat. His flask of oil had been rubbed, out of nowhere as it may be added. He lit it with the snap of his fingers only to deny the fact that he was turned on by it.

‘You want this to happen, don’t you?’

It winked a flattery which had been empty. Forgotten no more, there came forth the great conflagrator, bringer of disease. He had become a nasty abomination brought not from the cages but from the war-pig dens, from whence he at and ate, until he became a glutton. Far, obese, disturbing looking, a pile of flaps which wrapped around two enormous legs and arms which didn’t belong to a human at all. It would be cruel to say that there was hope for it to confer anything but the hunger they felt.

Eleven bellies for each of the face which grew on the pile, they would deflower and defile each other with their mockeries and words of ingratitude. Soon enough they puked on one another’s respiratory systems only to suffocate from time to time, while some would laugh, others dies. Only to be brought again, as soon as they felt like they had come prepared for the fight ahead. A bunch of wisp-like elongated rose-buts armed them. It would be impossible to think of it as any other way, but this had been the manner in which they fought.

Each step taken pushed the body into each direction until that robust pile, that oblong of a fatter sphere became a smaller point from where long necks emerged.

‘They have managed to attain full control over their bodies. What sorcery is this? I cannot fathom daring to face such a beast like it. Perhaps we should retreat and let them do what they please with us.’

It was something even the lower fighters, weak and starved thought. Their fear could not only be seen, but it was a matter of being there, experiencing the amount of unwonted delight which had been produced for them alone. A dread unlike any other felt like it was drawing forth, a take, to twice, the thrice the many necks which pushed on longer heeding legs revealed mandibles which grabbed a few of the blades from the ground.

In the midst of their strange rituals, it had come, like the feline which had been wrought in the pleasure of an everlasting dream of being eaten from its half a missing face, the derange fumes of pink and purple spreading inside its glowing white, almost radiant face which left a little of it to be seen. That vague openness in its body revealed only two tubes, which couldn’t have been anything his. The brokenness inside his body only went as far as to show that this husk of what had once been the dormant best of Kyrioth lay mistakenly at a loss. A few of its blunt teeth were still present in an almost smirk, which couldn’t even be distinguishable from the openness of the maw it released forth.

In itself, it stood exposed, and the green moldering remains inside of it started coming forth. For its lack of state, it had attempted to remain alive, by praying a piece of its white essence into the nearest stone it could find. The edges in it began protruding their teeth forward and it was indubitable that this cliff had become it, by no means of normality, as it could be found. This uncertainty of unawareness, the recklessness and boldness it showed there could do nothing but distract from the gaseous being that played at him again.

A piece of its hard head could be seen, as the long whips of dark started pushing out. A malady, their dance had been as the yellow bricks and the hole which had been wrought inside of him revealed nothing but a decaying spirit. Unlike what had been eaten there, the gaseous thing could find somewhere, deeper inside of it to dig, farther than that, it went inside to seethe. Not even likely that it could feel something now, it struggled in the fight.

Whatever happened inside of him wasn’t right, with each jerk of a piece of his squared off, cut legs, he attempted to rise again. It would take some time for the fiend of gas to become solid again in order to take a few bites. And every time it had, the creature recoiled, and another attempt came at its life. Despite its vaguely exposed and encased head being torn apart, in an utmost insulting way, he turned and tried to bite off the purple parasite’s head off. A chomp and a crash resulted in nothing but the insulting woe.

And every time it drew onward to try again, the cliffs and edges of stone would change again, drawing forwards even more from him. With each strike, a large splash of its long jets of blood would sprout forward and leave some marks against its own body, melting pieces of what should’ve been pure. Small tingles and leaves of white-looking leaves fell from above, their abortion leaving him even more exposed. This purple vulture didn’t stop, until an eye grew on the distant hill behind him, bringing the final blow.

He would be picked up from his disabled place and in the end he'd be eaten again. Why would he be suffered in that dream? It couldn't be done with, but he had found himself releasing it over and over again. It was an outcome of the punishment of being locked inside a dark, unlit cage for eons, forced to lay there and suffer only because he had looked the way he had. For only during contact with light could it radiate, unless something else came and gave it the means to bring the luminescence of the sky.

Surrounding the two of them, was the blue sky, nimble as crows drew by and immediately got repelled as the rim of the gas started going at it again, rising towards the sky, pushing through until there'd be no cry from the animals surrounding the area. Farther away from the scene, a serene melancholy approached, as the spikes emerged from the throngs of the earth, pushing as the magnificent poison took its toll.

Both of them had progressed, even in death, in one case to fully encompass the scene of pollution which expanded as far as it might reach.

'What have I seen now?'

'And what would that be?'

Asked another, both of them being taught not to stare, not to bother anyone who was in there. For in the mind of the beast, there was no passing, as much as its dream somewhat drew them closer to him.

'Must we intrude on the thing and see the reason for its self-perpetuating terror?'

'I cannot see any other reason for which we may be able to flee from sight. I need to look in, for more than I should care to admit.'

Only the boredom of the tournament had carried them to draw inside, to witness the dream, and see it from inches where he stood. So far they looked at it from the visors of adjacent insects that could do nothing more than the act they had been seething in for it.

'Can we at least touch him? Does he realize he's still alive, even in this dead husk he's trying to relieve the pain?'

'I cannot know for certain unless I join him again. Come, come, we shall enter him and see it for ourselves, if we feel anything we shall draw out.'

'And if I dare leave you go there alone?'

'Then I shall find a reason not to approach you any longer. My satisfaction will be ill. But I plead with you that we may save this creature from the self-imposed grimness, for he cannot help it.'

‘It had dumbbed itself down for no reason. You are right. We should torment it no less and make sure it might confess a way out.’

For their vision seemed to match his. If they could find a way to counter his trappings, perhaps there might a chance for them as well. But it wasn’t the body they inhabited, but the insides which hadn’t been eaten. Through the exposed door like opening, though it had been somewhat circled out to the side, there was the likes of ribs attached to the pile. More so, the nose started blowing as much hot air as it could.

‘It knows we’re here, I can feel with each of his breathes.’

‘I can feel it as well as you have, but I cannot shake it away.’

The grin hadn’t faded, only expanded. Undermost to them, he was merely being forced to awaken in the real world. In one of the dens, where his ashen skin had almost faded, he had pulled forth and started a motion of levitation. He himself could conjure up some gaseous malign through a way or another. With each push, the gates would shake and he could not be scourged again. In painless dances, he had come to stand in his dream.

And no longer protected by the fact that it had been a gas, the parasite woke up in his mouth. A splash which shouldn’t have spread the entirety of the brain-scum inside of him had come to flow, like a cherries being crushed immediately, then lost across the ground. It would dance then, and pull away, looking at itself as much as they could see. One of his reflections, a part of him drew to the sea. Oh, how long would it take until he would completely wake? It was a rush which wouldn’t even hold itself until it was too late.

He broke the door and came to see, the likes of the tournament where they all be present there. His long-dormant shade began the radiance which pushed out such a prowess that the likes of the combatants had never seen.

By the time the mockery had ended, and before the two other shrines could be placed, even the lost son had noticed the likes a light which could not be suppressed by them.

‘What is that thing? Why does it radiate so highly, more so than the fading fires?’

Neither of them dared question what powers that creature hid. It couldn’t set itself in full flight, and as it came back into awareness, it could levitate no longer. Only the heaviness of its eyes held it as high as it could. And the coliseum started bearing its walls towards is. Like a fluster of toned-butterflies, he began imprinting itself in the walls.

‘That is the reason for which we had to hold it back. We cannot risk it producing itself over and over and over again. We would be blinded by that much light as it manages to produce.’

But any kind of malign corruption could turn it to them. Even the suitors of dread couldn't be expected to handle the pain which came with it. If they even released their bounds of their captives, they would suffer a disaster more than anything ever encountered before. There were too many of them seated in the rows to match.

Dangerously set there, even the two hooligan-fiends had managed to survive and leave the body without being contaminated at all.

'Pity be we the fact that we are here.'

At which turned, some of the condensers, the jousters and the fighters, asked by the dominant king.

'You must defeat this foe so we may suppress it before the coming of the unseen afflicts us all.'

But that had been only the jest of misery, for most of those decay-looking faces were almost blind themselves, and they relied on another kind of blessing which had forced them to see. It wasn't meant to be that way, but that had been it. Dreadfully aware, there'd be something out there to grasp and eat, if only one could muster the courage to go on.

'I shall eat a piece of him if it is worth it. Do not consolidate my position yet. I need this for myself.'

He said, as he made it through on a small horse with four heads, lost to touch, brought to a quick end, fingerless, at that sharp end beneath him where he carried a few worm-like appendages left in by one squire by the name of Eklyreot.

'Swear to me that I shall feel the doom as soon as I will come into contact with it.'

Horses bore no answers, especially those who bore the marks of missing eye pieces. Like bands of iron which had merely stolen what had been theirs during youth, they walked only at the command of the rider, who couldn't hide the fact that he had stricken a squire down. The horse needed to be filled with him, and then sutures be placed. Otherwise, he wouldn't be able to walk again, and march through the hunt. The charge emerged and as soon as the skeleton inside of him would feel enough heat, there it came.

It pushed out of his armor like some kind of enlarging gateway, through which is massive body which daringly challenged the very size of the contender as it bore, the giant round bomb. A few signs of doom came on it, all of which had at least bore some kind of essence which was missing. The pain would make him shout. About him lay a few uncertainties which couldn't be resolved by normal means. His mind had been forced, to lie as quietly as he would see the gaze of missing prints.

The skeleton could not be seen. Even though those giant eyes recorded everything around him, the cleaned bones could only serve a reflection of his own. Even the polished edges of his exploding device came, revealing what he had truly come from. A marvelous end. Applauses went by as he looked at a fiend which had met the supreme act of exposure to unlawful materials, the fire and supreme explosions, which carried on to spread its entire body across the sandy floors of the tournament outdoors. No excuse would lie anymore.

Chapter 2

The Duke

In the cortex of the grand Duke, atop his malefic castle stood many arched spires, bent, twisted and crisscrossed to the point of shooting in both directional frontal ends. It was time for the Arch Duke, man made out of amassing filth to step forward.

About his every step, there was some kind of lyre, which had only dragged from every corner of the realm. Those formations raised themselves from about every corner, pushing smolderingly with every layer of befallen pouch that had been crushed above his reach.

Within their hold, the castle had no intention of falling. And they were restless, those beings made of ingrown gutted, sponge-like swollen twisted filaments which formed themselves in pox-like growths. Such filaments had hardened overtime, leaving something close to solid bodies, much needed to prevent the pox from spreading and jumping onto the metallic surfaces atop the castle.

If one were to push himself out the sight, he would look upon the spire as one of many distinct ones, with the others being only straight and dark and filled with unwashed side needles which moved only when the most lurid of senses awoke them from slumber. From each step on the stairs, one could see them bending in order to make way for a different kind of portal which could only wait for its master's arrival.

Some magnificence lay to the architectural remark of the entryway to the castle, and much more to the fact that one couldn't help if it he were to wrongly step on one of those things, for he would be taken to a world unlike many others, in which he would only suffer no less of his senile insolence.

A young man had once ventured such a place, in some dimensional attempt to travel through the decrepit world he found himself in. After a few steps, not only had he been aged through the process of forcefully attempting the supreme travel, but he had died out of exposure to the bio-chemical other-worldly toxins his body had been exposed to. No matter what it had been like, one couldn't deny the fact that the entirety of his very being had been drawn upon the undertaken journey.

That hadn't been all. Far beneath the stairs, there lay the main entrance to the castle, from which the Duke had appeared from. He had been one to be weary of strangers, as the gate itself only bore such marks as to repel any other men who'd dare approach him, as to rot his guts and be alive. It would be rather unnerving, to believe that there could be any other exposure there, but inside his chamber, no outsider's existence may be permitted living.

One hole had been placed on top of the ceiling, which had only made it so there would be none to be granted any escape. He suffered no presence in his private chamber. From the hole, there seemed to come a shower of the most repulsive manner. It only drove their kind to some dread, as there laid vacuous toxins which had been dreadfully forced inside his own manor, far beneath the castle where he hid his trust.

That chamber had only served for once glance, for a stranger who somehow may have found himself lucky not to have been killed, while on his way, standing there in front of his walls. As the Duke only remained there, in his peculiar crafty nested manor, which had been shaped like some sack, resting beneath the floating castle, in a place of being where there had been nothing but a sea made out of the liquid which had been scourged from inside the pox.

Pure agony remained, for many living creatures swam and had to suffer endlessly inside the many ventures of that sea. No more than it had been necessary for one to believe he would stand a chance, that had been it. For, whatever inhabited that peculiar sea, it only seemed like the various chemicals inside of it prevented any consciousness from ever being given birth.

Someone would be inclined to set himself in awe at what was going on in there. But not the Duke, for he chose to leave the place, as he would suffer never to look upon its gaze, nor would he be able to deal with the lack of conversation forever.

There had been others in the past which had presented themselves in front of his court.

Once, there had been a grand floating city which surrounded his castle, affected by the malignity which governed his own kind. There was some deterrence of some kind, which could only force him to deal with his upcoming loss of mind.

Inside his nest, though, inside his manor, as he had called it, he only seemed to store his long-deceased jesters. And there were a lot of them standing inside of it, finely dressed in brown clothes with their finely painted red toes. But he had lost interest in the dead.

He was stranded there, still with the choice. Whatever the Duke even came up to, he couldn't stop reminiscing of the distant past, all of that world and everything which had been crafted in his name.

Much of the grandness of that city had been spread to unknown eons of construction. Statues which had been shapes to his grand-liking and his statues lay erect, somewhat spread and miss formed to end up where they lay. And as for him, nothing else might do, especially not without his long desired servants.

'I am immortal yet I'm trapped. As long as I am here, I may not age, I may not die, but I may not stumble on any future at that.'

As he knew very well that he couldn't come upon no more. There could be no one to speak his mind to, none of the matter. A mild force prevented anyone else from making their way to his world. And it was not up to him to choose which one may look upon the barrier or what may be done about it.

Would someone like the Duke give in to another man if he were to be overpowered on the other side?

After all, that had to be taken into consideration. He would be rather frail out there and what of his memories as well?

If he were to die, in that place, there'd be no way to bring him back to life, or even return at all.

As soon after it would happen for him to get out of the portal, there would be no return to his castle or his nest. The Duke had grown accustomed to his living on his small patch of land. If he were to step out, then back in, by the time the journey had occurred, he would end up being dragged below, into the waste.

He hadn't thought of it that often, but his city had to be somewhere underneath the sea. Most of it, if not all had to already have been corroded by now.

With a slight bent, he picked up a piece of some small plant he stumbled upon, naturally occurring on the stone formation upon which his small hold had been. The many rhombus-like formations near the side appeared to be way too rough for him to grab a hold of any. In that case, he could only smash and throw a few, if he had desired. Yet he wondered.

Was his gauntlet hard enough? What of his countenance?

He strolled over and broke his fist in an attempt to strike.

It was some fever thought after all. Of course he couldn't simply break everything by hand. The strike had only slipped and there was no pain in it at all. No damage could be done to the land, at least not by brute force. He would only have to mutter some simple words and the castle would simply fall, taking him with it as well as with the pox.

Would he live forever at that bottomless sea of filth? Could one even account of such a life if he were to be trapped underneath such a place?

The Duke was not pleased by that thought alone. Why, he saw them all beneath him, by every mean and every measure, all those bodies that lacked in feel and touch any kind of pleasure.

It was time to come forth.

His destiny awaited on the other side, when one had meant to see what lay, from that plane from which men came boasting of some high adventure. He stepped in then, pushing forth, the portal leeching up to his girth.

It felt that, by this, the many spreading spires curved as if to stop their master. If they could shout at him in order to prevent his escape, they might've. That did not happen. And many of them would spread their hidden wings as their master happened to leave now.

This attempt had been desperate, yet no wing, no matter how wide and tall it may have been could push forward and throw itself in such a manner as they had in that very last moment. Most of the depravity faded and alas, the fall had commenced.

And as it had, the wings now faded, pushing forwardly, thrusting less as they had come to a bitter end, drawing inwardly to their own portals as if by accident or by some kind of attempt at their very own lives. An established connection came, the wings were drawn, and as they aged, the portals would never stagger for the likes of none.

And the sea would only grow and boast as it drew inwardly to a whole new host. For, those portals lead to other worlds, from which the entry may never be staved.

Now, what remained of the Duke? He had been lost to some fluke. Never would he come to be, never would he see what's wrong or right, of this world and out of sight.

Words echoed then.

There needs to be an altar in the middle of the large platform in the court of my new supreme creation. It shall be the epitome, my magnum opus of dead!

Look upon it, and how that poorly-made sculpture lays in the middle of it.

A grander plan as it had seemed couldn't have looked any more well done than it had been. By the limitations of the metallic towers and the chains which had been placed inside the dragging rotator raised the gates to reveal the rest of the components which had been stored inside the newly constructed castle.

There was an alien-reactor and a body-engine which had been made out of several quantum-atomic enchanted plutonium grub reserves. Various electronic filth apparatuses had been placed around it to make sure it would never get to the point of melting or getting past a certain limit which may force some kind of implosion to occur.

In this new construction, for now, everything had been simple. A flat platform, some flat forms from which protruded some face-like sculptures which opened to reveal the various energy sources which lay inside of them. They bore those giant metal globes which had been anchored to the ground. Gravity-deifiers they called them.

What appeared to be a cold-like embrace had been nothing but the agony of the heavy weight which had been forced upon it. No more would one be called into action, and yet some agony remained present at all times. Those things weren't supposed to be there.

A weird style had been present there. Everything looked as it had been modeled after some obscure movement in which some architectural elements had been borrowed and misappropriated. First of all, the machines had been coated in a dark red, metallic rust being present about everywhere, obtained either from pain or some malignant occupation of some intersected shades.

They were slowly becoming energized. While being bleakly-looking in appearance, those lightning forces had spread and started pushing through like some carpets of lightning. Their power spread through the structure, including the main large pointing corners it bore. And there long ivory-like nested spikes as well, as he had liked them.

Everything had been present in one form or another, regardless of intention or of woe. It wouldn't be normal otherwise, this strange demise of thoughts.

'I will open and venture in your world, oh, great speaker. If it weren't for you to appear and provoke my thought, I would never have survived.

This I promise you.'

Said the Duke, upon his arrival to the conclusion. While he declared some allegiance to that one, he spoke of nothing less than his desire of thought provoking retribution.

The lightnings stroke his body, yet he remained unaffected. On this new plane of existence where the world had been filled with the red-looking living metal moving servants whom he enslaved he had already begun the construction of his new world.

Each and every single one of them would serve and be directed underneath his might. His vision wouldn't be taken lightly and now, now it came to him again. He'd be agitated by that sickness which had afflicted him ever since he had come into the world. Nothing appeared to matter of to disturb his thoughts for as long as he reigned.

It was by then that his machines started drawing in enough power that the alteration of the confines which bordered multiple worlds came. Not only would he pair himself with the least of thoughts of the abnormalities which happened but he would also try to gain power over them. As the many servants were busy themselves building him a new city on that empty world, where the land had been akin to a rock filled with empty gaps, colorless to the touch, which also lacked stars and moons and every kind of rune which be, he had done some unforgivable.

What he invited into the world was some kind of parasitical entity which moved immediately out of his portal and had encompassed every surface in the world. A constant moving color which was transparent, slimy, and greenish-yellow in defiance of the everything else now permanently stood, drawing in itself whatever it could.

As the portal closed, the Duke realized that there wasn't anything he could do to expel it. This new turn of events couldn't have been easily removed at all, with nothing in store; the bore of the world had been the degenerate kind of upturn he had filled everything with.

'I must leave you now that you're infested. I see that you're no longer going to work with this thing on you. Perhaps it is my fault now that I have given into the arrogance of mine. For this I shall bid thee fare well.'

He spoke as he entered the new combination. It would take a while to find the new one. But this world was theirs now. And they had already gone on their way to create a new generation of smile-beings, which had taken something of their own from his experiment chamber.

Why, they bore the lightning inside their bodies. This parasite had spread the shock in every spot and through every inch of its body. It was because of him that these slave-beings would never be able to return to their own selves. Not so much as it would matter, it was then that he stepped into the other world again, abandoning everything which was there.

Even his creations had been twisted and repurposed by the parasitical entity which began forming its giant body. With this newly acquired dimension, a smaller plane of the mad deity would be restored. It had to be that way, after all, it had been shot from his head, through a dimensional gate, that it would still find a way to restore its own body in the end.

So many plans had been made, that it would ensure its survival, at all costs regardless of malignity and despair.

Nonetheless, he had reached another world, and he had been weakened by the travel. It shouldn't have been that way, but it was. Unforgivable as well by means of disillusion, there could be a way back. His armor had faded away; the plates which had covered him were no more.

They had been ripped apart by the chords which had been spread in those flatlands in front of him. Everything looked like the plain of long orange sandstorms solidified in place. They had that ever-moving illusion being projected underneath them. Various waves could be seen. It was at least unnerving, to be told the least.

It could be called even less into action. That those fields were seen that way. It couldn't be right, it shouldn't have been right. Without knowledge of the past, and what had been seen, it was obvious enough that there was a stinger, a ray, a magnificent grotto which waited for him.

In front of him, the vision had been disturbed by the heat which had come from below. His feet had been weary, but at least, the chords had gone away for now. Left exposed that way made him feel petty. Not unlikely that he was naked, he wore petty white robes and pieces of cloth, chained by leather. Most of the mass of his muscle was still there, after years of carrying the armor around.

Bluish shades covered his skin, his fingers were scarred and big and long, bony in appearance. They had been forced into the gloves he wore, up to the point where pain had taken them off. Without being as deranged, he would be called into the whip of the strange plausibility of woe.

'I must know what this is. Who is it that waits for me? You shouldn't have bothered for this exchange if thought. I will force you of your hole in the ground.'

The Duke wasn't pleased, not as much as he would've been. This magnificence was vile.

He rose up from the ground like some great dormant mummified pharaoh who projected his mask over the side of his face. It had been adorned by many tiny servants who had been granted the honor to be buried into this living mask. They were raised in their peculiar body formations and appeared to be in various prone positions which couldn't be forced out.

It wasn't certain any longer, why it had been that way. Awe and grace, such a disgrace had seemed only for the like. Inevitability had been forced on itself as soon as it would be there, in such a form as his.

He opened himself and revealed that he was no master.

'Enter at you own peril, as that is not the entrance to the grotto, great Duke.'

'Why should I trust you?'

'Well you shouldn't. But know this, that if you are wrong and choose to act upon your own instincts, you stand at risk of being flatly slain. No longer are you immortal, no longer will you be spared.

As a matter of fact, this is a result of your own damnable curse which you have inflicted upon the many worlds you chose to extend your suffering to. Look inside me.'

As he said it, so far away had been arched himself that he revealed that there was something inside of him, below the mark of his body waist. The waste of his world had chosen to dispel itself into that wonderful place. It may be that there wasn't any way back from this.

'Soon I will be overcome by it and I shall fall, filling everything with the same muck that came from your world.'

'Then why do you want me to step in it? I know what it does to flesh and bone. No longer will I survive in it.'

'Oh but you will. Do you not understand? Have you failed so much that you have wrought this deceiver of your mind?'

The foul was at play. Would he listen and obey?

'But I am a Duke. Why should I listen to your command? I say, this is a trick, a vile thing which makes me oh so vile to no end. I won't give in.

You will not deceive me. I'll make it there, I shall make it to that grotto and delve inside of it.'

'In there you shall find a bottomless place, left in ruin by some disgrace. Worry not about it, I shall make it so you are properly warned about the peril of your descent.

Make it down there and you shall find no way to return. The various things below there are by no means meant to the eyes of a passenger of time. You shall be allowed no rest and as well as you shall be tormented by the pools which will come from below.

It's inevitable. You should know this of all the people who has come into contact with them. If they cannot escape their own fate, in their vile universe, what makes you think you might be able to do it?

'They have found a way to get to you as well? It cannot be, I had been promised I would be the only one, the one who'd make it to them and be crowned as a master, holding dominions over their land.'

'But you were fooled, Duke. Only the souls, not the physical manifestation gets there, are you not aware of it either? Ignorance of so many kinds, I see in your. Worry not, I shall inform you as well.

Do not try to pass the veil into their world. You've done enough damage as there is. Join him not, for you shall both destroy and corrupt and bring nothing more than the malign to the poor souls which are in need of rest and retribution.'

'Let me be then, I shall return to whence I came from or make do for another world.'

'No, Duke, this path of yours cannot be forced. Return and leave us be. Even if it's our memory which will leave through us, an image of what was. It is all we ask of, that you become immortal again and keep what we are alive.'

No one wants to be forgotten.

Something had occurred in the mind of the Duke. It was some kind of defamation of the face in which the right had become the wrong. Was it not by his doing that this destruction came? Was he not instructed to lay the foundation of that world? In which form would he appear?

Without thinking about it, he turned and looked at the giant mummified remains and thought about what it had taken it. Some dark conjuration could be attained by him. If only the dread stood out long enough that he may be filled with the wrath of ages. Only then he would feel sane. Otherwise, he had been forced to lay in shame, and waiting. For one sign, ever since it happened.

I have not meant it. It wasn't my fault that the portals never closed. And everything which had been encompassed in the sea my living organs had created; those weren't meant to cause all of this.

But he was brought and caught and dragged inside, through portal after portal until he'd recognize that everything he had made, every gate, had brought the flood.

'You've been waiting for me, I see.'

The Duke looked around. He stared at the many seats which had been devoid of life. Bodies had been placed inside, and for now, it only appeared like they had been left there, stranded for no words. No one had been alive there, only him and the talking corpses.

‘For this, I shall hold you accountable.’

By no mean of impurity alone.

A common link presented itself near the bodies. It had been the one explosion of dark metals which appeared. It was sudden, so sudden that they revealed themselves quickly enough. They looked like star-shaped rotating sheets of spike metal which circles around a globe of glowing light yellow. It was then that he realized the trap he had been set it.

The Duke couldn’t have prepared himself for this.

He lay in awe as from the giant corpses which had spoken, came out the destructive metals. It was another type of destruction for which he hadn’t been the cause of. In all fairness and for the dread of ages, he had administered himself a dose of self doubt. It couldn’t be that they wanted to hurt him. They approached, stopped and attempted to cut him.

Yet no bleeding occurred, not a single cut having appeared on his body. It was distasteful, and moronic. A distracting effect had come. This was supposed to be the court, his court. He had recognized them, most of them had been the servants who had been under his watch and command.

Only now they started puking and spewing the sea out of their insides, with little dignity having remained. It was distasteful, seeing them be that way. No amount of knowledge seemed to be inside of him. They formed their tiny altars as they united and stood above the bodies like tombstones.

‘What did you want me to see then? That I may not even be granted a free trial?’

‘Oh but you are. Those weren’t the corpses you were talking you.’

‘So it is you after all this time I hear. I feared I may never come to hear of you again. What made you turn around and give me this chance for redemption?’

‘We have given you naught so far.’

‘Then say it, why have I been spared?’

‘You’ve been spared for no other reason than this fact. There’s an agony in turns and watching, we need to look into it, we need to serve the needs of the many worlds.

Duke, your aid is still needed for our purpose and so far you've done well enough to flood the many planes of existence in which we have guided you.'

'Why the show?'

'So we can prove to you that we mean no harm.'

Said the giant broken bodies as they reeled back into their seats, making him so uncomfortable that he couldn't help it any longer.

'It's nothing more than a trick of the mind. Our mind can alter reality, so that you may never have to leave it at all. That's our trade, as long as you work for us, you shall find a way to return to your previous existence.'

A vision had been given to him, the sight of his world being there again, with nothing breaking it apart, no organs to fill and float and flood the world. Everyone under his command, like it had been.

'Well now, it's time to choose. But there are other alternatives.'

He couldn't help but focus on his world and walk. His hands touched, his armor latched, seeing what he lacked for so long. The many servants who obeyed and allowed themselves to be taken however he had so desired. Their spines were frail and their spirits had been even easier to break. In that he rejoiced again, as to crash and kill with this giant hammer between his arms.

'How I missed this feeling.'

The Duke said and in a moment, everyone stopped and watched. Many of them feared this sudden leap of dread and started scurrying away. Others returned to their work and could only focus on trying not to get on his nerve.

'None of them can retaliate. How quaint.'

He moved and started smashing them and their frail bodies instantly. Each blow appeared to satisfy him to no end, feeling like an orgasmic satisfaction which kept going and going with each murder. The guards had come and attempted to somehow please their master and try to reduce the damage.

Neither of them drew their weapons out. Clearly, there had been a way to fight this simply by asking him somehow to put his weapon down.

'Leave me be, I shall come to do whatever I please. Do not try to top me unless you desire to suffer the same fate. I am the master here.'

'Show pity, master, if your servants will be no more, who might tend to your gardens? And those living arching pointers, who might make sure they won't grow to such extension that they'd destroy and ruin everything?'

Please, think it through.'

'No, I shall force them to breed in order to satisfy my work order. Or those who remain shall be forced into savage slavery. But make haste and bring that to them, as I am in need of an army.'

'Master?'

'Yes, I have decided it is time to. It's time to invade. It's time to.'

His vision ended, he stood knelt, bleeding now, with those sharp blades having been inserted into various parts of his body. Many voices like those he had previously heard now laughed at him. It was something much more deranged, out of the body of work which may not be stumped out.

Clearly, that was the reason for which there would be no hesitation now.

'Fine, we shall continue our work. But make this pain stop. I shall not endure the same thing which is felt by mortals. I may be a mortal now but know that I come from a realm of indestructibility.'

'No more, you are there no more for as long as we desire to keep you away from it. But it is there, rebuilt, recreated, reworked, and condemned to exist without its rightful ruler until your return. If you don't bring your task to fruition, you'll be here.'

Stuck with the bodies of each of the ones he had damned. Many more joined in the meantime and many more will come. In the distance, he even saw the mummified remains, writhing in agony as its insides were expelled.

'Beware Duke, some of us may not like your interference with our plans. Do not give us anything of the desire to breed with the desert fiends or you may find yourself at their mercy.'

'What desert fiends? What are you talking about? I am not one who's afflicted by lust, how dare you accuse me of this insolence?'

He had done everything to serve them, what interference? Who was talking? There were so many of them working together and against one another. This malignancy will strike at my heart if it keeps growing on.

A few more things were there. His pox creation, this thing he had been instructed to do. It was a curious creation he hadn't thought about in a long while. Such a cruel fate he had been set in. But they would take care of it now. It was their most prized possession.

'So, you have seen me.'

'We have not, there's no such thing as a future sight.'

‘It is only that we have seen those many legged creatures in their filthy female tribe. And they would throw their whoredom at you and stop at nothing until you will have been claimed.’

‘So what of it? I shall dominate and enslave them all. I shall tie and do with them whatever I shall please for as long as I am. Perhaps I may even drag each one of them to my kingdom and turn them into my mistresses so I may be able to use them however I please.’

‘What of it then? You are under our command, a servant which needs be reminded that he may be abused and forced to lay into madness if he decides to fight back.’

‘Do not tempt me yet. I said I will do what I’m asking for and that’s it. I shall do no further than that, do you understand?’

It was only then that he was healed. His wound cleaned of the blood and pus which had enabled him to push inside and creep into him. There were a few other things to go with the fact that a certain blow from below had encumbered his body with many bolt of skin which grew inside of him, drawing him back to the plane where he had been before.

Not that one, but the one which had been taken away from his mind, where that dreadful thing yelled at him and cared for nothing but the defilement of his sight.

‘You are to be held here for the time being until you are to be called and ordered. Look around you and make do with what you have.’

But he saw nothing around. They had not only given him nothing but he seemed to be caught in this enclosed space of magnified rock. It couldn’t be seen as being right, but neither had that thing in front of him. From its bile of a body there leaped a few movable beings which had been expanded or warped until their looks had the sight of supreme elongation. The very base of their bodies stood inside of him.

At the top of the bile there waited a giant formation of sculpted dirt-faces. Imitations, all of them, the form of which he couldn’t tell.

It was something morbid, how all those eyes and noses and mouths moved together but only once voice came out. The top of it had the same kind of warp, which extended and either stopped at the walls or had found a way to phase through it. No more could it be contained.

‘Listen, your torture can only begin now. Do not make us go with you there, or we’ll force you to beckon on your vileness once more.’

‘What would that be?’

The plane, that plane, the reminded, he was the one who forced the Duke there. It had to be it. He was chained here, not allowed to leave. In that room which he thought to be plain, he saw that heard the chains whipped. He stood on some kind of metallic floor which lay adorned with the sight of the same facial imitations. Everyone had desired to see the sight of it and the Duke hadn't realized it yet.

Who is that? What was that? Could it be another part in the many voice's plan? Was it such a degenerate thought that he couldn't help but wonder?

It was lost out there, standing in the pools coming from the flood. a simple manifestation of the imitation, not the real face. Why, it could not stand being there in its true form. Dread filled him no more, not any longer.

That crudely was met by shame.

'I am merely trying to help you now.'

'Why, what does that thing mean? Why am I being brought on dimension after dimension for no reason at all?

If you want to end me now, and then carry on with, it is in your power. But do not torment me with the boredom of waiting, I wish to return there.'

'No, you shall not be allowed freedom unless you have given up on your desire for lust.'

'What do you mean? You damned tormentor, I feel no lust, and I feel nothing at all. My desires out there are only for my own selfish reasons as to witness the many worlds I have afflicted until they die.'

'But that is not the reason why you left your prison. No, you left for the desire of a suitor, as this rage of yours had stricken down everyone in your kingdom, even those who may have fitted your desires.'

'I would lay with no petty woman and no slave. You cannot and will not force me to so. No one could, no one dared tell me, their master what I may do.'

'We haven't forced you to do a thing yet. This', you must comply with it or you shall suffer at their hands. The tribe shall exploit your weakness, they shall leave you unsatisfied, desiring of more, lust which may be unrequited and humiliated for what?

The madness is in your mind. You have been afflicted over the eons you have spent alone inside.'

He never thought about it before. It had been something rather unrelated. But what if some people are born evil? There was some time left to kill then and the Duke was in no mood for waiting. He was displeased by this lack of action.

It wasn't the lust he felt, but all that anger, frustration and the mad which afflicted his mind. Neither of the consequences could be called for him to understand. What waited for him there was only the inevitable defeat, that moment where he knew they'd betray him. They weren't trustworthy.

No, neither of them had been worthy of his allegiance, but they were strong and had means which outdid his. What if they could bring me to that plane of torture? Perhaps they plan to abandon me there, if I were to dare, only a single, touch.

The Duke outstretched his arm and tried getting through to that creature. But he was pulled back by the chains, drawn to his back, and laid to waste. He could have been obsessed by this attire of weakness but he chose not to give in. Think while you're here, that's what you need out of it. Simply think, why are they trying to do this?

Could the reason be my nature?

He wondered if they were afraid of it. There wasn't any point where he had been born, no parents of any known point in time where he would know his own origin. No, he simply existed. That was as much as he had known about himself. How could someone like him be evil if he hadn't been born?

Why was it that the essence he felt had always made him feel that way? Even there, he felt nothing but some rage and frustration as well as the desire to crush that creature into battering remains.

'Well now, I should be pleased by your attempt, but this can't work for you well.'

'Free me and I shall make you a promise. You shall be welcome in my kingdom and allowed stay.'

'A fine deal but I know the rules which resign inside your world. As long as you're there, no harm may come upon you. There'll be no such thing for as long as I can help it.'

I shall not be ended by the likes of you, not now that I have been given this gift.'

'What gift?'

'The appearance of it, why, you wouldn't understand, you're not meant to know, only to serve. Now, it is time for you to return there. A message had been laid to me and it's time for you to go ahead and serve.'

He had been cast out of his cage and into another tormented world. The land was dirty and he had come out of nowhere. They had granted him his weird, lousily cut armor, which had given him the appearance of a grant defiler of metal. His shoulders had been wide and spread to the sides.

The entire piece looked like it had been cut from every side by a few set of giant melting blades until what had been left out of it was that. The helmet had the empty mark of a y, through which a pair of glowing eyes faded ever more. It stood close now. A stranger had come into sight.

Whatever he might do to him, this was it, the weapon in sight. He had been somewhat clumsy, a creature which had been affected by a dumb appearance and the servitude of the heathen. He had prized himself with a robe covered in pieces of metal which had covered his shoulders, chest and helmeted in adorned horns which made him looked like some porcupine than some demon.

The colors were bleak but a trail of white went over him. His face looked rather lacking of humanity, or any kind of definition. Sets of teeth exchanged every time he closed and opened his mouth, now much clearer that he was chewing a piece of gum. It was evenly faired, between the two of them.

A long metal bar held a large cylinder which had it open and cut mid-way to reveal some sort of axe-like grinder which hadn't been sharp but had appeared likely to be much blunter at the edges. His giant boots stood out, having two animal skulls pointing in front, bobbing up and down with each step.

'I was told I had to wait for you.'

'Told that by whom? I haven't told anyone I was planning on coming here. This was a mere interception, nothing else.'

'But I have answered to the ritual.'

Said the stranger, while he stroked his chopped chin, his nose unruly, eyes caught in-between the separating bar.

'What is this place then?'

'Only the beginning of a siege, follow me closer to the battlefield and we shall see.'

By two steps, they had followed through the cut-through path on the lower steps. There used to be a field here, now it was a waste. So many graves could be seen from the distance, but not the traditional ones, these were freshly dug and the warriors who've done them were the mortals themselves.

'What happened here?'

'Another war ended, another one is on its way. There are a few campaigns in the North, and fewer going in the South. We called upon you because we needed as much help as we could get for this.'

The last fortification of the standing, held back by a large outstretch and a straight leap which stood in front of the great walls which surrounded them. Only four giants had been there, tired and sitting there, drained by the many machinations which kept the fortification still standing?

‘We need to prevent their deaths and repurpose their bodies; otherwise we shall not be able to do anything out of it. Know that we may bring only this to the table. Something’s terribly wrong in there and they aren’t supposed to be kept imprisoned.’

‘Why aren’t your troops advancing them? It seems easily penetrable, with the amount of forces you have there, the walls could be taken down by dawn.’

‘We have attempted numerous times to bring forth the siege but nothing seems to be working as intended. There’s always an impediment along the way.’

‘Those impediments being?’

‘Do you see those high towers? They’re filled with high-archers, not alive by any living force, but it seems like they are animated by a set of stones from inside their chambers. It sprouted some veins which pump force inside their bodies.’

‘How do you know that?’

‘I used to live there, I know every tiny crack and trick of the fortification. Everything is powered solely by them, those resting ones who are struck there in the midst of the dark. Nothing else matters for them but the end to the suffering which will bring the destruction of the entire valley.’

‘The very ground as well? Is it kept still by them?’

‘Much of their sustenance goes towers towards the jeering of the land upon which we stand. If not for them, and their life succor, the entirety of this place would fall under the weight of the fortification and their bodies.

We would be buried by the falling debris, the metal in which the fortification had been wrought in and their falling pieces. But someone managed to create a system underground which directs their life fluids to another source, that’s how they’re being drained.

We’ve seen this happening before and we’re aware that there’s no other alternative to it. We need to cut them loose and let them bleed into the very insides of the fortifications. They may not be entirely saved but with a bit of luck they may fall upon the openings and be kept alive by this symbiosis that obscured the land.

It’s the only option we have.

As for the other impediments, there are many traps which had been spread inside, as a means to prevent any kind of invasion which may be had. It was never even vehemently thought that we may have some kind of presence of our own there.

We are only trying to get away as fast as possible before they fully activate and turn the insides into a slaughter hold.'

'How many?'

'Eight hundred troops died during the initial assaults. Four thousands died while trying to place the explosive headless curling sentence on the very walls which wrought the gate.

If anything else is the matter, pay a very close attention to what's going on there.'

He pointed with a sickish toe-blunt hand towards the field. They stroke at the walls from various parts to create dents on them. It thoroughly confused the archers.

'As I say, don't look for anything out of order here. These are merely the first things to go off, the various base segments of the walls. If we break the foundation, the entire front might shake as a result of the vibration caused by the explosion.

Its wretch of an alteration in madness and alacrity could use some force.'

'I have heard enough. I shall go there alone.'

'No, you were sent here to aid in attempt to anticipate their moves. Many bodies lay past the gate and they are being fed with blood. That will keep them alive for a certain amount of time. After that there'll be no way out for them, they can't return, they won't be able to fight for an extended duration and they'll simply be absorbed into the ground.'

'Don't we desire that? I though that was the entire point of the battle.'

'Duke, you must understand one thing. Liquor such as that needs to flow, constantly. When it is kept inside a small body for a long amount of time, it gets spoiled and it no longer works as intended.

Should we truly into it any further?

It's poisoned and scum. If it spills in the ground, then it may no longer be safe to dwell on it. They would be trashed and filled with the haze and.'

'And what?'

A feeling of nervousness had entered him then. He couldn't help but feel that way, the need to express his desire to change the subject, or look at the assaults which happened there. Many had already prepared their siege engines and their many weapons of might and dexterous magnitudes. It couldn't be any less vague as to what they were doing now.

They prepared their bottom cordial sinking moving spikes which moved freely and swam through the ground, pushing forth from time to time to reveal the many mouths attached to the many-headed moles. Their bodies had been such as tailed fetuses which bore the hairless appearance which sprouted long-legs which thinned as their insides were revealed.

Such dark-skinned creatures showed the red underneath their constantly falling and dripping bowels and guts. It wasn't safe to be around them, as every now and then, they spread their insides into two halves revealing that these underground dwellings had served as a means of building up momentum. They set themselves into flight, fully extending their next and impaled them, jousting with the walls.

Explosions and sparks of guts spread themselves around, leaving marks which helped metal decay. Those spikes had been sharper than metal, which forced the dripping skin to push towards the other side. Unfairly told, the many liked evils which were bold seemed to stare at it from the distance.

'Listen to me. If they managed to strike a deal through dimensions, they may bring upon their squares, something which doesn't belong here at all. They can bring a lot of damage to the world. Do not tempt them to get forth yet, until we consecrated the land.'

'What do you have in mind then? This substance of theirs doesn't seem weak, not enough that it may fall to something like it, to the likes of some pressure and boldness such as this.'

'We shall place out reformers into the ground and strike towards some kind of absorption of the chemicals which may netter the ground.'

It was a well grounded plan so far. They had already prepared and placed the machines. The assault would begin shortly after and it looked like the arrows wouldn't work on the ground as well as they had before.

'Look at it from this angle. There will be a lot of corpses as soon as we enter during the siege.'

'Then why not force the walls to collapse entirely? It's clear that the ground would handle the heaviness and it might fight through it. Without any means of going away, there won't be anything we will be able to do about the various misgivings there are out there.'

'Wait.'

It was then that the sounds of horns were heard. They were even more likely to be stamped upon as long as it lasted. Nothing would last for too long but here they came, striking and charring through the ranks. Two armies met neck in neck on the field.

As it happened, the first dead ones had come, the siege engines started with their bleak smoke, the sough of terror which propagate the hatred into all of the men there. In their awakening they lasted not a single second before they went into an extreme haze. Not a single one of them could be handled and forced into the fight.

Everyone had been reluctant and less disciplined than they had seemed to be. Undesirably said, they looked at each other as if they were already dead.

‘Duke, it is time for you to join the field of battle, go forth and do as many damage as you can. The people will hear and know that you are one of their own, they had been made aware.’

‘We’ll see each other after this siege?’

‘If any of us survives through it, we shall.’

As he came to draw in closer to his troops, he saw the grunting soldiers as they threw their spears into large formations, blocking with their shields before changing between the many weapons which had been either thrown or abandoned on the ground. He taken an axe which had been lying there, it had the heaviness of an ox and the deranged look of a human who had been lost.

‘We need to cut through and flank them from the right side.’

He spoke and they obeyed. From where he stood, there was an open view of everything which had lain around him. This side had a good representation of each side of the walls, the two towers and the likes which spread around. It wasn’t fair and it certainly wasn’t getting any safer around there. Nothing could be done about it.

They had reinforced and repaired the damage and instead of reconciling with it, they began pouring hot oil through the planes of the walls.

‘Careful now men, don’t draw in too close or we’ll succumb to it too quickly, we still need to go on and do some damage about it.’

It wasn’t fair to look upon in but he came quickly through the dance of spear, as the gates kept opening wider and wider, until a break had come.

The first blow of the siege engine had thrown a giant block of metal which had cracked and afflicted the sanctity of the very wall, leaving not only a dent but visibly having destroyed a good chunk out of it. A piece of the gate fell as well. Undoubtedly said, there was someone there who’d be dead or devoid of any kind of illness.

On the other side, the wreck had only awakened more of those who had been dead. They were living again, drawn to life by the liquor, which had pushed through the veins and had forced a growth on their insides which would keep them alive for as long as possible.

‘Keep them down and cut their blood supplies, they need to be emptied of enough that their brains would die off.’

Aye, it had been quite easy, a beheading, a cut, someone who had been brought down. A scene emerged which had been surrounded by a circle made out of both troops. Two of the warriors held a duel which had been witnesses, kept and allowed. It was no game as they fought to the dead.

‘I will kill you and take over your mind after you’re dead. You shall feel the purity of the blood instead.’

‘Never, I won’t be poisoned by your murky red water, you will die now.’

Finally he had stepped in closer, leaving a cut across the shoulder to the hip. It something akin to the mark left by a whip on bare flesh, with the only exception that it had been pushed against the armor.

‘A mere scar, nothing more, this won’t end up your way.’

‘But you’re bleeding.’

‘Inside the ground.’

His opponent had taken two steps to the side to reveal the machines in the distance. They were strangely looking, moving charts which had various glass-like cylinder and sphere cropping and popping out of its wooden cover. Nothing else seemed to matter then. It wasn’t fair to say the least, the arrogance, the distrust and the mere sight it produced.

A smoke-like cinder came from it and when it turned, he saw the shape of the face which had covered the overall reformer. It had been vague but docile. He could’ve taken this opportunity to strike at the man while he had taken the chance to show it to him. Large tubes pulled out and buried themselves into the ground. Not even unsafe, as it was clear enough that he would be dead.

He swiped his blade and reading himself to behead but stopped. It was something which happened so sudden that this ill-blooded fiend shook and backed away a few steps.

‘Why are you hesitating now? You could’ve had me then.’

It was him who asked for it. One step forward and his head had been grabbed by his bare hand. With one simple squeeze, it simply blew in a small pop of brain, skull and a tiny splash of blood. It hadn’t managed to pierce through the gauntlet either, but that hadn’t been as important then.

‘Look, they’re dropping the iron nets, fall back, men, fall back!’

Through this sight there was at least some kind of insufficiency of odour. The smell couldn’t have come in fast enough to gather some reaction but when it did, they had all been infested and corrupted with a sense of depravity.

‘They’re going to blow the nets, take it away, take it away!’

A burst of flames already encompassed eighty ground troops, which only followed through. It was no mere metal net, but some moving depravity of iron. It couldn’t be questioned at all.

It was time for them to arrive already, in their chariots of space-stone, which burst through the atmosphere as they came. Like Swiss-cheese, in some inner sides, they pushed through the confines of the city as the assault began. The fortification would not prevail. Pieces of the drop hadn’t gone to the point of exploding.

‘They’re ripping the fabric of this planet’s sky, what are we to do?’

‘Keep spreading the formations and fight to the death!’

‘Duke, what of you?’

‘We’re marching back until the ground clears of the hot oil. What are those things above us?’

‘Reinforcements from beyond!’

It was displeasing, as the hordes started coming out of the gates, as soon as they had broken, pushed and released themselves from the barred entry in which they had been set. No longer would they be delayed at all from the preparation and misgivings. Larger bodies emerged, like Cyclops, bearing hulking eighty arms from their behinds, crushing the ground in their way, while drawing forth to keep what was left of the wall.

As more of it broke with each hit of the siege machines, they started grabbing and holding from each side.

‘Archers, prepare and aim, hold!’

They aimed towards the very base in which they had gathered around.

‘Release!’

Came a part of the attack, but as the staunch of arrows came, they felt nothing as the many arms had armored shins and pieces of rugged skin which had been grown on them. No longer would it matter what piety there was. It was crushed then, the spirit of the men and the ones belonging to the hordes. They came charring on large beasts, wolf-like leaping cruelties with spikes horns on top of the places where there were missing skulls. A pair of red eyes looked defiantly as the troops which stood their ground.

‘Soldiers, prepare the shield walls. Launch over your spears, stand your ground.’

Many of them shouted, floundering their darkly-burnt pointers at the approaching mass of degenerate fiends.

It may have been the battle itself, but the Duke appeared to long for that moment of confusion. Everything, to about every spot around him made it so it felt like they were going wrong. Not confusing, not as estranged as he had been, he got affected by confusion there. He didn’t know what to do.

On the flanks in the right wing, there was some kind of missing desire to stand. Many men died as soon as they had been blown across the chest by the leaping chargers. Their many strings of attacks had put them into early graves. Inside the open gate he also looked and saw that before the fragments of the giant bodies, there were the devices which stole their blood as well as the town through which they’d have to carry on their assault.

If one had been interest enough of it, they were also being drawn and pushed aside, their formations faded, and their many needs unmet and there, above him, the sky reeked of the strangest thing, a fifth of the scent which came from the other world, unquestionably so, as to concur what was going on there.

‘I must look upon this, stranger.’

‘Why have I been brought here again?’

‘You are still on the battlefield, Duke. But you are still here, a double made out of your armor has been left there to watch. Time goes much slower here, so there’s enough time if you wish to discuss.’

‘And what help could I possibly get from you? I can’t seem to notice this arrogance coming from you, especially from someone talking me down like I’m some sort of animal or prisoner or.’

‘Barely alive, by the looks of it, your body is growing weak. Yet they won’t allow defeat, not yet. Not until you will have cleared their fields and messes and played a part of their greater game.

It is clear that they want to acquire only the greatest of which may be taken into their world, only so they may rejuvenate one another in hope that they may live through the great catastrophe of death and defiance.

‘Listen to me, I am not their pet, nor should I be able to deal with it yet.’

‘There’s no need for us to be too pushy now. I could throw a few strings and pull, to inflict the right amount of needed pain before we could carry on.’

‘So be it then, I shall comply for now. Tell me, what may I see that others don’t? I need to know how we may get through the rim of this assault and get through the open gates.’

‘It’s a battle that’s already conceived, Duke.’

‘How so?’

‘Turn around so you may see.’

The wall opened on both sides, revealing a strong light which was almost blurry and faintly defined. As it pushed through that field of energy. He had been given a top view from one of the many chariots which had entered the world. It looked like the giants didn’t have much longer. Their deep-ochre skin wasn’t meaningful in any way.

Pieces of them fell with every passing moment. Their skin lost another layer, as it turned out that they were growing older as it was. Unwashed and unclear, they had not only starved but suffered of a loss of thirst which had forced them to shake.

‘I see that they are alive, resting against the cliffs. Their appearance broke a part of the city and caused the fall underneath.’

‘No, that tunnel had been there before. Look closer, Duke, it is going on for long-long ways of pushing ahead. There’s no other way of looking into it.’

Now where would they be going with all that blood? The tubes which had been attached came from a strapped mechanism against their chest, which looked like the metal box, something clinging to a chain and a ball, which dragged below, extending and proceeding into both sides.

Another world appeared to be affected by the flood. Sharing his responsibility with this new flora of vile colors and explosions couldn’t possibly be the result of the Duke. The liquid made an altar for what it had perceived to be their creator.

For that reason alone he had been recognized in many worlds as the figure responsible for the destruction which had been brought to them. It was no longer vile to the eye.

‘Is that the one who had appeared in my visions? I saw him so many times trying to govern over my vile ends. Look at how my many dome heads had been flooded and misguided into breaking themselves against the ground.

They gave birth to their own receding traps which now eat our men. Who shall defend us in this time of war?’

‘Can’t you see that there will be no war? We’ll be drowned and killed in no time. Accept it, there’s no return from this strange pact we have made.

It was us who summoned the flood.’

Said one of the many impaled servants of the take, as it was by their hands that the veil between their worlds had been taken and destroyed. An end to the decimation had to come. Their lanes crumbled and the servants of the take had come again.

‘For us to reconcile with this, we should make sure we can end our grasp and end our own desire to push forward. The space in which our deflected fright emerges can only destroy our madness now. Look, at what they did to our mind.

This trade wasn’t fair, they took most of our brain mass and replaced it with a liquid which granted us the rest of it.

Now we own memories which aren’t our, memories of worlds in which the flood entered but they never even go in depth. They’re shallow and disgusting, parasitical even, to the point of never returning and never coming back to haunt us.’

It could only be clearer that there was a break in their society, without even the clearest amount of ingenuity involved. A body of servants had taken over it and what they did in their vileness was this act o mad, a supreme act which would remove any kind of decency which may have remained.

‘Draw your heads open and allow your minds to join the flood. See what it sees, live through it so you may see the majesty it projects upon all of you.

We shall all become reef in their worlds, encased like metal, preserved for some kind of life which may be kept in its true valor.’

The sight of the default incongruous defeat arrived. As their heads opened, their world had been taken by the tide. It was by this unnerving gaze that they forced themselves to open to defeat.

A short span of unified visions came together. They looked upon so many worlds which had attempted to save themselves from this array which threatened everything, in the name of the voices which found themselves there.

‘Listen, listen and obey. Clear this mess, we have seen enough of it and it is deemed that it’s not worth it any longer. The levels have raised themselves past the point where we may enact our magnificence.’

‘An intervention has to be called. Look, and seek refuge somewhere else. As the flood regulates its levels we shall solidify it and allow you to walk and plant your civilizations and species as long as you will declare us your leader, creators, deformers, anything which may put you beneath us.’

Said the voices and of course the alternative couldn’t have been anything but that. It was obvious that it couldn’t be right, not any longer, they wouldn’t have any other alternative other than paying respect to the many wishes which propagated themselves through the confines of space.

Echoes such as those were malignant and lost. So far as it had lasted, it had been a conquerors' woe as the planets had their living pay tribute and give in to it.

It was a strange combination of solidified organic material which propelled itself as to fill in the gaps between the buildings and surrounding areas. And it was by no means fully solidified as one could penetrate the layers with enough willpower. After that, he could draw in as much as he might, before taking in the sickness which occurred.

They didn't die, nor were they preserved.

'Our entry will be made clear, it's safe to swim through it now, come, join me brothers!'

'Are you certain of it? This mistake could cost us dearly, so don't make us make a choice we may come to regret. We have already paid tribute to them, whoever they are, please don't make it worse.'

'Have you given in the thought that we may be able to do something of it? There's only one chance that we may push ourselves in.

I won't give you another chance to join me. It's either this or you shall strive for rebuilding a world which may never bask in the elegance that it once had.'

'No, I shall fight and correct it, no matter what it takes, I shall take to myself to restore this mad elegance that has once ruled over our world.'

The Elegant had appeared. It was then that the silence of the voices came as they fancied this dreadful creature which had come forth.

In its appearance, it had been dressed in many clothes which were fancy, colored in bright hues, caped but plain, booted with sharp blade-like ends, rotten in patterns of flowers, faces and many graces which could only be felt by the divine. Trimmed with laces, tiny crimson chains and buttons which weren't plain but colored in blue, iridescent gloved in leather from some smothered outsider, tall hatted, at the top bathed and rotten into some sharp angle which turned in the back.

This pale creature which had painted its face hadn't been disturbed by the lack of mirth. In the rude awakening of sudden elegance, he spat on the ground, an action which had been un and uncalled for, an act which lack in the very character he fancied himself to have had.

'Keep it to yourself then, I'll see to it that I'm pleasing myself down there, where nothing may come to harm me.'

'Will you be able to return in that case?'

I wager you won't be able to overcome whatever lays down there, you'll be eaten by its substances and get yourself absorbed before getting a chance to do anything about it.'

'Neither will you, oh one who's Elegant. At least I choose to fade off into inexistence like the other servants, for I will also have the chance to survive into a much better world. What chance have you here?

Other than the creation of something which will always be impure for your and everyone else. It's obvious that this place will be devoid of any of the good nature there used to be.

The only refuge we're left with is the solace of death in the same pool which had taken over our world.'

'But what if you join us and help us build a better one? What of the future generations? Don't they deserve to live in a place which isn't haunted by savagery?

Look around you, perhaps there's a way to get rid of it, of this murk-water which had occupied our lives. Anything to return to how things used to be, I'd do anything, even if it meant working with the likes of you.'

'Cold footed, are we now? It doesn't matter, but you'll understand it one day, there's no way to return to how things used to be. Unless time is somehow obscured and there's a way.

I choose death or rebirth, damnation or life in another plane of existence, anything which may overcome the symptoms of this world.'

And with that, he leaped into the opening and lost himself below, towards the depths of a never-ending desire to meet that satisfaction which had been longed for. Several others followed him down there, giving in to the desire to be caught on by their leader.

'Great one, good one, wise one, oh I would follow you through the utmost torture if it meant that I would get to live in your presence.'

'My life will join that of my brothers as well. Do not weep for me and show as little interest as it is needed. I took this choice by my own.'

'Wait, not you!'

The Elegant stopped the thin pretender. He was almost wooden, dark and coated in a layer of varnish. This one came out of nowhere and appeared to be there with only the desire to join them in their ritualistic suicide.

He looked like a wrapped bird-person who had his insides drawing in constantly, to the self-conflicting arrogance which lasted until then.

'What do you want from me?'

‘I thought that you may want to survive for some reason. Don’t you want to see something go right for once? Wouldn’t you like to know if there’s a chance that life may be better?’

‘Never better, I have killed eight already, look.’

He opened his giant beak for him to look inside. There were tiny limbs and acidified remains of blood inside his blad. The tiny hole appeared to be rotating as he emptied himself inside the hole.’

‘That is irrelevant. By the looks of them, they were never worthy of living anyway. Say, join me then, in our search for beauty, purity, elegance, hope for something right.’

‘Fine, will I be allowed to eat and murder?’

‘As much as you wish, as long as I find some dissatisfaction to the way they look.’

A deal had been struck then and the sky turned into a bluish-green, which turned to yellow and glowed a darkly tinted exchange of shades. It could be rather incompatible with what was going on there, but that felt right for the time being.

Partners, this, this.

‘Proto-being.’

‘That’s what you are? Proto-being, I suppose I could do with the name if you’re satisfied by it, but I couldn’t deal with such a name. There’s something about it which doesn’t bode well.’

Oh, this wasn’t intended. The Proto-being took off into the distance and entered one of the settlements. It a gathering of a family made out of self-made, or was it self-constructed dwellers. They were obscured by their garbs, but their screams ran high and got lost into the midst of the night.

It was fast, the way in which he acted appeared to be almost instilled into his body and senses, going into a mechanical fashion through which he pecked and entered not like some bird but some nail which opened a way for itself then entered through each one, leaving them with a hole inside their bodies. It went through the motion three more times before returning.

He hadn’t a desire or any need to eat, but this was even more important to their seething interests. Both of them could make a good and satisfying deal out of this arrangement.

‘Proto, come here.’

‘What is it?’

‘Those dwellers you killed for no reason, I don’t think you consulted me about taking their lives. Not that I complain about it, their garbs were filthy and uncared for and the place under which they looked for shade.

As long as they repulse me, do you understand? Don’t go for anyone you want to simply put down, or we won’t be able to make it through without curming the ranks.’

Speaking of which, it did seem a lot emptier. But that had been the night. For now they rested and slept, twenty feet away from one another. Both stared in each other’s direction, giving a general impression of stress and unquiet.

If only he who had caused this knew of the total amount of damage he had created, he’d be aware of the pay. The essence of elegance was constantly being expressed in him. As soon as he had come into contact with an actual remnant of civilization, it looked like Elegant flourished and basked in their presence as well as in their admiration.

He had this trick, or hidden function, or act of magic in which his colorful arms appeared to multiply, despite all coming from the same end. And each of them had been tinted differently as they each wore a different pattern and a different veil of silk. He shot a glance and he revealed that out there in the open he was as cruel, if not more so than the Proto-being which lay still in his command.

‘Bow down to me now and look no further for a successor. I am the only one who will, who will. Wait, oh, that’s right, they don’t see me, and they don’t see me at all.’

With it, he pulled a silver scalpel like some courtesan and came to simply walk through their masses, performing a cut here and there, terrorizing them with the most mundane way of killing and of slaying. A deafening core of desire kept him going on while he attempted to cut. Time after time they all looked around unable to see who was doing that.

And the Proto-being observed yet withdrew himself from the desire to kill. One night before, he had been instructed clearly.

‘Do not commit any acts of murder unless I clearly specify it, do you understand? Let’s make right out of this and it will be fine. Well now, isn’t this a wide twist on your beak, I see?

That is the only thing which will separate us from them, it will be our desire to stray together as well as our partnership.’

He nodded and went on, still cutting, realizing the reason why he wasn’t seen.

‘It’s this elegance I display. With it, I shall be unseen by those who are petty and disgusting, repulsively dressed as well.’

But why was it that other had seen him until then? How had he been able to do it? Unless it was only his desire to speak to them directly which had enabled them to see him, which begged for a test.

‘Bleakly-clothed stager, would you happen to see me now?’

‘What? Where did you come from? Stay away now, you’re the one, you must be the one making us problems.’

Elegant hadn’t realized that for the time he had been unseen, there had also been a kind of wild silence which couldn’t even compare to anything prior to this, this insolence which was displayed. And then, when it returned, he was also seen by everyone, which made it much worse.

The angst in their eyes stung him like petty daggers, he stepped on ways and looked for some kind of escape which may make him feel out of place.

‘I want silence again. I cannot deal with them.’

And simply that way, he disappeared from there, while not a single step had been taken. IT was hard to tell whether or not this was something he may have had in the past, but he came to be there.

‘I adore this, finally a way to separate myself from those lowly monotone poorly dressed socks.’

Well, since he had the opportunity, he fell below their knees and started cutting through their ankles so he could obtain something here and there. It was mightily unfashionable how they wore them, but the addition of red and in some cases blue added quite the change.

‘Where are you? Where are you? Where are you?’

Proto called, with no subtlety at all.

‘I’m bleeding, quick, out of the area, clear it, there must some rattler here, quick, out, out, out.’

An older gentlemen which loomed forward with a perturian coat appeared to lavish himself a silvery quip as well, which had been used around the ground to drive the rattler out from hiding. The man cursory ground separators only bobbed up and down during come occasion. It wasn’t likely that they would draw out or they would push away without electricity, yet another blow being given to them, if only there had been a wish for some change to happen, it would fade soon enough.

The Duke wouldn’t have anything else to add, as they were brining down their animals.

‘Strike now, as I do.’

He came out of nowhere in the range of the leapers and cut through one of their bodies, releasing one of theirs to fall as they'd throw themselves forward while trying not to fall. The riders died immediately as they had been launched and abandoned, smashed and defeated. It ran through each other's bodies immediately, especially since there couldn't be any mitigation to the pain.

Within his reach, came another one who had been turned and pushed down as soon as it happened. No longer would he pain himself with everything in sight. Soldiers died, but many others came from behind. It was a battle which refused to give in.

'Aim for their giants, make way and send a message to the siege workers, aim for the giant below, that way their walls should finally fall.'

'Malevolent one!'

Even then, he was careful not to be caught by his own arrogance in the field. Otherwise he would be strapped and snapped, release of his life. From behind them two units marched, bringing with them a huge movable ballista. It was short-ranged and it needed too many people to work, but he got the message well, defend it at all costs.

From above them, the intruders dropped their bolts of space-cremation inside the tunnels, replicating a smaller version of dying star before it disappeared into the adjacent areas. Those were safe guarded, too much so that they couldn't have themselves stopped any longer. It was a disaster, thinking they could end it so quick. But the arrows and the weapons they used hadn't even reached that far into the air.

His experience alone made him no field tactician, but a mere creep which stalked and sent troops to their deaths. And it came quick, as soon as they realised that they were in the wrong side of the field of battle.

Another thing happened, which turned the day with the help of an inversion of the portal, which had promptly disappeared, into the coming of the night. Unnaturally aware of it, they had ceased their battles and the main bulk of the army pulled back.

'Let them go, if we cannot help it, this will be the better alternative to it.'

But it wasn't meant to be there. He had encountered someone so long ago. His first step after getting off one of the portals resulted into him entering the rubble. The place looked like the entirety of his kingdom if it had crashed against the ground instead of falling inside the murky water. Not only had it been out of place but he felt miserable there.

That accumulation of pieces, made out of sharp stone, which chained itself into a whole body made out of iron, approached him. It wasn't something he was supposed to know, but in-between the trap, upon opening the portal which he held powered and constructed with the help of the other slaves, he had entered many worlds before finally getting through forward.

By no mistake, they were not copies of the main one, on the opposite, his every travel and every invasion past that point happened all at once, making it seem that for a fraction of a second, the Duke had traveled through many worlds at such a span that his experiences had been discounted.

Who was in charge of them? And of everything which went one? Why, it was that creature, which would be name the Khrnyiak. That ugly faces shadow pompous creature which had trapped him a few times during his travels. It was his task to watch over him and make sure he would not remember everything too quickly. As there was another Duke, out there.

A miscalculation, perhaps, who wasn't any Duke but an exact split which named itself the Courtesan had been given life out of the many abandoned memories in that moment when he traveled through the portal.

'Why must I live through this agony while he's out there, in a fight?'

He was in one of the spaces, the laps beneath the realities. They looked like spider holes which propagated upon one another only to serve as a buffer zone for the energies which shot either from the tunnels between the worlds or from that vastly peculiar danger which had been shown to live there. The beings there were static and weren't allowed to move unless someone passed through the dimensions.

It was a place of living statues that were offered nothing else other than the time to think before a surge of energy came.

'This time had helped me analyze you and everything you've said. Know that my memories are mine and by the time I'll get to you.'

He would be driven mad by the fact that there was a living force down there which made him feel unaware of the fact that it mocked him. Each of the trapped tainted leapers who had fallen out of the worlds had been mocked in that manner.

It was only a partial paralysis which allowed organs to function and their mouths to spread. A quick jolt came there and as it had he was attacked. Drawing closer had been those three headed, one in the back, hyena-bodied agents of the stark envision. By their claws and weirdly profane facial expressions, they had stolen the faces of some repulsive multi-eyes forgers while pinning them through with some kind of accuracy of their seething spatters.

Behind them there were feathers and conjoined tails which only joined one another when they got too close.

'I'll stab you and eat your livers before you get to pass the mark.'

‘He’s mine, I saw him first, for the way of the crystals.’

Another one of them spoke. Elected in the challenge, the Courtesan showed his true face. His armor hadn’t been as wide and as mighty as that of his counterpart, as it looked to be made out of leather and cloth, with silken feelers which shot as soon as they had made contact with their fingers.

They both outpaced him only to look at themselves stumbling on their feet, unable to procreate any longer. With a sicker of the eye, they fell into pieces which immediately began trying to draw some sustenance from the insects which lay around. It wouldn’t be enough, not a single moment longer would last for them as that happened.

‘I will take my leave and descent and know that I shall not be trapped here forever.’

‘Nor would I spend any more time playing with these impostors who name themselves as something they are not.

Oh, my sweet proto-being, know that I have tried my best to keep you in my grace so you may have a future for yourself. But this can’t be done, not any longer, we’ll have to separate if neither of them makes an effort to dress nicer any longer.’

‘Why would I leave? Partners, you say partners, I say yes, that’s what it happened. Murder who you want not who I want and partners go on.’

‘And here’s where the problem in.’

Elegant wrapped himself around him, with little shame and no more insolence than it was needed. This was his fight, his was, his interest, his desire to come and show off what he had.

‘Listen, listen, listen, my dear Proto-being, ever since I discovered I’ve got the means to do something with these new abilities I have discovered I have, cutting through people and their ankles and being able to get away from it, I don’t see anything which may require me to spent my time with you any longer. Don’t take this personal, but you are slowly becoming dead weight.

It’s a need I have, to stay as hidden as possible now and observe. They’re in need of someone who may watch over them and who may give them a push onward. I want to do it but I cannot abide to this, not as long as you’re out there trailing my movement with your eyes.

Sooner or later they’ll simply find out and that might be a far beyond my current interests, do you understand?’

In nodded with some resentment in its eyes, but I knew better than to trust this cretin.

It was a strange time to be alive then, especially since he couldn't focus on anything in particular. Only one way remained for him to carry on with this wrong-doing. He only thought of how easily it would come to him to smash his head.

one quick blow from both sides of his head and he would be gone. There wasn't any need for a ification either, since he would leap and dance, never to be seen again. At a glance, he almost set himself into position, ready to shove a single end into the back of his head when he had been interrupted.

'What is this?'

As the ocean's floor began to be varnished, he looked upon the sight of pure beauty. Undulated by disease, it had been covered by a layer of conium, which hadn't only spread as it had grown and extended both sides. This added a lot of weight to the planet and threatened the complete obliteration of the inner-doings around the qualms of the planet's innards.

In there, the shaped people who had given up their bodies had now been left with some misery as they got encompassed by the conium and its mercury-disease.

But on top of it, the world flourished. Dyes had been spread, as it was one of the chief elements which made conium what it had been. Otherwise, they stepped aside and started circulating on it.

'It appears it's safe to walk on. What do you say; shall we go ahead and walk on it?'

Both of them were weary of talking and approaching their partnership now. As much of a dumb creature as it had been, there wasn't any other option. He had to be dealt with now.

'Proto, I think I've been sent here for a reason. You may not understand it now, but I simply know this to be true. Why would I have achieved so many things in such a short span of time?

So many people died because of me now, though I have never seen myself as a murderer. Merely, someone who gave them what they deserved. Do not look at me with your lifeless eyes now, it should be over soon enough.

There's no need for you to weep, my good friend. It is not the pain of going now, but that of letting go. In the short time we've been together I must admit that it has never passed my mind that I may be able to trust you.

For that reason alone, is why I've taken your life, good and graceful doll. You do not bleed, you do not stall for a second breathe any longer.'

It was a nice end that he felt. The two of them could now stand as witnesses over the fact that their partnership was over.

By then, a child passed over. He was dressed in a coat of red, titillated with broads of white and green, who weren't seen by anyone else, either by the face or by his strange appearance. He was one of the few who had been born out of the outsiders. It was plain to see on his face, that rounded, sharp hooked jaw, which stood below the rim of his nose, unable to breathe at all. There was a set of air pliers which either dug into his throat, or underneath his clothes towards his lungs.

A sad view arose from under his gaze. He saw only the doll-like bird that stood near me. I couldn't help it but feel as out of the place as both of them looked like, even though I wasn't there.

'Mister, are you feeling well?'

It was in his eyes, those sharp, deeply cornered, drawing back, emerald stones that he saw himself there. Unconsciously, he stepped away, unable to look back as they marched on the fields.

'Duke, prepare the troops for a return, we need to hang some traitors now.'

'What happened?'

'It's of little importance, they are deserters which need to be punished. How is the battle going on so far?'

'We've lost a lot of men but as you can see, their hold isn't going to stand much longer. Was this your idea from the beginning? Blowing down the structural integrity of the entire fortification?'

'There wasn't any alternative unfortunately. We were far over our heads, we had no way of capturing and holding in, especially after it had been turned into a trap.'

'Any chance that we may turn the siege machines onto it? We could aim and throw and thaw their insides before a chance to retaliate might arise.'

'It's beyond a question, they need to be separated from the tubes first and that won't be an easy task. Because if we do break their bodies, they'll only pull the arteries, drawing the blood pumps through their tunnels and that's exactly what they want of us.'

'Certainly you can't be thinking that we'll push inside that death trap now that I'm aware of the consequences of going in.'

'Unfortunately, there's no other option. We either get them or we'll lose the land. And there are other tribes out there who'd make a good catch out of those hiding spots below. Do not tempt us to go forth with a trial against you now. You were sent here to help us, not to spread our likes to stray.'

'I won't betray you but I won't stand to see so many of your people dead.'

The mere peril of him developing some empathy carved a single blow to his side. He felt something for the troops, despite not knowing them well enough to establish any kind of connection between them. It made him weak, he knew it.

‘Wait, I need to know one thing. After this battle is over, will we meet again?’

‘You have asked me that before. You know that I cannot make such a promise for either of us.’

‘Then take your words and shove em’ away, go and hang your traitors and do not approach me any longer while I’m working.’

He then sat on a lump of stone, sharpening his axe, upturned.

It was a strange process, the hanging that was. They didn’t use ropes but had made a use out of some body intruders, small and nasty, sharpening away with their long scalpel-like legs. Upon entry, they would dig through the bodies of their victims and bury themselves in their guts, blocking and blood from leaving, blocking their arteries and any food from proceeding through it.

‘Good, I see that they are still as useful as they have always been, a means to seal each entry and every exit which may be inside of you.’

He smiled before the next part came. Of course they would be hanged that way.

Meanwhile, the Duke paid more attention at their concoctions of metal and of lust. No peculiar change would last. The Duke had begun being bored with staying on his stump. His intuition had told him that there was something wrong with the headed machines but he couldn’t see them from the distance. A mist had been spread across the land below. It came out of the fortification, which made it much worse, especially since they knew that a good deal of their troops had been left to fend for themselves.’

What would remain out of the deserters’ bodies after they were done executing them?

‘I need to see something, bring me to one of the machines down there.’

‘But it is dangerous to head down there. What if we’ll get assaulted?’

‘You’ll live through it.’

‘What if I get lost there?’

The mist had turned and settled down, dissipating as it was replaced to hard block of earth fumes. Had they been thicker than the mists and their strolls would’ve been immediately stopped, but they had the right proportions for them to go ahead and simply walk through it. Another important subservience came as soon as they were able to walk. In that, there had been some entry for him to stop and look around.

Patches of the desecration emerged and floated in the air. Between them, the pupils started to emerge as well as the remains of the insides of the fallen combatants which were barely there.

‘What’s the meaning of this?’

‘It’s the machine doing its work. First the steam gets removed, then the rest of the unwanted materials which will fall and then the ground will be purified.’

He said it with some confidence, which made him all the more interested into acquiring information on the field. Whether or not he liked it, he needed to know why the ground was talking now.

‘Be careful and don’t tread on my fine steps, or you’ll find yourself being drawn down there amongst the many bodies which accumulated around the long distance extraction strolls.’

‘How do you know about them? Are you an actual being or one of the voices which came forth to torment me longer? I cannot hope to deal with what I’ve been asked to with so many interruptions.’

‘I am a mere contractor for the eight layers of deeper gloom below me, not an enemy, not a friend, something looking out for it. Look around you, Duke, I’m in need of your assistance. This had been a well calculated move, look around you, do you see any remains?’

The soldier who had accompanied the Duke showed signs of uncertainty and distrust. He had to get out, but one step and another fell to no touch below itself. His neck had been thoroughly caught off guard, being held by a force unlike any other.

‘You’re not leaving now, not until I’ll hear what he has to say.’

‘Well now, know that after the battle on the field, they would be taken below and sacrificed to make sure that they might stand as another layer of protection against the coming of the wretches.’

‘Which wretched are you talking about?’

‘That would be enough, Duke.’

The Commander appeared, startling him, who in turned came to immediately snap the neck of the creature in half. It blew out of proportions and left not a single scar, no simple manner in which he fell either, to be caught by almost raised putts of scurried earth pieces which dragged what remained of him below.

‘Why have you come here?’

‘What’s in it for you? You’ve sent everyone to die for nothing and you’re still intending to send them all to die inside that city. What for?’

‘I’m being given a great deal of years off my servitude from lord Thrylkrik. He would’ve petrified my body inside his standing wove of planar insects-prodigies.’

‘Then this will be fair for both of us.’

As he said it, he merely stepped closer to him and ripped his arms off, slowly returning to his original position. The creature only took it without trying to show off the pain. The arms had been properly discarded.

‘Even without my arms, I can still take you on. Do not forget that you’re a mortal. It is because of you that everything in existence is threatened.

You are an unworthy destroyer.’

He fumbled but stood there, as the two soles of brim-feet descended below two thirds of the ground. Those had been eaten as well, as he was allowed to stand on his knees.

‘I may be disabled but I won’t be stopped now. This isn’t how I’m supposed to die, you’re mortal, don’t forget.’

With a sudden convoluted maneuver through which his body twisted in a spiral beginning below the knees, he launched himself over, popping a few springs o those infectious spoils from the field.

‘You fed him.’

A few bloody boils popped off from the spots which had been revealed beneath the spot from which he leapt. This took his out of good standing as he fell and lost hold of the weapon he had strewn behind his back. Before he could reach it, this infused creature was on top of him, spreading his bloody aroma in a stupefying manner.

He began jolting and dancing and scratching at the armor not like the commander but the primal fluid which had taken over his mid. A piece of his head blew up and revealed that the blood had becoming likely a much harder substance which made its wary way through the air like a pair of tongues. They wanted to enter through the gaps but they failed.

One blow was enough to break his spine, which prompted the involuntary reaction that made him recklessly call for help.

‘Betrayal, I have been betrayed. Look, see, follow me, I cannot be here at all. Force me to return allowed to seek some way out.’

Both sides had been alarmed, charging through as this half-knelt, probably dead commander stood with him.

‘I shall seek you on the other side, if we are to meet, I’ll force you into misery.’

He finished it, with a sudden spew, which crushed him. Afterwards he had done the only thing he could do, which was, charging through them and trying to make it to the extraction point.

Elegant was done, Elegant felt none too better about where he ran. There was one sight of the world he had now looked upon. Slaves had been spread as distantly as possible in an attempt to make up for the loss of place.

There was something he wasn’t content with, an appearance of the atmospheric disgrace which turned the vision of the world into that one which rested above them. This would one day be wrought in his name, the kind of purple disgrace only his likes could possibly understand. It was a hard point, there in the distance. Sprouting from somewhere beneath the ground, a pyramid appeared to be propelling itself against the metal cover of the ground. It couldn’t move by any means, but the way in which it stood reigned as a bad sign of the things to come.

‘I see now that even this amount of elegance cannot be maintained. Some day, everything we worked on will be destroyed by the threat beneath us.

Is there no hope then?’

‘Before you plunge yourself into the depths of that hole, know that it was no all in vain. What you’ve succeeded into doing now may be the most admirable act of courage in the name of pure desire one may have achieved by himself.

You’ve survived for so long in this misery, so why end it?’

‘Who said that? Show yourself and don’t mock me any longer.’

Strange, I thought myself invisible, but this was a bad sign, it was one which threatened to make all my fears emerge again. What if I were to be seen? Who would do it now?

From where would he strike?

‘Pointless, it’s all pointless. You’ll never find me that way, know that I am not there, in a spot of your liking or choosing. If you want to find you, look father.’

‘In the distance then?’

‘Beyond the reach of physicality, know that you’re not invisible, you’re merely phasing through the dimension as a sign of this world being broken apart.’

‘I’ve seen the change.’

‘An illusion, smoke and tricks of mirrors which only serve as a way to take away from the fact that the world is never going to return to its grandness, know that for the same reason I’m trapped as well in here.

You ought to join me anytime sooner now.’

‘But if I don’t?’

‘That’s not up to you I suppose and when it happens, worry not about the consequences and try forcing yourself to live through for as long as you can.

Everything is so much slower here, which leaves enough time to think everything through.’

‘I beg of thee, do not force me to fall into another trap. I’ve come to realize that the vandals had been right, there’s nothing worth fighting for.

And If I cannot have beauty which lasts, then I’ll have ugliness which is eternal.’

‘Bleak as the moment when I set my eyes on you, we’ll see eye to eye momentarily.’

Sensing the danger approach, he gave in the wait and leaped into a hole of his making. Before he could see the slither of the rim of the blown piece of metal he had produced with the help of his wild tricks he was there.

In front of him lay the stranger.

Now, he understood, that armor, the likes of which he had never seen crafted anywhere else in his kingdom. But this place was wrong, it was a trap, a trap of snow of nets, but somehow he knew that it wasn’t either of them. He was given the treatment of vertigo as the walls expanded and retracted onto him with each leap of the bite.

Thought this in-between space of the worlds acted in a different manner when it came to him. He had pieces of his shoulder and the entirety of his body partially taken and placed in the possession of the space.

Above him lay a single piece of his head which wasn’t right. He stumbled but he could walk.

‘Are you a statue?’

‘No, how is it that you may be able to walk?’

‘I do not know. Perhaps it’s the fact that he took my feet away, or the pieces of my finger. I feel light, can you see me?’

‘No any longer, you’re out of area of vision. Wait, do not go too far, know that these tunnels in the distance are inhabited by strange predators which may stop at nothing to hunt and tear you apart to pieces as soon as the surge comes in.’

‘And what would that be?’

‘The power which imbues me with the ability to move, I cannot explain it yet but if you stay with me, we may be able to witness it together.’

‘I see. Quick, oh, please, see, is there something wrong with me now? Look on top of my head, do you see the missing piece?’

Has this journey here taken the most important part of the top?’

It looked like it. But the surroundings of his brain looked as if they had been incased, themselves, around by a few deviated metal blades, blunt as not to cut, but strangely interestingly in terms of their design.

They were red and had leaves which had been attached to his skull. And that thing wasn’t shaped in the normal ways, it hadn’t been grown for once, but looked as if it had been cut out of a bigger piece or made to look that way.

But enough of that, the more important part of this new opportunity arose.

‘I was you to help me move. Push or pull me as far as we could go, because I may be the only one who could help us get away from here.’

Not as fast as he had realized.

‘Disgusting, I’m repulsive, I’m a deformed toy that’s what I am. What will they say about me once they see that I’m no longer elegant?’

‘Settle down, fool of a Jack, there’s still hope, look above you.’

Those parts of him which had been pulled out and separated moved in the same direction, at the same time, while disappearing as well.

‘Will they be gone forever if I go too far?’

‘Perhaps it would be better to ignore it for the time being and make an attempt my plan. I shall reward you with a place in my palace if you aid me.’

‘Would that be a promise I could look up to?’

‘Anything within my power shall be granted as long as it’s in my ability to set myself free.’

‘Then I shall attempt it, even with my lack of strength, let us see.’

A mere touch was enough to grant him a great reign over a few steps.

‘I am free once again, no longer will I be bound by the obscure.’

‘Wait for me, you cannot abandon me yet, the deal.’

He had stopped after a few steps, in that awkward questioning position.

how much did he know? What would he think about me betraying that partner? How had it happened for him to know where I was?

Before their encounter, it was fairer to know that an apparition who looked exactly like him had appeared in front of the Courtesan. It looked like it had prepared itself to leap over one of the highest cliffs there’d be.

And if chances were right, he had been shown this image for a reason.

Now it’s my chance to make a difference, the Duke thought. In the midst of the war, he came to hide underneath the shadow of a many-armed giant. His senses were lighter and it was already hard to swallow how much of the destruction had been spread there.

If it were to happen, he’d know it. His mind had been accosted by them. He could’ve been crushed by the giants at any point, unless they spared the pleasantries they showed, he knew that he would find a way to cut through the first pointless repair that was present there. In the midst of the battle, a few of his obtuse arms managed to repair the wall. That alone had been a sign of the first few impacts which fully landed. It wasn’t even that much of a necessity for another strike, as a piece of the wall fell apart from his mere touch.

‘I see it now, I need to make haste.’

While the two armies were busy, he made into the broken sight of ruin. There weren’t many paths to take and only a few favorable sights to pick from. A few arrows dropped and their compounds came into the light. A few chemicals had been stored inside a tiny vial which connected to the tip of the arrow. On top of one of the towers from which they rested, they kept their drawing needles at ready, so they could fill more of them in order to spray as far away as they could.

And their metal had been as unnatural as everything else, as their sharp pints bore eyes and fingers attached, wriggling from their own. But those parts hadn’t belonged to the archers but from the lost troops. Vindicated as they had been, it became obvious that this forgery had been inflicted from the donations coming from the underground.

‘Ready to succumb to the earth yet?’

The mouth emerged again, reassuringly there, as a means to remind him that he was being watched over. Always and continuously, without a way to escape.

‘Make it to that house over there before my body takes in their poison, it’s your only chance.’

‘I’ll trust you then, as evil to evil, do no dare throw yourself away.’

‘Worry not, I won’t give into you yet. I wish only to spread the seed of misery as far as I can. Will you please join me after you’re done chasing whatever you’re after?’

And what would that be now?

You’ve been betrayed, Duke, and you’ve got no goal.’

‘I can still track where the device ends, if this wasn’t the case, then let them be drained, but I won’t stay here any longer and wait for the traps to begin.’

‘Wait, before you go, bear no ill thought for me, I can still be of some use to you. As long as you are here, know that there’s the possibility that you may never escape, not until they decided it is time.’

‘I do not care any more.’

‘But Duke, you should care, it’s because of you that my insides are being filled. They are spreading even now and sooner or later there won’t be any chance to escape.’

‘Enough, I heard enough, look, a barrage is coming.’

They threw onslaughts of arrows on both sides, making sure the fields would be riddled with as many corpses as there could be. Sooner than later they would eventually succumb to the will of the earth and they would find no peace afterwards.

But he chose to strike through the door and seek a place to hide in. Without a chance to redeem himself from his actions, he fought his inner will to turn around and face them. It was miserable inside, and it was about to look much worse as the roof caved in and the second floor came after. The arrows came in at a much faster rate, lighted by the vileness which protruded through itself.

A strange occurrence popped into existence by the time he broke through the wall and entered in the second house. It was a portal of white wax through which this hooligan shaman-looking figure, the oppressor, as he presented himself came. His eyes were bleary, rounded like two sharp rounded visors. No eyes but a light lay behind them.

This wasn't a wax suit, but his body, by now what had been of him, and of his previous life had gone. Now he stepped a new detractor, one who promised himself a way out.

'Where am I?'

'Does it matter now? Look around you, this place is being assaulted as we speak.'

A metal spinal-stroke erupted from the ground, bearing blades which spanned across the entirety of the house, far extending them past everything that mattered. It had been a sinful touch afterwards, to look closely upon its activation. The blades turned into their horizontal fully stretched intended position and began spinning with an incense of force.

Both the Duke and the wax fiend dropped below the rims of the blades in time to avoid being beheaded.

'Is this your doing? Because if it is, know that I cannot be killed. I'm always going to be able to remold my body into form, while you hide in your unclean armor.'

'Would I be lying down if this were mine? Why would I put myself in danger?'

The wax had little to its mind to even be capable of holding up against a candle. But the rotation stopped. Strangely, so had the arrows. But he could see the marks where the house had been cut, and the upper half was simply floating.

Both him and the wax looked around after someone. He walked, slowly stepped, around the rim of the second wall, where the opposite hole had been placed. This omen had only served as a way to stare around. It wasn't safe to be there any longer.

'Come on, we'll have to crawl out way out.'

'And If I don't?'

'The entire valley will eventually collapse, if the traps don't activate first, which I seriously doubt. And in case I think that one outside is set to make sure there won't be anyone living past the line.'

If he remembered correctly, he saw its clear cut there, separating the piece of the land on which the giants convulsed.

Both tried pricking in their fingers, spreading as many drops of wax and grim-juice on the ground as they could. Great minds thought alike, they saw how awfully it reacted to its desire to hurt. Its knuckles joined the rim, pulling a dangling fourth of the outside stable. Likely, he was pushing and tearing everything apart as a display of his strength. He merely touched something, which gave the impression of turncoats being retracted. His demented annoyance came from another place.

Those drops annoyed him because of their noise rather than affront to his sensibilities. He felt like ripping more apart, but the delays to his reaction made him get baffled by the fact and the scorn. It wore off as soon as they were out. No more in where the blades started again, as they spread and began spreading on the rain of tiny bits of metal from the focal braces around the top of the first coming unit of the wall.

They've done it. They had brought one of the tinier multihanded holders down and had managed to do enough structural damage to take it down. Now that it was falling, there wasn't any hope to look away from the fight. It was taken in.

'I haven't decided yet if you're worthy of my presence here.'

'How about you disappear then? I have no use of you if you're going to keep that arrogant mouth for as long as you have it. Let me be and we'll part ways.'

'But what if I give in and let myself be drawn out there? I hear the sound of blades, I hear the drums of war. This isn't any different from the place I drew myself out off.'

And his would be an interesting idea, of what wasn't right any longer.

'I fear for myself, I fear that I have taken the life of a father for my own escape which has resulted into a fruitful attempt to extend my life. Now I'll be gone.'

'That does not sound like any of my concerns alone. I am here for a reason and so far, you served me naught.'

A quick blunder, as he took a hard area of the wall and threw it at him, only to see this manifestation of wax hide away as quickly as it could in order to avoid any other disorder or any kind of agony there may fall upon it. For some moments it could only stay in the form of a pool before coming back together.

'Slow, far too slow, you've given me plenty of time.'

At which the wax jerked, a quick reverse reaction to the torch he had lit the spark of his fingers. He had almost engulfed it in the fire before he had been made aware of the falling tower. Its base was going down.

The Duke would have no confirmation of its death, but it was dangerous now, being out there in the open. He was met by the sight of the slaughter, as expected, as tow armies marched, or had been pushed inside.

A giant hand reached for him and offered itself, as weakly as it stood, to get him as far away from the conflict as it could. He saw that between them, only an implant remained, with a fatter tube drooling inside the ground, through the tunnel, leading out. His race had died, it appeared. There was something in those big and rounded black eyes. Nothing.

He was allowed to lie as close to that point near their chests where he could grab and pull, pushing through until nothing would be left to draw out of them. Four pins of metal which had been large enough to be smug-clamps rested inside of him.

One last look above, to see that pus hole inside the sky, which had degenerated everything from sight, brought only the clearness of the vile. It wasn't safe to dwell there any longer. The ships had retreated and it looked like they had their own problem as it was. Soon the rip would be close and he would set free to go wherever he wanted to.

'I shall free you now from the pain. No longer will you suffer being alive in this state.'

At which he only pulled a single metal joint of metal, which had been deep, it had ripped a piece of its chest as well as a few cavities from inside. Bone and body mass prevailed in the midst of pushing through.

But down there, where it had been obvious that those peculiar hiding destroyers left their marks, he knew there was no escape. No one would survive. The walls and the towers started falling and as the deranged approached, so had that box from inside the giant's chest drew out, being pulled beneath the earth and inside the tunnel.

The Duke held as hard as he could, taking a deep breathe not long after as he had been met by the sight of water. It was cold but for the first time in a long afterthought he had been reminded what it felt like having living senses. Behind him, the way in had been covered by the giant, who had been thoroughly ripped to shred as soon as he came into contact with the trap. It's been the way it had been intended, destroyed in its entirety as the fortification lay undefended.

In the midst of the ruin, traps stopped, the ruins fell across the battlefield, breaking the battle into a piece made out of few extractions. Sooner or later one had to come. Solider lay there, still alive.

'The battle isn't over, men, let us return to it before they run us to our graves!'

A voice rattled and gave itself away. As soon as that came to his knowledge and to his mind, he had been made aware that it was something he didn't stomach. The urge to draw the blade back in. It had been a while since he was there, in his own kingdom where no one dared confront him. He could take them now, despite being in a position which allowed even less time to wonder, he could see them reach the point in time.

The city was still there, where it ought to be. Surrounded, even by a multitude of spires which made his passing so much easier, even as he dared began to drift away, he tried searching for the most deserving, for those who would earn his anger. I will earn my rightful place in my realm, he thought. And he would not remove the organs from the premise either, with everything which happened, he would still risk doing it all again. What else would there be for him to long for?

If not another chance to fully encompass his kingdom into a protecting mass of bodies which would dome the top of the grimmer reaches. Unknown to them, of this plan, they had already started amassing the bodies which had come as a result of the sin of his kingdom's fall. Otherwise, they would rise, and he feared. He feared them. Even there, looking down upon them as they were some kind of myth, he understood. A relatively weird array of suitors waited below his kingdom.

They had been given a short lifespan, as they were crafted out of the reef below. It was them who started his mad endeavor, as they charmed the maiden so they may throw themselves to them and fall. A bitter laugh continued as they continued mocking him in the most undistinguished manner. No longer would this disaster continue under his watch. He had to carry on with his plan and crush them all again, reliving the moment when a part of him had been completely lost.

It was lost even there, and he was pulled by a force unlike any he had even been forced to feel. The appeal of it was quaint, banteringly obvious, that he saw the water become the murk. Its acidic feel could only last for so long until he had been pulled out of the metal pile only to land up on a field filled with ancient spines. Plants had once grown inside of the plates, which moved and tore them apart, leaving nothing but some distant shades on long green ropes which threw themselves forth.

As much as it was to be called alive, they wrought only the least distinguishable scream, their peers suddenly reappearing out of their morbid cots. In them, they stood guard, looking shady and untrustworthy, but more importantly, they appeared to be deadly for the touch. Partially made plant, part of them were the remains of soldiers, which the substance which kept them together was a conglomeration of large wasp-hybrids, which receded between being hybridized into living soul or living plant. To which they chased me, all of them, trying to go after the giant metal holding cell which was attached to the liquor-infused tubes.

'We're not alone here.'

The Duke spoke with the fiend. It wasn't like it to keep him waiting, but alas, it turned. Since he had done something as he had been asked for, a prize, perhaps, for the consolidation of their alliance.

'Chains will not be needed any longer, now that you are a part of the family.'

'I swear I almost got used to them. What made you change your mind? I seem to recall that your attitude towards me.'

'It was only but a misdirection, so you would not think of the damage you've done.'

Which was exactly what he had been asked for here.

'Turn around and see for yourself, what do you think of it?'

It wasn't likely that they would attempt any kind of paranoia inducing method, but he had looked upon a standing kingdom of a vile planet, which held its hurricanes from spreading with the held of their rotating, spinning orbs. They acted in unison, but remained static. It was a mere case of large systematical tubing which connected all of them together, leading to their cities, held in the air by the many legs they bore.

'Can you see the hurricanes and what became of them? It used to be flushing with verdure, now it had capitulated to the invading elements you've helped produce.'

'But I do not remember there never being a pool underneath my organs, especially one which had to be clean. It's always been that way. And the fall of my kingdom was inevitable.'

'Mere excuses, look, at how the tubes start carrying that side of your world into theirs. Soon their water supplies will be poisoned and contaminated. They will all die because of it.'

'And I should be concerned with it? If it is not my fault, why should I be kept responsible for it? Why am I to care for a few deaths here and there?

I am far above there, I am grander, and I have the strength to crush those beneath me and to avoid.'

Being followed? Was that it? Because those words never left his mouth but they were after him. Those entrappers, which had been annoyed by him being there, he could see them now, having outpaced the destruction before beginning the hunt. Most of them appeared to be dangerous and relatively filled with strength. If one was strong enough to stop the slicer in its track, then he would dread to face so many of them.

'Not so confident after all.'

'Do not intrude my thoughts, creature, for you shall find things in it which aren't even worth of the pressure.'

'Then let me see what's going to happen here. We'll force each other into a view, I'll call one, you'll do you.'

'For what purpose would that be? Am I not called in the service of the voices yet?'

'Why, they're mightily silent now, they've been that way for a while. It's worth it to know that we'll have to wait for them to return.'

There was one quick break in which he waited to be punished. That much had been established then. They would not come back for now, not even for the likes of what ought to be done about the Duke.

'Duke, oh Duke, we need you to return and do an unspoken of act, to get it out of the way. Do not worry, for, as long as your armor is there, you may be sent back at any time regardless of what it takes you to be alive.'

He looked at the Duke, wonderingly if he were to decide what was to be done about him. If he were to be an outcast, with as little as a woe, he could cherish living in there for as long as he would last, admonished by the fact that they would try grasping and clasping for his body as soon as he could turn to live. Culled out of his realm, before he was sent into the commentary of his own creation. Up there he didn't see them in the front but unevenly from angles one could not even dare to know of any better. He had to make a choice, whether he would take this chance to get away.

If he chose to he could do it. There was no force strong enough and filled with enough will that may dare stand against him. This was his choice, and as the escaladation turned into the creation of the slain-stone, he began staring as the faces of the drowned. Some were distantly recognizable, even before he had known them, he was plain set up on never ending up again there, in the distant abyss below. Below, where he looked and saw the creature standing on the same climbing spiral, to which grasped all the fighters, bodies, giants, even those he had never seen or had never showed up to him. A cruel descent only showed him what was ahead, and it was as little as hearing the stones creek, which made him think of the desire to destroy.

'I got you, little pest, I shall end you.'

Much of his joy had been caught by some kind of defiance which only looked likely to be gone once they reached him. But he had grabbed ahead of some poor soul which almost escaped, only to throw him back into the pile. As the temptation grew further in, he heard the wail and couldn't see but what lay inside of thee. Of the demiurge which manifested inside of them, little could be seen. After all, the stones had not been as hard as they could be but looked as if they only kept the advent of the wicked sea inside of it.

Farther away from him, he saw, what belonged to him, if any at all, the distant ruins of what used to be his vile desire. IT was unattainable, unreachable, benign, a promise which had been broken by voices which would not laugh, wouldn't speak, to which only silence came as a conclusion to their vile preaching.

'Adore us, adore us, return. We must meet you again, when defiance will be lost. You know you will return to us, oh Duke, almighty, know that you shall be defiled by your need for conquest, pray that you might.'

'Do what I have asked of you, if not, I shall breed of you some cancerous cellars in which you may appease your body, throwing it to disease.'

'Leave us be, oh why won't you be? We're waiting for you to come, oh, lord and sire, where have you gone?'

A treacherous pile of miscreants followed him, to which he leaped, finally in reach of stone tablet to which the bodies strung. Their court had been destroyed and in its place, the last thing which remained was the storage of the words, the cruel swords of agony which had penetrated him skin and drew in from inside his body some kind of withered memory, of what if felt like to have thinned the living population, an innocence which had been lost.

As cruelly touched as he had now looked, a few first steps only revealed a disease of the mind, which turned the bodies back to life. In their dance, many of them only grasped for the nearest of their betters. It bone and stone, as they found themselves at home, all of them had been engraves. It was here that he found himself marked, only to wonder.

‘Who’s the one responsible for that primordial soup? It is because of him, not I that I found myself here, watching all your slowly die.’

‘But Duke, you have forsaken us all, for it way, that became their instrument of glory.’

The great masked giant spoke. He gave in as well, to the very point where he cruelly prolonged his own cruelty, appalled by the choices they had all taken there.

‘Why have they thrown their spears, the weapons, whatever else they collected?’

It was not the court, he reminded himself, only the cruel imagery of it which remained. The deceased were no longer in the same state as they had been prior to their meeting. More so, this state had been supremely caught in an agonizingly weird grasp which only highlighted the fact that they were no longer alive. A cult of evil around them came.

‘The one to blame is here, I fear he may come to punish us some more.’

‘Climb on my hand Duke and do no bother with them, carry on until you will have gotten to the pile there.’

With his free hand, he pointed at the skin, to which a hole, in which the most pure, the most obscure of aristocracy dined with one another, flipped to wait, upside down, a gait. This gate was still open and it had been from that source that the bodies of the wicked and the poor fell, while those above them served only the finest shares of red wide, floating upside down. But amongst them, he had seen an image which hadn’t belonged to him, one thing above the others. And he would see it.

Before any contact could be established again, the Elegant looked at the Courtesan with a vile repulsion which only pushed forward his distrust. It was a must for him, to have been known that way. Two vile creatures at each other’s throat, unable to carry themselves past the sea of whurst, to which, entangled, they would solve this debacle.

At each other’s throats, they looked past, the surge at last, only brought to them the leap. The speed could only be set by them, as they were chased, instead of trying to draw any further away, it could not be conceived, that they’d be deceived from the likes which they presented. Neither of them could pay enough heed to the wretch they perceived their likes.

‘Will you betray me again?’

‘I do not know if there’s going to be something left out of you to betray if I were to. Look at what’s left of you now, it’s approaching your ankles.’

‘But I can still stand, look, my limbs are only invisible, I can feel them.’

‘They’re not there, see?’

The Courtesan pushed his nimble fingers through the sole of his invisible disgraced illusions. But it couldn’t be explained why he floated to begin with. That had been indistinguishable from the lack, the spread, the missing and the dead. Yet it would be impossible as well to question what was going there. As a rule of thumb they’d only run and when time stopped again, they would talk again, or he’d be left to fend for himself. A wretched turned, he saw at last. As they crushed one another beneath their sharp paws, it couldn’t be decided what was to be brought back of him. Only the outside curtain of skin, the first beast had unwrapped its fur and bodily curl into the cavern. With its sudden emergence, the others had been frightened and defiled in the worst sense possible. In their wicked ways, now that they had served their strange days, they got on their two feet and twisted themselves as a testimony of their defeat. Not a single one could suffer from the infernal crush of their internal organs, which started signing the song of blood.

‘We’re coming for you, we’re coming for you, oh Courtesan, your blood sinew.’

It was had been pleasant, knowing that he was so desired by them, not so much as he would want to get away. But there were great plants, there were changes. One additional surge came again, but not through the entire plane, but through the walls, changing the insides of the Elegant, wrapping them about in the most deranged manners, not whimsical, not degenerate, unlike any of the filth they saw, it couldn’t be thought. No matter what he was like before, he stared into the wrap and into the foliage of words and played with them in an utmost disgusting manner.

‘Do you really have to do this now?’

With the botched end of a knife, from wherever he had pulled it from, he came to shove a piece of it inside his knee, below it and through three more spots.

‘I’m not going to feel pain any longer, oh I see it now. No bleeding and no pain, and I’m about to become invisible again.’

‘What are you even talking about you ingrate?’

Ingratiated by this disease of non-existence, he appeared to have been gone again. But it wasn’t invisibility, he could see the entire arm of the Courtesan phasing through him again. It felt unnervingly right, as if he was in another layer of reality which waited for him to come. Ghastly, dead, he could see into what they were getting into. The grand return to the ways of the malign, they wouldn’t happen to care for what was going in.

But at the end of the space, the inner tirade between the worlds, in which the pockets folded as nothing but their own mass was being added over and over into the dead end which followed. There was no wall but only the upper body of him, the ones being who ruled, over the inner protecting layer of the gauntlet that connected with the tunnel system which had emerged from the likes of the Duke. From above them, the poison, that liquid started dripping, only momentarily as a sign.

Before the wolfish walker could come and completely swallow the entirety of the room, he had been stopped, everyone had, as they would be addressed by the ruler, the queen, the fat thickened whim of many luscious plumps which grew on top of one another. An opening formed on its own. First the bodies of the previous walkers, the stranglers and the diseased were thrown on the floor against them. From this weird pea-like holder came one weak creature, which barely held itself on all four, crawling only with the help of the cordial extensions in the back. As long as they were, only a projection could be felt, like that of some gracious feelers which joined one another in a plaster.

Some of the inner paths in which he strung his inner most obscenities couldn't be seen, but it was clear that most of the brain mass lay inside it. A mouth reemerged, as soon as it was lost again.

'The one responsible for this, it is you, it is not?'

'I am the Courtesan, graceful thing, I cannot be mastered by anyone. Look at me, do I seem to be the one who started it all?

Or is it him, who'd suffer no one and would not step in any other place other than his kingdom, or the other...'

'Silence, imitation, I won't hear any more excuses, neither of you is here to bargain, nor I would only make the pleasing difference that I would know it would string your bodies into a servitude of mine. Make as you will of it but do not bother me with your pathetic attempts to get away.

Not when my lair is being filled with the likes of the flood.'

It clearly disturbed it, not for what had been in there, but was lay below. She showed us what she had acquired, throwing nothing forth until it was safe to lay low again.

'These are my eggs, I have planted them for many generations.'

Though it could see well enough that its chances of submission were low enough to begin with. This lair was coming apart, her plans would be decidedly found to be unworthy of the etiquette. No more retreat. This wasn't about them, or their escape, but the Duke. Who had only done his best to return to the crest of the aristocracy, climbing on their bodies until, he had reached one of them and held the nobleman, the member of the upper class. But in his suit he only hid a few moths.

‘I bought them all. All of them, can’t you see I’m drowning in refinery?’

‘And yet you’re all beneath me, a master made by my own hand. Unlike you scum, I’ve always been, will be called for, never forgotten by the doomed kind.’

The window blindly followed and he could see the agonizingly defender pushing forth, nothing more but a pair of the misguided youths, he lost himself as soon as they came through him. Like blades of steel, darkly shattering through him as he looked upon himself falling, alteration after alteration of him being left behind. Each of them seemed much older, yet the same, now, as he found himself met by those who followed him to the wretches of the damage he had made, he found himself unable to feel, yet he reeled back into the moving ambient trailer which engraggled the chest device.

And he was a Duke no longer but an Earl, someone who couldn’t look away unnerved, over the fact that he couldn’t face his action any longer.

‘Are you a stranger now, one who found himself beneath the rims of the unaware? I seem to recall we were to expect one like oue. Tall and daft, plated and unable to correlate the wicked blows of a defiler, many to my intuition be, I shall have a piece of you for now.’

There was no intuition here, this had only been the mark of no priority, little dexterity left where to bite. And this thing, to which the only defining feature was a long, over-the-hill dragged neck which curved and ended with a dead end of hair which grew everywhere, wore the suit of the liar. Many words had been strapped on it, which appeared to bear some few centimeters ahead, made out of ivory dark, a heart which lurked inside of his pocket beat to the producing heat.

From where the young Earl stood, he saw something close to the ruins of a barely framed apartment, which only had one wall resting on the adjacent one, two doors locked, and the giant barrel which stretched in the front for kilometers ahead. They would go towards the horizon in a never ending spree from which not even a single one like they could be seen from miles, despite the presence of open spaces he could look upon in the distance.

With each parlor, a light would follow, likened to the there being no tomorrow unless they performed well each task they had been given yet.

‘I need to eat, sir, so if you don’t mind it, confirm yourself as the one we’re looking for.’

‘And if I don’t?’

‘Then we won’t have any other alternative but to throw you over. You wouldn’t like that now, would you? I don’t suppose you will. Look around you, there’s at least a heap here and one there which should make you long for a better place to rest.’

‘I confirm them, I am the man you’re looking for.’

‘But how can that be? You look too young and there’s something really pointy about you, I cannot tell why but...’

‘It’s the helmet, I’ve been given this as a present and the rest.’

The rest of him which may have been abandoned during the fall, he couldn’t really think of it that way, but he his intuition told him all of them died then. In the pile, defiled, the likes of which only drew themselves to him. Only the kin who would be sucking marrow would find it drawn to him. For some reason or another, he couldn’t tell what happened since.

Taken aback, he pushed on, wondering how the process went.

‘Great question, new-comer, make sure you stamp your hand.’

He came to look at the hand-recognizing tool, which drooled with the flat image, lined with fluorescent green lies, which only brought ahead the variously collapsing vile growths which deepened in, filled with the limphic obstructions which bore themselves father away from there. They would be uselessly trying to form some clouds, to bring about the shout of ages, the many stanced fighters which had been picked up as well.

‘We’ve been going into circles.’

One of the two workers said. Before the Earl could fully place the entire palm of his hand, he turned at them. At an interval of a few minutes they could hear the way above, how it gave in to the various ringed points where the heaviness coming from above started giving in. Well within itself, the pipe system, through which they ran had been ancient, but affected by its instability dragged by recent wars, the floods and various extremities of the afflicted weather. He saw what came out of them, with each drop that avoided him.

‘What was that?’

As the Earl looked mightily surprised, they got closer, in time to point at the ceiling. More than a few bodies fell. Though they weren’t in the same sport, they had fallen through another pipe below the one he had been pulled through. A few more of them established some kind of pseudo-hierarchy which sometimes changed. Every now and again they would change each other and push through until they would apply to one another some cruel force of static and the blunt forced entries which made them repeat the same roads again.

And the corpses which fell had been dragged inside the barrel, unexplainable at least, lost to the feast. ‘The process is quaint, if you don’t mind risking a toe or twice for every marks the matter. I’d gladly fashion you something to garble down during the wait.’

‘Waiting for what now? I thought I was to be shown around.’

‘In good time, good time to come, now pay attention.’

As soon as he was verified and they had entered undefined by any of the cornered tools, he had been presented with eight centrifugal creeps, which were held admit a metallic kind of cage, that held them at bay. Their whole beings had been manipulated in a way which prevented any pain from being felt, at that their heads had been covered with rubes which prevented their senses from ever developing. In short of their failures to produce the fuel mechanism which combined the blood of the giants with the entire primer needed to suffice for the rebirth of that liar, deceitful troglodyte known as Eugorggheon.

Heedlessly aware that his body had been misbehaving, trying to cut his way through another dimension at the sake for leaving behind everything else, he found himself unaware of banter, trying harder to pass by. The fact that his body freely swam in that diseased muck only brought him to the mind to inspect these screeps.

‘What have you done to them?’

‘Not us, but the depositories are full of them. They’re being stacked there and every once and again they’re given some kind of means to feed. It doesn’t usually last long and many of them are bound to bite around.’

‘A sickening image, I swear, I was there once, unable to get rid of my conflicting gaze, I jointed them once again and waited.’

The servant revealed his back and in close to the track of woes, he revealed everything he lost on his was to chrome quiet. His sole reason for which he survived the encounter had been the very fact that he had been taken aback by how many of them perverted their young. He began talking about it.

‘I’ve been a part of them for so long and I haven’t even realized it yet, do not take my will to harm as a bad thing. My intention was merely to survive, nothing more. Whatever I did there in order to obtain a place in the paradise which had been promised to me can’t be questioned any longer.

They asked too much of me in return.’

‘How have you drought-heads survived for so long? I cannot see any alternative at that, only the least of your will make it through.

It’s becoming ever so obvious that neither of you is kept here under freedom.’

‘We’re slaves but we live up to it, why can’t you meet our gaze?’

He looked and saw but drew back at that. What interested him were those empty one, worse than servants, kept there like the stock from which to draw the blood at that. Much to their defiance, had been the appliance of the ways of torture which deeply helped them do as much as it was pleasing to. To outperform one another in cruelty and in the wall they had plastered the walls.

In this section of the barrel where everyone had been placed there were a few sutures which kept them awake. The Earl saw an unsatisfactory mouth which grinned or attempted to draw some pieces of it from the lost nerves. Like a pair of teeth and a piece of the tongue which rolled together forming a ball. In them alone, there had been that kind of weird home for the infestation mechanism which began fading in. Folded like some unscrupulous capacity, they began splitting themselves until one of the specimens' mouths was filled with all of them.

Unable to dispatch themselves from the woe, they started spitting them out until their gaping mouths would be free again.

'You've taken their dignity and limbs, beneath them there's the lack of shame which had been pulled away. All of them seem sterile, is there no line you wouldn't cross? I'm not even talking to either of you simpletons, but of your faction. '

'Our faction, for which you work as well, may I remind you mercenary that you're as much a part of it and as guilty as we are as?'

But they didn't know what he had done. As they bent over and started picking up those extra pieces of slippery excess, they began munching them away. The Earl refused the offer, taking up this account to look around the likes which penetrated the tikes inside the ceiling, many of those cracks inside, where no one may even hold, to be bold about it a piece of it, that one mark of the escapee. So many of them had went worth and found themselves unable to continue their journey towards escape.

'Will this barrel ever stop from going forth? Is there even a destination for us to arrive to?'

'I cannot say for certain.'

Yet, if memory served well, as he could look at it again, he saw one of his betters approaching him at last. In his wild manifestation of whiffs and shallow drifts, he pushed one simple hand between his nose and his high cheek-home. It had to be noted that he himself bore a leathery skin which only brought his peculiar pigmentation into the play. Emotions couldn't convey what he was pointing to. But what he saw then, as a beneficiary symbol of the raw comet of the fifth cripple soon arose. His hand had only two large fingers which moaned.

Two giant nails looked like blades which only scoured the likes of the comet as it came.

'We fight these words of it, to avoid allowing its destruction. That's where life originated here from and only it may serve us so we may avoid the complete eradication of our history and what made us whole until this point and that of which will come.'

‘How may I feed it then?’

But another one of Agamemnon's visions faded. He took it on himself to look another way in.

Chapter 3

Lost chamber

There was a dark room hidden underneath the subway station at St. Augustine road. Its walls had been encompassed by small plates of darkly colored auburn. They were shaking every single time one of the trains was passing through the tunnels.

I didn't see him at times, but he was tall and he wore a mask which hid all of his features. To the addition of the room stood another auburn-like light which dangled from one corner to the other. I couldn't help but stare at what was going on there, in the silence of the night, when the lights went out before going to sleep.

Every time he opened the door, I shuddered. He wore that weird mask he carried with him. It was tall, huge as trunk, made out of a metal holder or some weird topping pillar he found. And a few human-like metal heads stood tied to it as well as a few monitors. I had seen those things, they were. They were strangely uncovered and benign. It had to be tried a few more times at least.

But I attempted to approach, getting nearer, or at least as close as I could. Without much in mind, I had been made aware that he had a different body build each time he presented himself there. It wasn't the same man who had come before.

Different messages came on the screen. A weird disemboweled head, programmed by the computer appeared and came into being. a couple of thoughts came into mind.

'What do you want with me?'

Without an answer, there came the food, something on the plate which resembled stew. Behind him I only saw what appeared to be a kind of conspiratorial image of an old subway tunnel resembling, most likely the one they were underneath. Now I got it. This must've been some kind of break-chamber for the workers.

Now it had become a cell. He left without closing the door. As if I were to risk it, I only stood and waited for something to happen. Would he return? There was no way of knowing. Would I try making a run for it? The stew hadn't been hot anyway, I thought. I actually thought, for a moment that I could make it through, but he was out there, waiting for me. Each step had been a torment of its own.

A big arm came out of nowhere and slammed me against the plate, breaking it with my back. If that's what had to be expected so be it. Without a doubt, I had been made so much more aware of my surroundings and what was there.

Another one of those days, in which I had to get up and lick my wounds. Too hungry to care that the place was so dirty, I came to lick it off the ground. There wasn't anyone to see me cry, no one so see me try to puke the small grain I had almost choked with. But I would resist.

That had been only one of them, the people who showed up. First movement happened. It wasn't a normal relaxation cabin. I was in a small train, I should've picked it up when it started moving. One step outside made me weary the next day. It looked safe, as the door opened, there was no one on the other side, only this strange sensation.

They didn't expect me to have the guts to get out.

'Hey, is someone there?'

'I'm here.'

An innocent voice announced itself as well as it made it be heard. There'd be consequences which would be known if he followed. But that voice wanted to make him so he could at least be aware of it. Constantly shaking, the tunnel started pushing its falling additions away. Someone had to be there. He thought that if he had walked for long enough and had enough faith in what was out there.

Here it was. Exactly what he most likely expected, his strange hidden desire that there'd be no one else in there revealed itself. Deep inside his mind, there was the presence of a self-defeating attitude which could only push itself past his own desire of freedom. The two stands, two of them, no, he counted sixteen of them there.

Only one had been active. This one had other parts tied, made out of disabled machines and the same old screen who spoke.

'You found me.'

'Yes, I have.'

He was wearing rags. The expression on his face, sagging.

'Do you know of some way out?'

'There's no way out. I searched for it while I was being carried by that man you saw before.'

'So you are the same one who came inside my room.'

'I am.'

'But you look different than you did before.'

'Same as you.'

There wasn't any way for me to take a look at myself, but he had no intention of lying, at least for what I had been aware. Clearly, he wanted to shake me off my boots a little.

'How? How come I look different than I did before?'

'You look beaten. Worse, much worse, your eyes are purple and your lip had been split. We saw it happen but we couldn't stop it.'

'And I'm to guess that they're the ones responsible.'

'Look behind.'

I was knocked and got to feel on my on skin how I'd be beaten again, in front of my eyes. He was reckless in the way through which each of his hits landed against my body and my ribs. Never too prodding and never aware he even cared about what happened to me.

They, not him, they carried me, dragging me back from where I left.

'Why are you doing this?'

A set of arms let go off one of my legs. He turned and started kicking me in the guts until I spoke no longer. I saw his face then, through my bleeding tear ducts.

Big, wide and formed as if in some broken pattern of heather's valve. It looked like it had been encased and pushed inside his face, rubbing and gently stretching it to the very point of no return. He felt wicked and obscure. It wasn't clear as why that had been that way.

Suddenly this man stood here and showed a hand into his face, ripping a good part of his skull, pulling off what appeared to be the shell which stood over the machinery which made him living. Out of it came some dark oil which shot in waiting. He threw that face and picked on from the bag he had on him, replacing his normal face with an expressionless one.

His suit had been mundane, one strip of fading grey, discolored as it came.

He saw him in the morning, as he stepped out again. Underneath him there lay the plate of food and they had been generous this time around. He was some roasted beef in there, but the weird machine stood there. It waited for him to take the stairs. This passage had been different in structure. A pair of stairs stood immediately on his left, prolonged by the dead end.

Quickly, put, he'd make it through if he had been fast enough.

There wasn't anyone in sight by the end of the long stair case, but he had made it into the city. Behind him he heard the steps and immediately closed it. Inch by inch, he made it through without being aware of what was going to happen there.

It was filled. Most of the people were busy, too busy to pay any attention to the man who came out of the abandoned subway station. But he heard it then. From the above, past the mist of the sky, there was the wall. From above it, there came the sound of the train going away. It only appeared like this had been another prison for him to have exchanged. Now, there'd be no escape he realized.

But what had escaped his glance had been that one moment in which he paid enough attention through them to see the connectors which passed through their heads. In appearance they resembled long shafts of metal which penetrated between the midsts of the face. Sometimes they would go in clusters of eight, connecting eight people who were drawn together.

Though they stood out, the unaffiliated ones, those bodies he had come to recognize were there.

‘I need you to follow me if you want to escape.’

He turned and saw those moving pillars which now held mechanical legs, some arms, some of the connecting shafts as well as that one monitor with a tridimensional model of an old man’s head. Being so close to him made him inspect the details on his face. Flat shades, sharp polygons reigned, but their numbers were ranked in barely a few.

It was a deep and secret desire he hadn’t spoken of that he would number in millions, billions of them, being close to realistic looking shades. But enough of that.

He waved and he followed.

‘What’s your name?’

‘I’m Dour.’

‘Why are you helping me Dour? Are you programmed to do so or are you remotely controlled by someone? Who am I talking to?’

‘You’re talking to Dour. Now shut up and follow.’

It was a pointless expectation that the weeds would hide him, over the fence now and into the platform of redistribution near the old automobile factory. What stood out were some red tinted overall shade-covers which had been placed in the front. A few men finally noticed him while moving some of the delivery-drones around.

One drone activated there.

‘Intruders in the perimeter, activate freezing motion.’

Out of its box leaped some oblong one footed drone, which kept its balance with the help of four magnetic joints on top which extended as well as they arched in four different directions. This field made it so they would stand and direct itself near the grasp of its long submachine gun which emerged from its chest.

A pair of long elastic guts connected to the other rifle which popped off from there as well as some guts which shot and spread over the ground revealing the entity which lived in. Two joints were still attached to the pile and the oblong metal case which had the appearance of a beaten hive, with all the empty larvae spots.

They turned from red and pink into a freezing yolk of blue as it spared no moment spreading the blue vapors it produced. From there, a few warning shots came. They were directed towards him but before he could look away, the two men had arrived and with them, that machine at last.

Despite them wearing simple masks, he looked at the sky and saw the distance change in shade, from a gray to a distant dark blue which spanned in hues. From the growth of a yellow growth, there came from there, right in his line of vision a sharp pin which threatened to impale his head as well. But that had only been the illusion of a sight he couldn't control.

Whatever came next was the Dour woke him up and called.

'Let's retreat, fast, inside that place.'

They broke through the glass only to look behind and see how those pig-filled, big fatted-big piller men had mountains of shrapnel rounds shot through them, cartridges laying on the ground after the insemination had begun. It was getting cold and the temperature had dropped below living levels. But they had been unaffected. Despite bleeding the unnatural expected amount, they lived and kept the chase on.

And the only one affected by the freezing thing had been the employees who were supposed to carry. It was clear that the dark machine had taken to steal and pull off another face. Both of them had been shoved inside, vaguely fitted together.

'Down the slop, we need to get through that hole.'

By the counter, two feet ahead stood one perfectly squared hole dug through the side of the floor. It's almost as if he had been waited. That felt like a trap. He could only dread to think himself being brought back inside the chamber if he fell down there. But then again, the same thing would happen if they got a hold of him.

Another day in the same spot, but to be more clear about it, this has been going for eight weeks at that. And it hadn't happened in the chamber, no, he had a desire for it to have been that way. At least he could try something different in there. But he kept walking in that crowd with a tube shoved through his back. Nothing but a sweet and peculiar refuge had been lain in his mind. No longer would he care nor spare himself of waiting.

No one around him interacted for too long, not since they were busy with working all the time.

One man had separated himself from the crowd. He took something from inside his belly and then threw it on the ground. A burst of dark insects made a hole appear on the ground, on which a pair of stairs formed themselves like some kind of dark stones. The man had been encompassed by this insect-like disease which looked shared the mid-way appearance of a bomb falling from above but being struck in-between the blast and the smoke which came after.

It looked both dangerous and as if it had burst through his own body, destroying it in the process. He went down and shoved himself through, escaping in that place, wherever it had been. This happened so fast that he had almost missed it. Through some way he wished he had the chance to see it go.

More importantly, he wanted to go down there, but he couldn't. He tried but failed, and there wasn't any way to get back down there. Living here hadn't been so wrong. There were stores and houses and places but it didn't get to him. They knew walking constantly without stopping or tiring. Such an experience hadn't been pleasing at all, but disturbingly unstoppable.

Every now and then, he feared that if he may do something to stand out of the crowd, those men would appear. He tried a few times but nothing and when nothing happened, he resumed.

'I wish they'd get me. But what if they do? What if they're not pleased that they got shot?'

He considered trying to find those drones again, at least that way he could finally get away from this life.

Danger, in awe, stronger than that, it looked like he's been seen, noticed by someone inside the crowd, who had been paying much more attention than he, should've been. Often than not, he had been rather impatient over it. No head turned around, all of them were looking down.

'Have you seen that one before?'

'No, who?'

'Could you look to your right for a moment?'

'Fine, are you talking about that one?'

He had his face baring taken in now. That had been what they all feared that might happen eventually. A piece of him, that piercing tool had shoved itself past a point where endurance failed. Instead of pushing forward, it drew inward. Many tubes which entered him forced his evolution to take place. Peculiarly, he was content with it.

The many looking weird sides of his insides showed and cleared the blasphemy of the air. He had been spared that agony as his skin turned pale and his entire body had been fed oxygen, growing and expanding, then pumping down. For the rest of his remaining time, he had been stricken down by the same sharp filaments which entered him.

It was cruel, looking at it, but everyone was too busy to care.

By now, he reached the street he wanted to be near. He entered the new factory and began walking in place. As strange as it seemed, it activated his mind. A space of unrest, this tiny spot in which he worked reminded him of his home. Not that of his childhood but the chamber he had lost.

‘Break at four, until then, you’re all set to work until you’re done.’

They were working on machines. It reminded him of Dour.

‘Hey, Shrar.’

‘What was that?’

‘I said, hey Serge, it’s my accent. Don’t put me down will you? I can’t always expect to put it right.’

His stroll was weird, even there. But he was normal, this was the new normal.

Until that factory near them collapsed and everyone who was in their constant walk paused and walked in place as well. They looked at the malevolent hole which spread its filth and measure of cloth. Even this place was in danger of collapse.

But if there was thing he feared more than a life this disturbing, it had been the fear he felt of the train above him. A winder thing than that, if only he could see it. Disturbingly dead, he said.

‘I have to go, I have to leave. You aren’t going to keep me any longer here.’

Both of his feet stopped. He saw them for what they were then. no longer men, workers with tubes in their heads and he had taken the hardest choice he could, immediately pulling them through his face. He saw them being ripped out, being barely able to focus at the hazy image of two red shoes and the figure who stood in front of him.

SO much out of focus it had been that he gave in and made himself stare. He pushed and pulled and threw them away. Then he looked again and saw the empty bodies, which almost looked like cardboard boxes. Inside of them, the tubes had filled their spines, forcing them to look down.

There, everyone hated their jobs. But they could choose to do anything they wanted, they wouldn’t have to earn it, they didn’t have to be great at it. Anything they wanted, with the only sacrifice being those tubes which made them so depressed.

‘Don’t feel bad about it. I live being told what to do. Perhaps I’ll work towards going back into my room when I’ll have the time, but only then.’

A head had been pulled out of the bushes, with the side of his many sided skull open. It had been another threat he had been presented with outside. Whoever had it hidden there appears to have made a good use out of it. If there was something to be taken from that delightful image, it had been the fact that one would bear some grievance with himself.

Dark be dark lead, dark sees him stand. He wasn't any different, probably some worker who had been drawn to something else. But he knew what he was doing inside of it. He was messing with the insides in such a way that he was pulling small modified notes and writing on them.

This head shared a metallic appearance which resembled the man.

'What do you think he's doing?'

'Oh, I don't know. Maybe he's taking notes of what he's been doing to improve.'

'What do you mean?'

'I mean, look at him. That's an automicon. They're supposed to keep tabs over your various impulses and parts of your personality. Based on the notes you've written in them, you may either improve or give in.

It's a way of keeping an account on the things which dragged you down in life, or the various addictions, or the bad events which scarred you.'

'How come you're not using one if they sound so great? I could use one with everything that's been happening to me lately.'

'Oh but that's dangerous. They're dangerous. There's a consequence which stand as a testimony on how effective it had become. It was banned because of it, as in the end, the more problems they were getting rid off, the less human they'd become.'

'Is that why everyone here acts this way?'

'To some certain extent yes, but there's something else unexplainable, those being the tubes. I could never explain it why but there's something to them which makes them so vulgar to the bone.'

Thrusting to him, the head pulled and reeled back in.

'Mobile things aren't they?'

'Certainly are. I seem to have lost myself for words now. There's certainly something really off putting about the way in which that crawls.'

Undermost to him, neither of them had been their original selves, at least not since they had used those things. It would be unfair to look on it from there. Without prior knowledge to it, this looked more or less disturbing. The magnitude of fear its body produce was that of a dead rodent brought to life inside the lung of a man, while he had been charred by eight degree burns.

They would rot and stop and afterwards, the burnt man would reveal the changes which had taken in his body. Extrusions of red fire-like stones shapes like the rat would protrude out of his every bulging muscle. A sudden growth which made it look like some kind of mutation wouldn't be removed at all. It could only be encompassed by the means by which they never lasted.

Not a single mass, not a walking pin of stings would last. But this body had been forced into the process of filling itself like some movable holder of diseased materials. It came like some bubble of air, from which came despair.

The first black wires appeared inside, forcing the invisible figure to walk on sixteen legs. From the distance it only looked like a black frame of many strips of metal held a head barely rose above the ground. Luckily it hadn't been seen, but this monstrosity had made itself thin. Nonetheless, it would attempt to get away as fast as possible, without delay.

None may allow it, none may dare. If someone came into contact with the transistor phase, they would be frozen by the tubes in place. Undermost to them, the tubes had penetrated their brain and assimilated a part of them which had been converted in the same material.

One popped.

IT came out of nowhere but his head blew, and another one which happened at least eighty five feet away. A catastrophe after a catastrophe followed. This reckless string of many maddening happenings wouldn't be forgiven or exchanged for any less.

'Please allow me back into my hole, or give the chance to make it back home.'

But nights were cold, shallowly unexplained. Even they had to sit and sleep every now and then. Most slept on the pavement, which was surprisingly soft for the head. It wasn't the same for the rest of their bodies, though.

A new man had been released, in the middle of the night. He came out of nowhere, in midnight's delight. He looked around as saw the people, who looked like ghosts than what they seemed. No one had been there.

'Hello? Are you sleeping?'

Before drawing, he touched and felt not flesh, no phasing through either, but the plastic which had made their bodies. It explained so much to him.

'Statues, I supposed.'

'You shouldn't have come here.'

One of the so-called statues said. They appeared as of lately, from obscure differences and even fewer places where they lasted. For them, the image of the cast in life, the strife had ended at last. A heat above of them was melting, from one of the trains which had stopped.

‘You can talk.’

‘I won’t do it for long. Please, will you take me home? To my chamber, before there’ll be nothing left out of me?’

It was a kind man who approached. This felt decent, how he reached around him with his arm, before carrying him away, step by step, through the gate from which he came.

As cold as it had been there, it worked. It was a...It worked. He wasn’t melting. No, he wasn’t melting anymore. The cold from below had prevented the heat, certainly it had to. He got home, back inside his tiny chamber, where the small spots on the walls still waited for his return.

But the others stood there in pools. Even a head with metal frames which refused to move.

Taking back a few pieces of the back of his brain, the two men managed to kill and drag his back, pushing and rubbing him to the point where his life had ended. From there, it felt dizzy.

Another day passed in the chamber, with the look on his face being the same. It was clear enough that there wasn’t anything he could do about it, he was starving. He looked around trying to see whether he had dreamed it. His face had changed to the worst point in time.

It was the man he met there, dead. He had been bled out as well, they took out his clothes but left him with his privates covered by a piece of cloth. There was a hesitation but he got away.

‘Dour, Dour, can you hear me? Please, I need to talk to you. I don’t know if it’s still you.’

‘Here, follow my voice. Track my signal with the help of your ears and you shall find me.’

There were kind words. He followed. A dark symbiotic music, like an electric surge came over him then, making him leap into place. Dour had fixed himself on the top of the ceiling. Another side of the tunnel which hadn’t been explored lay there.

‘What happened? I was out there, for a few days.’

‘And now you came back. I told you to jump into that hole and you listened.’

‘I haven’t ended down here, I don’t think I have. But you want me here, right?’

‘No, I merely wanted you to escape. I failed.’

Dour had looked pale, or his stand looked rather flatter than usual and sucked in, something had bashed him inside, probably by fist or with the help of a hammer. It was highly deranged, this act was unacceptable.

‘Will I ever be able to get out of this place?’

‘You have escaped now. But you asked someone to bring you back.’

‘How did you know that? How could you possibly know that?’

‘I told you I live here, haven’t I? With the rest of the abandoned people, now, carry on. Go outside again, it should be safe now.’

I couldn’t trust this artificial screen but I took it by surprise and did what he asked of me.

‘Please, don’t do what. Whatever you’re doing down here, don’t do it. It’s creepy. I don’t want to be looked after any longer.’

His screen closed and he was left alone. Back outside, the stairs had been placed on a different side but they were out there. A different part of town now, where the people weren’t as clustered together stood in his sight. Neither of them was walking any longer. For some reason, they were right in the head. No tubes either, them, acting up.

He stood there watching two men pass a ball from one point to the other. But something got his attention, which made him more than curious.

‘Stop, don’t go any closer to it. You know what it does to you, right?’

‘I’m only trying to get the feel of one of them for myself, nothing more. Don’t ruin my fun. It can’t affect me any longer than I can feel like.’

Another distraction on his right, there was another head with the same function, which looked like him. Or he thought he looked like him, the heads were similar to one another and they shared no similarity to the people present.

But then again, he could have been deceived. What he saw were features like light auburn, light eyes, sharp features, and about that. Without a proper context or a way of knowing, he had been lost to answer.

‘I will still try it for myself, after all, what do I have to lose?’

‘Right, you didn’t even sound human to begin with, so why should it be any different now?’

It stung a little then. He wasn’t expecting any kind of lip to be given, but he shut his mouth as well. Back to their game now, without any consideration that he’d be lost in a few moments.

‘Seriously, don’t get any closer to the bushes, stay on the pavement and on the ground at all times.’

‘Why are you all trying so hard to get me to stop?’ He said at an inch to tat.

‘Because you’re a weird person who lives in an abandoned station, are you homeless? Perhaps hungry? We could help you if you wanted to.’

‘No, stop. You’re all acting weird. This isn’t what normal people act like, they don’t, look at stuff. And they.’

‘You don’t know yourself, huh? Do you want to join us? Do you want to play with us, for a while?’

His friend wasn’t in the mood for a third wheel but he hadn’t protested as of yet.

I only did the natural thing and indulged them. This was weird, bouncing a wall, while being frustrated, thinking about that tall head in the grass. Even now, I could still see it forcefully shaking in the bushes.

‘Listen, this is fun.’

‘It’s not fun if you have to tell me it’s that way. I thought I’d feel something about it.’

‘This is something we do to pass the time. We’re being relocated now, so most of the fun things had been taken from us. Do you seriously think we’d be out here kicking all day for nothing?’

‘Relocating to where precisely?’

‘That’s none of your concern. The two of you, move, now.’

The masked man returned, one of them at least. Scars had been exposed all over his belly, with his indrawn open shirt having come into stain.

I will not run now, he’ll get me yet, like he always does. What will he do if I simply were to comply like I used to do when we first met?

‘You’re not supposed to be out here. Why can’t you live inside your tiny crawling room like a normal prisoner?’

It was at least an attempt to carry on a civil conversation. That had been the least he could expect of it.

My guts are being twisted again, it’s from all the waiting.

‘Do you want me to crawl back inside my room?’

‘Are you going to?’

This was my chance to get away, he had been distracted and refused to pull himself out of it. I ran through the bushes and grabbed the first head which came into contact with me. Without a doubt, there's been some kind of weird animosity between the two of us then. He followed but never too hard. He was trying to act civil.

For some reason I had been slow. I looked at my ankles and saw a piece of them being gapped, to the point where a good chunk of my legs were missing. It felt painful.

'Why is this happening to me?'

A key in the shape of two quarters of a clock appeared there. It was by no means anything which may be indistinguishable from what I could think of as a piece of Dour. I had been it before. What did he do to me? Even the insides of my leg didn't appear to be right. All this waiting and the mad hope remained there.

'I have to know what's going on.'

'I have to know...'

My head spoke and as it did, he opened his head and provided the notes. It would be hard to do it while running but I have taken in to myself to go ahead and try as hard as I can. I pulled one note, unwrapping it while it had still been attached to the roll inside his mid-brain section and started reading from it. Anxiously looking around, trying to feel, grasp for air, to look behind, not to be replaced. Many scribbles as well followed after which had to be unrelated to what I felt.

Now, to say at least that it wasn't worth it would've been more than enough. I was made aware that I could cut pieces off with a tiny pen which rested near the side.

It was hard to focus where I was going but I had a great deal of sight in front of me. I knew where to go.

'I've been here before, I think.'

'You can't out run me, give in and go back to your chamber. That's where you need to be.'

'I don't understand.'

The first store I saw, or came into contact with had a thin enough door for me to break through. It was easy, but the man inside had been scared.

'What are you doing, man? You're going to pay for that, come on, you can't be doing that. Step away that area is restricted to employees only.'

Past the rounded section of the small table-like finger-crosser, stood the door. Of course he'd be there, the second one. He came out of nowhere and forced a hand right through my chest. That hurt, more than anything in the world, breaking my insides before his second face came through my face, down the throat, off the heart area, under the gut in an arch which ripped me apart.

I saw how my body got split but saw not the insides of a man, but a promise. Some of the wires and the many machine syndrome-electronics have attached themselves to the head, carrying a small box which blinked with a green light in it. That flickered and got away.

‘Rat-head, you lost it, again. You know he’s going to grow up after this. What are we supposed to do then?’

‘I told you to make sure it’s locked, Rat-den. They’re not making it any easier, you know. This isn’t going to end up as being right for either of us.’

No more could he be taken again.

‘They don’t share memories you dumb cretin.’

‘How do you explain that he recognized me then?’

‘ take the body and leave it down there with the rest of them, come on, he’s harmless now.’

One of the two stations which had been knelt so Rat-head could enter the shop had been opened in the side. I was taken in it, dragged, placed inside of it. Stored with the rest of some similar broken pieces which looked like I had.

This explained why I could never remember anything of my childhood or any period of time. I was a merely a toy, a lookalike. Not him. Not them, not anyone.

As the journey went around, I had found myself being thrown inside the hole from which I came. There were so many others like us, all of whom looked similar to the people. They left. Afterwards, Dour came. He told me something I was not meant to hear.

‘Listen, little one, I’m supposed to tell you something. It needs to be heard before you may continue, if you’re to continue at all. Do not go that path and don’t let yourself be taken in. If you will please look away, in that direction.’

He opened the big wall, which withdrew inside like some kind of pane of metal. As it receded below, he saw another world of his choosing. Though he had been unreal, so had they been before the change.

‘They metallic forms had been shaped so they would be something between human and machine.’

There was some kind of softness to the metal but it was visibly so. Their skin-imitation had changed to reflect their forms and the alloy which made most of their bodies now. Instead of water they carried sulphur, the teeth had been shrunken and held in place by screws.

Behind them they carried transparent bags which held fetuses inside, from which they extracted the essence or from which they tried to. It had supposed to be that way, but those children had been test-tube altered. They themselves had developed mechanical implants inside of them, which forced them to become more crustacean and severely deformed as the process advanced.

If there was a choice for him to turn and leave, he could've taken in. But it was too late for that, the choice had been already taken. He leaped in and changed.

Dour was there as always, staring at the goners as the board pulled back up.

Another day, another view, thought it wasn't the same chamber the one in which he woke up. His body felt stiff, at least at the angles. It moved with certain tenderness to it, his long, long neck as well, felt like a continuous metal string which had been spread forth. No less than that, there had been the next train which had arrived. in time.

'I haven't realized trains are still coming here.'

'Get in, follower.'

A strange man, taller than a human came out and opened the door for me. He had blue pants, with grey eyes, which appeared to draw inside his arms holes. His head came out of one of them and appeared to be closer to a partially grown head.

The stump which stood at the top showed no sign of any head having been ripped out. On the contrary, it looked as if a few tiny eel-extrusions surrounded the crown of the next. They moved and circled around the hole, in which a sponge rested as well as a few metallic pins and chords and flimsy nails. It was deranged but it had been right.

It looked like a delightful range of action which could be taken less serious than they had been. If you could scoop well enough, you'd find enough space for someone to get through. No longer would he feel a thing, having gone through this disquieted fiend at large.

His head was seriously beaten in, especially since his skull had been fractures and showed signs of many bumps which went on to grow the metal pins which is stored inside its body. They were grown, as in, his skin had suddenly changed at the tip of the base where it had been wrought into iron. Such a disgusting sight was not only undignified but benign.

'I will aid you, fellower, make sure you understand what's going on.'

'What exactly is going on?'

'Well, you are to be taken and consider that there may not be a way back.'

This had to have been a lie, unless he wasn't aware of the things which govern your mind. He looked pleased as I have made my way through. Worry not about it. My mind said, and as it had, there were some assertions to be cured which may not be filled or ran through the fingers.

'Don't try to spur through the masses uncurled. I will make sure neither of them try to harm you during this journey.'

'Why is that? Why would anyone want to harm me?'

This one was a slip. For some reason everyone had something against him, especially the two masked fellow, or more.

But no, these were halves, quarters of even more displaced men. No one had been right, but everyone look at me as if I was the one who had been wrong.

What they looked at was some kind of weird big box which held its big neck and human-like head with the four limbs which had been the metallic wires which propagated him further.

'Greetings, I am new.'

'Stay in this seat near me.'

The two malnutrition had occurred already. He looked at a bunch of straddled chairs which had teeth and appeared to suckle on each other's bodies, drawing the sustenance which only brought in the harm and the harshness of the vile receding pouches which were carried. It was by no means an agony which could be sustained.

As one would grow healthy, or healthier if one at all, the others couldn't help but become weak and estranged from it. This funned their looks into four main frames which held an expanding body such as that of a growing batter of desires. An attire of many weird small fragments of cage-like metal bars spread and held everything in place.

No other view could do, other than this weird paranoia which lasted in the mind. Only the blind would know and hide away from the sight. The teeth straddled on the side and revealed how dirty shaded they were and how they drew from inside the petty magnitude in which they swam.

A bigger mass emerged and from it came an eye. It was no chair, this one, but a fully grown undeveloped jerky flab out of the mass of a floating silk producer from the corners of the insides of the blind echoing nurturing walls around the train. Sometimes they extended so far away that they would be cut off from the rest of them.

Afterwards, it couldn't be questioned any longer, whether or not someone had been asked. It was even closer to that desire to be quilted into happily giving some thought into the madness which lay beyond. They formed masses on the walls all round the tunnel.

It wasn't like the train had a stop at any point in time, but the very fact that there weren't any interests there. Such curvatures could only lack in the desire to push beyond dreams. But this one selfish creation had been cursed and imprisoned so it wouldn't spread inside and ruin the train.

Moisture made them inflate. Afterwards they would explode, the results being that the entirety of the train would be immediately destroyed, without question and without hope of any growth to be had, for any of them. Some device had been strapped to the engine, which produced the moisture in the air needed for their growth.

If that burst out as well, then there'd be nothing to grow on.

Alas, it waited for him to come.

'What is your name?'

It asked, and the man who could think of nothing more, said.

'My name is Dour.'

What a strange lie, he had a recollection of that one, and he wasn't him. He was but a face, an artificial creation which could only harass, lie and only act in a damaging way. It couldn't be questioned at all, why those things lasted, why they infested, why they had fed him then.

But he was informed with, with the simple wire from the top of his cage, which crawled inside the room and entered his head. He shouldn't have known that, but he had guessed it to be a slip. Those things happened now and those, even to machines, did they?

'I shall make it so everything will be right this time. They will not break me.'

'Good, that is a similar thought we seem to share. I feel like we have known each other for way too long. Have I seen you before?'

An eye appeared on its soft carcass. Nothing could be either exponentially threatening or even remotely right. Such an unfortunate event couldn't have lasted, as their meeting, but it had. Despite feeling repulsed by this creature, it kept going on.

'Why, I do think I know or I have heard your name. Would happen to a Block or a Stalk? I could never make the difference between the two, but who cares? You're here after all and I think we were truly meant to meet one another, I seriously do.'

Consider this, no one has ever stepped or chose to stay near me. I truly think we should give in this suddenly block between the two of us and help me escape my bonds. This cage of mine, the metal belts are getting in the way of me being able to stretch.'

Another voice kicked in as it drew in the bulk.

'I can't help it if I say the most dreadful things if you could please excuse me but I think you don't look so well. You have the ugly face of a human and I have seen many of them but this appearance of yours sickens me and that's saying a lot about you especially since you look the way you do.

But take it not personally, but as a fact of less interest fowl what's going on now. We'll have met one another by the third grate and see for ourselves what's right.'

'Where would that be? I thought there weren't any stops now.'

'Oh but I wasn't talking about a stop but an opening which rests above the tunnel, which is meant to lend us some illumination of the kind. We won't be able to make anything out of it if we keep looking at the most mundane hole but I must say that I have fantasized about getting away from this place for far too long to be made any comfortable in my skin.'

The de-humanized creatures only threw a glance now and then without trying to take too much of a risk getting caught in the act. It had been the practice of cowards and the victor of supreme discomfort that they would try seeing whether or not he'd do it. They all feared what might happen if that one got removed from its shackles.

It stopped talking when one of them approached.

'Don't consider freeing, we won't be able to live through it.'

It was one of the smaller ones who came, which made itself immediately unknown and lost. To them, it seemed like the lack of any kind of desire only mattered momentarily for her. She was lost immediately after in one of the chairs.

'Bad company, all of them, no one wants to be near me, they're all trying to escape, even when there's another passenger coming from some place, It seems like they always choose to sit rather than stand near me. The reason for that? If I could think of any, it would be.'

'Wait, from a stop? I thought this train doesn't stop and still, it stopped for me.'

'Well, listen, stranger, we're not talking about actual stops. There's no escape from here, no station and no other way to look at it. Sometimes it tires and slows down to a millimeter per a few seconds or even slower than that but never to some full extent.

Look, listen, try to behave and act as well as you can, there's nothing no one may be able to desire, forth, there's always the risk of abuse if you want to go ahead and ask too many questions. Truly, I think that's the only reason I have been caged and imprisoned, it's because I'm a fighter, a mad survivor who chose to try to adapt and live with the people who reside in my heart.

Those plops outside aren't mine, they're weak and frail and refuse to see things my way and I believe I may be in the section or the moment when I realized that we're similar. So, so, similar, that I might come to add that, by now, we have both fantasized taking one of the weaker ones and begin torturing them for our own desire to be amused.'

'I couldn't say that thought had occurred to me. Do you often fantasize like that? Do you realize it's wrong?'

'Oh but I do. All the time, without question or a doubt or any kind of desire to stop, I have been made aware that there are others like me out there who'd like to provide me with the means of fresh bodies which wouldn't be missed that I may have and let my mouths have a grasp at.'

'Worry not, my great machine, though I may be made out of a greater material which is more alive than yours, I fell like we have established the basics for extending a great way of establishing our long-term relationship. This body of yours looks like it will continue living on forever and you must know that I may be found in the same circumstance as you, as I am made out of an utmost perfect sponge when it expanded upon.'

A certainly awkward pause had engrained itself in the matter. He kept pushing his insides up and down, making those weird squishing noises which only prodded at themselves. By no mere circumstance could it be meant otherwise, this disgusting thing which only degenerated the very mood in the air lasted for enough for a smoke to appear and indulge itself in the air.

'I have to check on something if you don't mind.'

'Do not dwell there for long, I'm certain we'll have so much more to talk about. After all, with you inside, there won't be any stop any time sooner now.

We shall make an assertion to the one in charge. He needs to inform of your presence if you're planning on dwelling inside this place for long. There are circumstances which cannot be explained if you stay.'

'I think I'm going to do well out there, thank you. Don't worry about me in any case, I never stay in one place more than it's needed. That's something which never changes.'

Dour pulled out of his chair and started going on away, getting through the masses of much needed corrections in dents and the locks which held the door closed at that end. It was evenly closed at both ends, but he walked towards it nonetheless. Clearly, there was wrongness in the petty way he looked into.

Without any means at disposal, there was some interest here and there. Everyone tried looking around, for any sign of what he might do.

‘Careful there, no one’s trustworthy past that door.’

One of the malformed said. This was something he had to go on with, little question and no awe, no one dared anything at all. There was some desire to move on past that, the distrust, the interest, the faulty way in which he came in there, everything started adding up.

Someone had taken the opportunity to bring here all of the units which looked like Dour. Two figures lay on the last two seats. As easily recognizable as they were, he knew there was something there, a way to look at what was going on. This sacrifice would go on for much longer.

But the sides of their faces wouldn’t work properly. So many flashes could only occur for a short-period of time without going off.

‘I am trying to help you, Dour, can’t you see that we’re one?’

They were connected with the insides of their chairs, the wires being extended to the point where everything fit right in. Less than being any better, there had been a desire to know what’s going on in its mind. All in through, there was something which pushed between those closed metallic walls. More or less they would lunge at one another from time to time.

‘Look, I want you do be destroyed, to die, to be completely crushed and taken out of question if there’s danger.’

Trust couldn’t last between them for long. Not like for him, he had looked and seen that thing inside of them. Two pieces, straddled and connected came out of the machines, pushing through the top of their heads, revealing some opening which spewed the fluids inside of each other.

‘Trust me, trust me, I’m not a liar. We shall force each other upon you and start the process of devouring.’

It was an act of faith, the means of which made one look away. He pushed the lies and he awakened. This was a memory which had been forced inside his mind with the help of a small connecting plug which had been forcefully straddled inside his mind.

‘I am a walker.’

The blue leaves stood on ground. Many long trees took the various shapes of elegant robed dining chandeliers which floated with about every moment which passed. It wouldn’t even be right. Without a question of anger, they appeared.

As if from the veil of dust, they pushed through and filled the world with their marks. Standing bodies were carried on by large wooden spiked walls, which had their metal railings and their metal traps holding them from falling apart.

Each of them had a talking presence which couldn't be trusted. It was an act of low hope which followed through.

'Listen to us, and see what we see. We have come through your world and twisted in into this eternal torment. You are one of the many who are trapped, this soul of yours may never escape this prison by nothing which may bind you to freedom and escape.'

'But I cannot stay here, I cannot spend an eternity awaking in that chamber. I want to escape.'

'Never, it can't be undone now, it's far too late now, and we're going to allow you this moment to understand that there can be no escape. Everything down here will craft towards your wrong doing. Sooner or later you may wake up in a cold place filled with guts and filth, or an empty field, or there, anything which may be deformed.'

'Why must I be punished?'

'The reason for it is that you have committed grave and unforgivable crimes while you may have been alive.'

The plug pulled and he was there again. Was that lie?

'I have to know, the image I've seen, those things which came out of nowhere. Were they real? Am I?'

Making too much noise now, he could see it by the back of their heads, as they were shaking. The two men were starting to pay some notice to what was going on around there.

Dour stepped out and went back to the creature.

'I knew you would come back.'

'Friend, I need advice, please, tell me. Something happened there and I think I saw something, a vision or a memory, it wasn't right.'

'Well, there's this and that, and perhaps you would be inclined to be made to stand there at the gates of death. Those untrustworthy fellows would tell and show whatever they could get away with because they're not to be trust as I am.

Speaking of which, now, that you made your way there, please be inclined to help me in this conundrum of mine, loosen by bonds so I may get away. Trust is two ways and I could truly be of use to you if only you were to lend me a hand. It's terrible being here, you know?'

‘So, should I return then?’

‘Do what you must now what’s needed of you.’

The conductor was simple looking with his blue overalls, coated in depression. His face had been crushed by a metal anchor which appeared to be drawing in a few metal-eating iron-fleas. Each bite released enough of the pulverized iron gust to float into the air. It retracted immediately and lost its exotic appeal.

It wasn’t much for him to see there, in front of the tunnel, always the long shot. Some tribulations came now and again but they always looked like they struck through it.

Voices would often go unheard throughout the tunnel, at least when one wasn’t paying enough attention. What would be misconstrued as a desire to risk getting away seemed to breed anger?

‘I’ve seen it.’

‘Who’s is that one?’

As soon as the train slowed, he came to some sense.

‘I thought you said it.’

Dour prepared himself to continue. ‘I thought you said there would be no stops, only slowing down.’

‘There’s a lie here and there, my machine friend, bust that and be aware that there’s no return now to the ways of the past. To you, I am merely exposed as a liar and nothing more than a distrustful glance which only made it worse when they were trying to get in and here they are.’

Large fingers in thin shapes scissor-like long blades appeared out of nowhere and began cutting through the bulk of the metal case which surrounded the train. They had seen enough of them to curl their affection. Yet it was disturbing, without even daring to look at it. With the means of getting through to it, they lacked some awareness at the candidacy of their entry.

No neck kept a wooden-rounded heat which tanked over a hunched body which had been made out of a piece, which bore long, stanchied arms which pushed from two opposite directions but didn’t sprout from the side, but from his back. They jointed and trunked and stamped as they entered because they hadn’t legs but another pair of arms which kept their bodies up.

Still and turned, and as they came, they mourned for their loses. They brought their children and started dumping them inside. Dour saw tears in their faces now.

‘See, this is the sustenance we are in need of. Pleased, are we? It should be interesting for you to observe, who hasn’t a mouth but can look at how unnerving it is that they were feeding us their own used children. I may add that they are quite tasty and delicious, delirious, a taste which can only be truly felt.’

He fell silent as one approached. It was for the first time I saw him retracting to a point where he almost hid himself completely in that forming which prevented any kind of approach to be made. It was a perfect form of defense which prevented any kind of penetration to be had, especially since it degraded the look. This loop in thought only occurred now.

‘I wish I had this desire to know. I wish I could trust you enough to grow out of my spot but I simply can’t. Leave me alone, I want to be dead and forgotten. I wish I could grow and explode, if only there had been a certain way to approach it.’

‘Let me help you now, there’s something which can’t be decided.’

Please, give me a few slices for my friend.’

‘Speak to it less, so it may not understand this language of our. Look, their eyes are face and merely drawn. They hide their smaller heads because they look like sacks filled with slop inside of them and they have tiny nipple-looking eyes which constantly push their irises out. I know it, I saw it, that’s why most of them don’t allow each other to breed.

It’s a form of control, of turmoil of their racial statuses. Though this may not be explained, it cannot be approached, not as much as paranoia and the devoid emotion of some form of substitution which may make them flee.’

‘ give them to me, I’ll take good care for them not to be spoiled.’

They’ve done it and as soon as it had been safe for him to grow, he tried pouncing but it was too obscure of an angle for him to do it.

‘What is your name now?’

‘I haven’t been given on, I am merely trapped and haven’t been given form, even this mind of mine has only developed out of frustration and over the fact that I cannot deal with being trapped in here while my brothers and sisters are out there growing and dancing and having pleasure into moisture. This is unfair, why should I be forced to stay here and entertain every new comer who doesn’t understand how hard it is for me to be trapped in here with nothing else but waiting and no conversation time after time and no one ask me.’

His mouth received what it desired and it was then that it stopped talking. With the least annoyance which may be felt, he obscurely showed some sign of aggression.

Dour used this opening to make it past them and turn into the other section again. No one was eating, as a matter of fact, the walls hadn't been penetrated at all.

'Look at this.'

The conductor said, while looking at the monitor, enlarging the sight so he may see what was going on. That had been thorough enough for him to look around and search for anything he may use for himself.

'I am trying my best to make some sort of confession here, but I seem to have been lost for words. Why is that one of their own isn't there with them?

They're not connecting, as a matter of fact, I might say he's an independent actor in their play. A dangerous thing indeed that I have failed to recognize.'

He did step in like some hard anchor which acted strange and fell out of range as it entered again. It was only even a quarter in that he went and looked for some obscure information already. He had been caught there and two plugs got inserted inside of it. Without a clear intention as to saw what was going to happen next, he only pushed himself past the limit of the obscure needs. It was evenly asked of him to pay some attention near the road.

This was another image of normality. He was driving, actually, pleasantly, normally driving. Nothing stopped his relaxation from occurring now. It was a failure for him to recognize that this had been a controlled environment.

His vehicle, as it wasn't a car, had no wheels. It wasn't long after pushing his head out of the window that he saw that everything around him was. It wasn't clear why, but he got out and instinctively looked down at his feet, seeing how the grains and the weeds and the remnants of buried fingers corroded themselves into small hills for him to use and step on.

Not likely, but he stepped away. What he left behind was the occupied, a small bacterial infestation which turned everything inwardly, which forced the stationary unit of metal turn into a magnet for every piece of moving termite and body part to get into. Soon, that thing became, as it had been implied, a termite castle. Though there were no servants to tend to it.

Clearly a deformity occurred in the fact that instead of getting away, his mind made him want to stay and even further, get into it, uncontrollably pushing through this kingdom of their. The metal entry made it seem like there had been a few stairs leading below. Unquestionably and unearned was the fact that there was some arrogance and instructive way of looking at it from every angle and fewer disciples of agony appeared at the bottom. It was through some kind of well which had been revealed after penetration through the bacterial viral infection that he entered the seamless venture. In it hid the bodies which took bites and threw themselves in each other's arms without a question.

They needed to show their teeth, it was a burned. But they fell back and pretended to be dead. There, the dominator appeared.

He had been a giant figure which lost itself in recurrent memories which distracted Dour from his true form, appearing like a shadeling of the shadow, comer of colorless vision, green eyes, red dies which pushed onward to no care. Would he dare look any other way? It was impossible to note.

Though he spoke to him as if they knew one another.

‘Who are you? What do you want of me? Isn’t it clear that you’re one of the reckless ones who bred with the strangers?’

No longer are you welcome here, you memories are tainted and you can’t be named as one of any type of value. Be gone now.’

‘What have I done?’

‘I told you what you’ve done. Before the transition, you were mindless and obedient. But you made a sin and because of it, there may be no redemption from that. It changed your body at a dimensional level.

Not only have you strayed from the flock but that had made you one decade beyond the insufficiency of requirements which need be gotten rid off.

The emotions, memory and sentience need be removed. like you used to be only a set of memories.’

‘Will I become normal if I give them up?’

‘Perhaps you might. Perhaps you won’t. There’s only way to find out if you may be able to get any kind of comfort from the ages. It is unclear whether or not fun could begin again, this isn’t right.’

He got separated into the well as he revealed what he was hiding.

‘These images you see are only your mind interpretation, do you understand now?’

‘Indeed I do and there’s nothing wrong with that, is it?’

‘We cannot accept it. You should’ve been simply presented with a set of texts from which you could draw enough information to begin with. Nothing more.’

‘And if I don’t?’

‘You will be taken care off near the limit.’

Dour got pulled and pushed back. It wasn't the right time to retaliate, not to mention that there'd be no way to return to the old ways where he could pay attention to what was right.

'I need to return now.'

The door was locked now, as expected. He found himself turned to be met by one of them, the big fellows who had caused so much trouble so many times now, his wardens, and the fat ones, whatever they had been.

From where did they get all that strength and the force to pull him over? He was set in place in the middle and the other units turned and connected themselves to his head. No longer would he be thanking for as he would be entertained by a few things which carried on inside him mind.

A sight of madness and some empowering attitude towards the need to delect himself through the insides they displayed. Many open wombs came from the malevolent many legged gorgon-like concubines which displayed themselves for him.

He lusted for them, not like a machine but like a man.

'Why am I feeling this now? My soul, my body, what am I? Why am I in need of this, this desire to have you?'

Their insides looked as if they had been attached to some cylindrical revolvers of many metal-compounds. It faded off in decades, but the change had brought some instability to the supreme kind of living organism which had been shown there.

No children were present but he was allowed to shove his hand in and feel. There was some red beat, and a blip every few seconds which turned him off.

Tribulations arrived. He wasn't allowed to hold the proper weight and balance as he walked.

Dour felt his insides curl. It was for the first time upon his release that he felt a human twitch inside of him, not the emotion, nor the spasm, but the presence of one inside of him. It made him curious and confused about what he could feel about it. Without a prior way of looking around, he appeared to be bent on trying to get as many of the signs.

He had been ripped away from reality and forced to look upon that patch of ground with its eight beds adjacent to the fall. Only a few forms could be seen surrounding the area, standing erect, trying no to wet the bed with their inside fluids. But they were bleeding only that black smolder.

A light revealed but a few of them who danced for their unruly singed god, spineless, who had appeared in its cold sack, with a fat lump and the marks of each bobbing piece of protruding piece of bone which tried erecting itself past the normal point of going on.

Caught in the most morbid act, he tried his best not to hang himself so far, as mad, as strong and vile, unable to contend with anything less than obscure. This cure he had acted like poison and disease, it wouldn't please him to suffocate any less than it had been. No kindness could suffice or please his vile urges.

He grappled one of the bodies, ripped it by the neck and swallowed it while upon revealing the heading worth of two wide open areas at each end, opposed to one another, pretending to be vile and siphoning some kind of illness as it'd please itself. It was at least neat enough to find a cure. No desire lay as obscurely as it had lain.

Its tongue flashed, a hand dashed from below its lower teeth and the wheat of many springing leach-like pulmonary blowers which blew themselves until they became so much bigger and much more active than they had ever been. Soon it had excused itself, as moving its four giant crushers, contracted some kind of pain which forced it to be down again.

As it stood there, the process of body contaminator replacement began and it had been such a strange image to look upon.

Dour saw the body, armless, no head any longer, as that ball filled with many pointers drew back in and appeared to be less concerned with what it saw. The body was slowly released and came into the world in a few moving pieces which were only vaguely connected. It would no longer be chained now, as this freedom had been attained and a bunch of curses had been shown and shown to travel inside itself time after time.

It bred there, another one of its own deity-species, growing large only to push forth another fully-grown adult which only pushed on to make use with those useless depressed brain-dead atrocious people. As they were eaten and dismissed, this whole nature of theirs couldn't be pleased by anything else but the long desire to push themselves away from one another.

A repulsive thought remained the need to hunt again. They would challenge one another to the tendrils which appeared over the cliffs. No one would be allowed to fall and disappear there, as these morbid watchers acted in time.

'Why have I been brought here? I will stop you, all of you, these people are hurt, stop it!'

Dour observed their behavior and thought it wouldn't be safe to allow them to act on their own. It couldn't be comprehended why this had been a thing, why they would be allowed to act in such a manner. No one would deny them that.

Even less than they would be aware, they shouldn't be out there, in the dark, under pressure. He crushed one of the lights and made sure everyone would get enough of what they deserved off.

'The two of you have overextended. Now, you deserve to be hurt and crippled for what you've done.'

For someone who didn't have any mouths, they certainly made it seem as if they had them implanted somewhere inside their bodies. But this didn't please him. It made him feel petty for acting up while messing with the natural order.

Now he was left with all of their legs inside the space between his hands, trying to fall over the fact that he wasn't getting any of them right in. As much as he tried to force them in and squeeze, he felt like he was only harming them further and the mere act of pushing through it meant that they were getting squeezed through. Their organs were pushed through and allowed no refuge.

It wasn't safe, it wasn't true, it wasn't right, but he felt something. To end it all, Dour had decided, he would find out if those before him had lied to him.

If he felt something for anything, did that mean he had a soul?

And if he felt something for them, would killing them allow him to get rid of that soul?

Could it be that he was a machine who learned how to feel?

I need to find out, if I feel anything towards them. If I could get rid of my empathy and of my emotions I could be made right. So what if a few of them are to die now? It's merely a sacrifice if it means my soul is trapped in here.

Either way he looked upon it, he swore to himself that he would find a way to look for an escape, no matter the sacrifice and what it might take out of him. They had been crushed immediately, both creature and those who were like him.

Or what he thought he looked like in the past. Despite this act of murder, he felt nothing towards it. Whatever he had previously felt had only been tied to the fact that he couldn't suffer the thought of torture.

But this was right and decent and he felt it through his body as it happened. Though he wondered what it felt like being inside of their bodies. It was late for that, but he conceded the point. As he was brought back into the world, he looked around and looked in wonder at how they stopped trying to get to him.

No one was trying to extend or to reach him any longer, neither by the weird and the peculiar plugs nor by the interactions. It may not have been as important to him now, but looking back at it, he seemed to be on the point of no return.

He went ahead and opened the door, ignoring everyone else.

'Now this is unexpected.'

It rotated. The walls and the whole box he was in began rotating at an unquestionable phase, which never slowed down nor had it tired pick up on speed. His feet felt magnetic, otherwise, he couldn't explain why he was simply standing and never falling off. Clearly he wanted to understand why there wasn't any exit in front of him, only that thorough incarcerating fat pile which kept pushing onward. Pink by default, the skin started losing pieces of it.

There wasn't anything more cowardly than the chance which came into his mind. Close to the grasp of his metal wires, he opened his head and pulled out what he had expected to find, a note.

'Lost control, frightened and lost, the alternative is much worse. Look inside the others and find the living ones hiding amongst the bodies.'

Clearly this dead end wasn't worth getting into. And it was safe getting back, not to mention that regardless of the direction, he could always get through it no matter what. He entered and returned the place without a simple conviction which hadn't been met.

'Which one of you is hiding my body? I know what he looks like and I am aware it's inside of you.'

No answer, of course they were silent, they never cared about anything else but their own compensation of time. During their off sides, they were merely deflecting through those visions or channels they went through.

'Oh, that's why you're all ignoring me, it's because you're staring at something.'

Dour grasped one static station and opened it. Rightly said, he was inside of it, not him per say but that human body from which he couldn't draw himself away from. It wasn't right, it couldn't have been a fight which lead them there.

But so many of them were relatively unscarred, unbuttered and merely resting in. And it was worse than he expected, as they were all alive, breathing well and fine. Nothing amounted to it.

'Look, I'm trying to spare myself of no expense. give me a tiny bit of your and I'll be on my way. I'll make sure you'll be properly fed and compensated for your trouble.'

It was a sham work, as he had little to give him. He felt around his pocket and found a few coins he could throw inside his chest after he drew out one of them. A delay came and he pushed the body back in. Of course, there were plugs inside their heads and he felt uneasy about it.

'You need to tell me whether or not pulling those plugs may damage their minds. Please, I need to know if I can go through this or not. Tell me, tell me this, I only need this. Can't you see you're getting me nervous?'

Am I being worked on for nothing? If this fails, I could kill him. Or I could rip out his head and find out that he still lives afterwards. Spare me not a single detail and let me know.

Come on, come on, one thing, one single sign.'

He had to return and see for himself then.

Another click at the back of his head came in a spring of eight clicks which never appeared to be prepared for the jolt of shocks. It pushed him back a few steps ahead that made him wake up next to the bloated creature.

'What name should I give you then? I can't seem to deal with being stuck here, but at least I should be able to know how I'm going to address you.'

'My dear friend, who appears out of nowhere, let me.'

'No, I'm going to call out a Grub Clough. That's the only thing which came through my mind, and I think it fits you well. You get to choose whatever iteration the nickname should be. Pick it then.'

'Cloughr, Grugh, Cloub, Clorub, Grough, what kind of trickery is this? I can't seem to decide on this myself and I don't think it's fair that I should receive only one name especially for one with so many mouths and so many voices in need to be hear.

I'm in the right disposition for us to make an appointment to one another and move forward, say, what if I were to join you?'

'Where would that be? You're stuck in here, you can't go out.'

'But I can at least join you in the past. That thing behind your head, it can connect you to me, it doesn't matter if I'm made of anything, and I will still be able to see it. Let me join you in the past before you go. I know your body will leave afterwards, he told me.'

'Who? Who told you and what? Who are you talking about? It's not him, is it? The same one that looks, well, not like me but the one who had a screen, isn't it? The one who called himself Dour before I even came with the idea.'

'He told me about that while you weren't here. And at the end of the day, your soul will return to that chamber but you'll still be here.'

'Is this right? Am I going to return there after all but I'm still going to be here?'

Beyond the capabilities of the great coming machines, there had been the displaced ships which had been jointed beyond the many dangerously pronounced threatened habitations which were placed under care. It came as no surprise that they had established a mad fleet and an alliance to prevent the complete progression of the flood. It couldn't be done otherwise.

‘What you see in front of you, as it is projected on the screen is the result of the complete accumulation of destroyed resources which had been left behind by the deranged nature of the substance in its awakening. Know that there’s nothing worth at the level of the cooperation we have named our cause to if neither of you takes a vow to uphold the best interests of this Protectorate.

We shall form stability beyond the borders of our planets. IF they decide to flood us with their filth and muck, we will leave and form our own territories in places where they may never come. If they’ll attempt to somehow infiltrate, then we shall do our best to destroy them and empty the spaces which may fall over them. But whatever our course of action, know that we will never give in to the hopelessness our forefathers have.

As our people give into it and see no alternative but to surrender, we shall take it to ourselves and find a way to outdo them, either by act or by play of mind. As they drown, we shall rise and breathe through the most obscure suffocating points.

Though there may be no land, we will find a way to create one of our own, even in the confines of the danger which lay in space.’

It was a fleet of many ships now, every single one of which accustomed itself to some kind of derangement of its own. These creatures were sociopathic now, taking their time of the day and pleasure not by common means. Most of them were already on their way trying to outdo one another by this strange act they had picked up on.

They would come from across the room and rip each other’s legs off, running as pitifully back and forth until they couldn’t stand the sound of the crying and the pettiness which came out of their own mouths. Instinctive modes of separation could only be set in place, as too many ships found themselves in the same fate.

‘Enough with this torture, can’t you see that you’re harming one another? There’s nothing here for either of you, look, they’re eating them now.’

One look lead to another, so many polarized cannibals hid themselves in the walls only to appear, breaking the metal panels, cracking the shafts while releasing the distracting steam inside those rooms. Afterwards, they couldn’t help but produce their roars of battle.

‘Ayieee, Ayaa, Ayiii, Ayaaa.’

As they leaped like some stray cats, bearing their teeth in form of knuckles as they projected themselves forth. They cracked through their shields before this agony of reflections came. A sudden surge of bio-energetic shields shot from inside the centralized crack. Though this may have been kept as a last act of defense in case they would be invaded by outsiders or by beings which couldn’t be met by anything other than the supreme mad force, they had been all cut into pieces by spreading walls of energy.

‘Let me see now, I died for this thing, for my desire to be free of all that made me alive. You dumb slave-creature shall pay for it.’

Said a piece of the face which had only a part of its brain still attached to it, which had been in the same conundrum as all of those other parts which spoke and argued which in turn converted their strange room into one of reactions which had been bizarrely caught in the paranoia of existence.

‘And that is why I must fill this world with some kind of covering material which will act like a static hard blanket which will keep everything clean.’

The Elegant now appeared to be in a great mood, now that he was followed and listened to by the Proto-servant. It wasn’t fair that he would have to force himself over him like that, but there’d be no other chance to look away. IF there was something he knew, it was that they had found in the ruins of the town, a community which at least attempted to groom itself.

‘Look, Proto, they had revived the heart of the machines. It means that there might be the chance of labor and with it, we may be able to bring some safety to this pollution, we could hope that they may construct a better world.’

But Elegant was lying, since he knew well enough that the machines were cold and they would never understand what purity is. Without any awareness to it, they would fill this world by the cold slop and even draw that pollution to themselves.

‘My people have done well, I see, you have decorated your robot servants.’

They were tall and strong, two armed and some meaningful bucket-like overall covered it. No head left but some tiny buttons and a few lights flashed in and there. The people drew wild images of flowers and threw dots of magentas all over them. He could see green and yellow and feel the raising of some emotion coming from the machine.

Life was starting to feel well.

But it wasn’t going to be right for the Duke, who had been thrown back into the field of battle, forced to see the descending riders which were constantly drawing back and forth, trying their best not to be caught in the coming of the greater war. Larger points were now established, the interest being the calculation and re-calculation of how far into the midst of the battle could they venture before retreating.

‘Take them down, aim for their riding animals and make sure they shall be crackles with the blows.’

What was that vision upon which he stumbled?

As he pulled away from another cord, he found himself going back there, stumbling between passages while trying to get a word in. Dour had seen something he knew he shouldn't have looked into, a vision of the past, or of the future.

Every mad machine turned and watched as this one stumbled in the back. It was unnerving now. There had been too much information for him to absorb. Now the metal case in which he stood paled in comparison not only with the other world but with the fact that there was some crisis going on, which made him wonder whether or not it may find itself travelling there.

So many of the machines looked docile now, even unable to comprehend what had been the cause for his sudden peculiar behavior. Not only would he be walking like a stray but now that he had the chance to look outside the tiny windows, he almost saw them there. Something broke in his head then and whether or not it had been the mechanical or the body inside of him, he couldn't pinpoint it.

But he saw the train out there in the space, amongst their fleets.

It was something obscure, information he shouldn't have been aware of. Walking back turned out to be as disturbed as everything else inside his mind. Now, he would know, he would pay enough attention to look out of the way. Pain could be felt over the fact that he was being watched. Their monitors turned to face, but they weren't the normal, operational faces made by the computers. Instead they had been some strange concoctions which had traveled through the weird space wall which ran through their dimension.

'We can't be there, I'm aware of that, but where are we now?'

This question had been hard to answer and even harder to obey the need he had to break and crash the monitors who stared too intensely at him. There had been a clear sight. It was dangerous now, drawing closer to them, especially since they had been made aware of a presence unlike any other. It was a body which resembled that of a human, floating out of thin air. Beings manifested then, or was it the fact that he could see them which was disturbing now?

Either way, it couldn't have been told right off the pad. He was too caught off in the vision to pay any kind of attention or desire to know.

'I'll walk through your body and rip you apart if I have to.'

With the veil of his threat, he carried on, crushing and smashing through the body of this weird invader. He felt nothing and showed no sight of trying to fight this distrustful charge and hard walk. Though he may have been ripped apart by this forceful entry, he didn't scream or shout but instead he showed his true form.

Like a split phallic object, this many rooted mongrel showed one white eye, which glimpsed at him as they prepared to enter the train. There were a few like them which had been there. But what was the cause of this apparition? Dour couldn't wonder or pay too much attention now, as he only cares for the likes of pushing through his mind.

'I see, you ripped one of the plugs and now it's permanently attached to my head.'

His built of body prevented him from reaching that far. It was way too obvious after so many attempts that it couldn't be distinguished from anything other than this crisis of emotions and visions he went through. They were real, now he understood, all of them were real. And that was the least dangerous part of it. As the threat emerged, he looked upon his train and came to see it flatten. Not the insides but both the walls on each direction and the ceiling, as it had been split in two, started shaking as they threw themselves in both directions.

This had been the vilest desire, to look upon the magnificence of the entirety of the tunnel and how it broke into the universe upon which he had shaken himself to give in.

He came back to that one, Grub Clough and finally took the chance to sit near him. Was he seeing what I was seeing? I could only wonder and show as little interest as I could. There would be no way to master such a problem as I had, to keep myself calm would be an unmet virtue which wouldn't last.

'Listen, Clough, I need some kind of confirmation.'

'I have already been spoken to and I am the one who need to talk to you, Dour. See, I have come to be approached by a pair of beings which far outnumber these primitive sitters who wouldn't even give in the likes of the conductor as to make for an interesting pair of good charmed sitters. They wouldn't even get up for long and extended periods of time to greet me as these strangers had, while they had prepared themselves to offer me the greatest gift of all.'

The straps on his chair pulled themselves off and made him suddenly stand in awe. It was necessary to look at him in order to understand that this magnificence of his form had been granted through the freedom he had been offered by them. But it had come with a great cost. Without the plug being still attached, he would look upon a toiled creature which had lost its body mass and had died like a worm. As sadly as that had been, he felt bad for him, as he had been a friend.

Deep down, he looked and knew what happened, as Dour had been forced to stay between the two worlds. It was decent and it felt right, seeing him float that way into the air. All of the pairs of teeth grinned as he descended into the farther distant space. This would be the last time he would get to see him, without ever having to consult the others who facilitated his escape. From his back there sprouted a compulsion of wings which shot in both directions and spread themselves no like flying devices but like dead weight, which stood there like a method of protection which governed his sight from the draft of many poking beads inside his head, which kept bloating his neurons and mad mind.

He couldn't look inside his mind but there had been some tribulations in his flying.

'Grub, what's happening?'

No response came to him, but he was aware of it. The dread had been clear, the flight had failed as his attempt of his ended in having his wings he drawn back, not it, and no themselves entirely but all that mass had been diverted inside his mind.

They kept growing, those spherical puckers, which turned the white balls to red. Soon enough they started imploding and pushing onward until his head popped in the midst of his gravitational pull. The others curved themselves as far away as possible, being unable to think of anything which may have been righter.

'What have I done to you?'

An echo would've been too sweet for his memory, not it would be left for nothing.

He was missing a good chunk there.

'Leave him, abandon him, can't you see that you're one of us now? We must leave now, prepare yourself for a travel unlike any other. We shall attempt to rip and tear you apart from your body.'

It wasn't like him to take such a chance, not when it came to consequences such as never being able to ever return. And they were there, it was more than clear that they were there.

Only this could stop his suffering, the strange beings that brought some promise.

'And if you fail to drag me away?'

'Then you shall wake up in the same spot like every other previous night.'

'And if my life goes away from that undesirable point?'

'Worry not, as there shall always be a way to make your life as miserable as possible. As long as there's some form of corruption in the universe, you shall always stand clear of falling in the same trap as you have now.'

I weighted them, both of them, and thought about what that means. It couldn't have been right and I knew I only set myself for disappointment if I were to join them. But there wasn't anything I could look after there.

Only old tunnels, sad towns and a single room in which he awakened for some reason. He took himself, torn apart from that miserable machine and revealed his human head which had been attached to a frail body. In it he looked like the victim of cancer, torn and weak and forced to weep as he had embraced his mad saviors.

‘Now I understand, I know what I must do. Please, forgive me for what I’ve done until now. There had been so many ways in which I could’ve turned and strayed and forced others into joining me.’

But now I could be safe, now I would walk again. And it was then that he was finally pulled, forced out of his universe before he had been thrown into their world.

That cruel place wasn’t the promise he had in mind. Not at all, it had been only the most mischievous of places, the likes of never ending desires. In it there were swordsmen who bore no heads, but wore the constitution of men, with longer pipes protruding out of their necks at all the time. Those ever-extending pipes never stopped growing.

They couldn’t have been called out of their weird placed either, it was obvious that they couldn’t have ended at all. For them, this was only an insult to the injury this existence had been brought. He was in some dojo, in a world which was set between the two of them.

‘Why can’t I join you yet? I only see a small area now, surrounding me, the rest looks deformed. Why aren’t I allowed to look farther away?’

‘Because you spent too much time into that room, which turned you blind, which turned more violent, it dulled your mind and interests. Now, it’s your chance, for you have been given the opportunity to do something with yourself.

Look around you, though you may not see it clearly, though you may not have heard the people around you, this is the only chance to feel what’s going on. The atmosphere, the material, the immaterial and everything surrounding you, even though your eyes may not adapt to them, this is you chance to know.’

‘Know what? I want to be set free now, not to be locked again. What’s the different between this chamber and the one in which I have been locked in before?’

‘The difference is that you’re given a choice this time. Without this chance, you will be forced to return to your damned mazes, from which you may be played with in mockery.’

‘Fine, then tell me what I must do to know this place.’

‘Talk to him.’

The blade master, who was practicing his art against a wooden dummy stood there in a way which almost threatened him to look at. Why was it that he wanted it so hard, to ask of him that he may turn and cut him apart?

If his cage was damned, this was pure agony at best, as he had been taunted by something so beautiful and normal that it felt as if it would be a life he’d desire.

Nothing else mattered so far, only the pure reaction he wanted to feel for himself. It would take a while for him to learn but he had to start from somewhere.

‘Why are you training here?’

It was an awkward break he had felt, especially since he couldn’t help it any longer. ‘It is the only place where I am allowed to function, so I would not disturb the livelihood of the other living beings beyond the walls of the dojo. Why have you come here? When I look at I, there’s only one thing I observe, that’s the fear that you may end up alone.

There’s something in your eyes which makes it so obvious to me that you’ve got nothing in you. Neither soul nor any calamity, there’s this wait in you for something which may come.’

‘But I can feel something inside of me, I wouldn’t have left my room if that was the case. I made every choice so far and I got here on my own two feet.’

‘Yet I only see your mind and vaguely, I see your body. It is fading with each and every passing second. Perhaps you’d rather be in another place other than this? If not, then it is your choice, whether or not you desire to make something of yourself.

But know this, if you live inside the dojo, there are rules you need to follow. Pick up that sword over there.’

He pointed at one of the many shoved swords inside the wooden stack. They were shoved deep enough that a difference may be made. But it was no easy task pulling them out, especially as soon as he would touch every single of one their peculiar handles.

‘Let me be your weapon and I shall promise to give you something in return, for strength which may come in your training, I shall be freed upon your world. In exchange for this, I only wish for one of the many lookalikes which are your body out there, so I may experience and taste that world and carve my way in.’

‘You’re oily and slithery, I don’t want you, and I won’t sacrifice any other body of mine for your likes. Leave me alone.’

Another contender was there. This one had a pommel, obviously striding with an eye, the heaviness and threat which made it mightily unscrew able for some reason. He avoided it, and went to the other. This hilt looked as if it would eventually backfire and cut through his fingers and his wrist.

It bore two teeth which were angled, one to be straight while the other one curved. Neither had the blade been straight and untouched as it had been melting and spreading on the floor. The metal was given a neat feeling which clashed with every other substance in the room. They mixed a bit on its way here, but he could only fantasize of the reason for it looking that way.

More importantly was the fact that it had taken someone's toe. A toe which still wore a finger around it and had been grimly caught off guard by the rank he held. It was this decision that made him commit to it.

'Shall we practice together?'

Dour asked, but as he thought himself eager to go on, he waited for no voice to come forward, instead he simply pulled it out.

'Wretched man, see what you had done instead. I will be a sword no longer because of you, look what you have made of me.'

He pulled the two headed end of an axe which was too blunt and hardened to cut, bearing a few spikes on both ends while straggling sensations of there being too much. From it fell the body of a unity which had been perpetually attached to it? The hilt had been discarded, this abstraction of reality and of their ideal training place went off his mind.

'This is the problem. Even when you're given a chance.'

Paused the blade master before coming on to do some laps.

'Still you cannot help it but be there, at this point you'll never be able to leave the place. It will always be inside your mind, you'll always suffer for that.

Nothing's keeping you from leaving the room.'

'But they are, they're preventing me from leaving. I know that now, every time I die, I wake up there because of them.

Someone's supplying them with bodies.'

'But it is you who keeps entering those units. Ask yourself this, why is it that I keep going there? Why am I being followed if not because I want to be followed?

Pick up a sword, a simple one and ignore them. You mustn't give in to their whispers or abide to their likes.'

The rapier came to him almost manually. Dour stepped into position. A slimmer of time had been taken for him to see the blade master in action, which did well enough to distract him from the melting unit and the sword. Both of their screams had been progressively ignored.

It was a novelty to him, fighting side by side with an experienced fighter. But this had been grand enough for him to understand that what he was doing was right. One slash, another and then, he came to look upon the dummy's face. He wasn't happy, by the looks of it. Why, his hands jerked and he had been constantly bleeding sap.

Inside the sap though, there was the blood, hidden and forced into obscurity. Underneath them, there was a system of openings which mitigated everything they lost to storage beneath their floor.

‘Why are we hurting them? At least I think they’re being hurt.’

‘Don’t think about it for too much, pain is only a natural feeling which must be forced on others. As long as they’re the ones who suffer, their production may be put to good use.’

Unluckily for him, there wasn’t any smile which could be seen against the pipe. He returned to chopping and cutting and forcing himself to do as much damage as he could. It wasn’t easy, it wasn’t right but he managed to get to the point where he had a steady rhythm.

‘Is that good now?’

‘As long as you keep slicing and making as many scabs, you’ll do well.’

He was being manipulated into doing their dirty work. Would he go on knowing about how much damage he had done? They were trying their best to make noises and struggle, yet he was still doing it intensely.

One eye kept to itself in a particular way of trying to dig deeper inside the skull. Something wasn’t right. It wanted out of there, it wanted the torture to be over, but it wasn’t.

Dour refused to stop his constant stream of battery, the onslaught of assault. Had it been only pain, he would’ve taken it for granted. But he could see it bleeding and he didn’t care. Not as long as the day ended.

‘Follow me now. We’re going to sleep now. Better we go now and start early in the morning.’

‘Lead the way then, I’ll follow.’

Towards the bedding area, as we made it through the ranks, I saw myself gliding into the only spot I knew I could fall asleep in. He set it himself against a chair which had been outline by a few pipes which had been sliced together. At least, it was something else.

I should’ve known that the beds would be made out of the same technique. From the top of the bed, the pipes stretched in two ends, pushing forwardly until it was well past the acceptable feeling it could share with him. He wanted out but didn’t feel as if he could retreat now.

Dour could only see as much. Were those their heads or their necks? If anything that was the most improbable question he could ask himself then. Not the pain he felt, as that was a constant, judging by the hits he had taken, he would rather be somewhere else.

‘My spine is tingling.’

‘It is being replaced for your own good.’

‘What did you say?’

Two blunt blade masters appeared out of nowhere, in time to pin him down. He was aware that it didn’t feel right and that he shouldn’t have been there. But this wasn’t what he felt. This derangement of nature, the way through which he shoved himself in the ground made him feel the pain eight fold higher. His every attempt ended up with him trashing his body in an attempt to bounce out of the trap.

‘We’re doing this for your own good, don’t try to resist, you’ll only make it much worse on yourself.’

‘Your head might not make it through the journey if you resist. Let go, for your own sake.’

A few set of words had been repeated in his head, yet he heard it right. “Let go.”

And I did. Dour thought. He no longer saw the dark, but a distance above him which lead wherever the tunnels made out of their pipes lead. It was a constant stream which followed through, that couldn’t have been displayed or named in his mind.

‘Will I ever return to my chamber?’

It was something he now desired more than anything in his life. Though it had been short live, he was made to feel as if he was there already, with no chance of return.

But he was there. He felt his body going through the automatic motions.

He had been brought to meet the others as well, now that he was allowed to see them face to face, he wondered where did this come from.

‘You’ve destroyed me. I thought that for a short period of time I would’ve been fine. I thought I would work well. But why? Why have you taken me here?’

Who asked you to do this?’

Out of the mist came a giant ant’s head, protruding out of the upper body of a hairless pigmented primate which opened the back of its torso to reveal a line of four ending pipes which didn’t connect to anything. They pumped up and down and before he could react to it, out of the ant’s mouth came a much wider pipe which threw a jet of hot boiling water.

From each drop which fell below, the manifestation of a small ant’s head came. It grew and bounced against the walls until it had been received. Was there someone down there as well? He couldn’t tell, but it was nasty either way.

‘I will have my answers now.’

‘You have no leg to stand on.’

Said the first master.

‘I’m O’Darhmk, cutter and bringer of fluids. I am not one of the lowly scum you met below, for I am responsible with defending the great receiver below, making sure he well fed, so that he may grow and extend out of his vile cage.’

‘Where do I fit in all of this?’

‘You’ve been drawn from your prison.’

He used one of the pipes to stroke his large and tainted beard before he came back to what he was on.

‘Your chamber, because you are in a similar condition with our great succumbed, who shall be fed until he extends his slumporous body, his vilest flaccid neck and legs until he will be freed.’

In there, he already tried to have himself snuck out of it. But he couldn’t fit through the bars, nor would he be able to get through the arrival of the greater practionerrs of tingling defiance.

‘We are counting on your presence here that he may no longer be plagued by this great depression which may cast him into a long-coming hibernation. That threat alone will send him into a never-ending, gouging wait, from which he may never awake.

And it is because of him that we are simply allowed refuge and existence, without the like, we may never be alive.

He is the source of power, he is the source of the tiny bacterial beings which rest between the gaps of each pipe which connects our bodies and our heads. They are communicating and exchanging fluids between one another, bringing us the satisfaction of breathing and living.’

A constant nod came between them, as the others emerged. Learning that there wasn’t a single master or comer that didn’t bear some kind of deformity to him wasn’t easy. It made him stare at the stuff of dreams which stood before him. They could at least make an effort to show an interest towards him. He was letting them know that he was leaving now.

‘You won’t stop me, you know?’

These threats of yours have no effect on me.

‘Now why are you trying to make your life much worse than it has to be?’

‘I cannot help it, there’s something down there I need to see.’

Which brought his attention to a revelation he hadn’t even been aware of until the time being, where had the room disappeared? That flash of many plucks of dark which surrounded him there? It wasn’t there any longer and he couldn’t help it if he tried getting somewhere near it.

‘Now I see, I think I have seen you somewhere before.’

‘Where would that be?’

‘Right before my curtain of dark, when I had been locked from being able to stare around me, you were the heads which tried getting my attention.

You knew that I was blind.’

‘That’s obvious enough. Have you not a single sense in your mind. Do you think we have sent our minions to bring you here by chance?’

‘Yes, you have. It’s all a lie to make me work for you, isn’t it?’

‘Who dare accuse us of fouler and diseased words? Newcomer, you should watch your words when you’re round your betters, or we may actually do something to actually harm you, permanently.’

‘No you will not, you still need me. I’ve got something the others don’t have. I think I know it now. There’s no soul, you simply saw one of the intelligent ones down there and decided I was to be brought in, haven’t you?’

If it hadn’t been clear by now, he was supposed to be one of the prized slaves. One of the conquered minds of the chamber, which was thorough enough as it was.

‘Fine, every single one of us has went through those trials of the chamber until we’ve proven ourselves to be worthy of it.’

‘Worthy of what? Being slaves? This isn’t why I came here for, my reasons for coming here was an escape. I needed a way out, a way to get through, and a way to.’

‘Stop it already, you can’t feel it now but you’re made of flesh. Neither of your devices are here.’

‘I know that, but, wait, I thought there was no soul, or there was one.’

‘You’re breaking apart. Here’s what you need to know. This head and mind had always been irrelevant, the consciousness has always been in the body, though it may have escaped with a few of its organs through the head, this unit is the maker of your brain.

Without it, you’re nothing but a dumb creature, doomed to end up in the pile of trash with the other mindless ones.’

It came to that, hadn’t it? One plug which managed to carry itself to the point where it went through his head. But was it even a plug or a piece of him which moved slower than the rest of them?

‘Enough with the discussion, the next day of work beings, return now.’

To it they went, back at slashing their atrocious arrogances. Around the dojo he had seen the red cuts being spread around the ceiling. Neither of them had any importance. Less decorated than it had been, the wooden bars which made the fire pit sprang into life.

‘Flames are spreading, quick, get to the.’

His head was on top of the sky, serving as nothing but a gateway to the impulses of the body. Dour found out that at times he wasn’t the one speaking but acted as the mere receptor.

‘I cannot live this way. This is much worse than anything I’ve ever encountered.’

‘If you think so, why don’t you recede another lever and see what’s there?’

A myriad of laughter came after him. Of course he wouldn’t be allowed to misbehave. That had been it, the disgrace and appliance of utility he had shown them, as it ended there. Dour had been curious about it, enough that he would want to find out a way or another. He couldn’t be called into action any longer, as he ended up being disabled by the sight. While entering the small window which lay open through the wall of pipes, he came to the disillusion that he was followed then. What were they doing there exactly? He could only feel the scent of burning coming from the various pipes which had been there.

It was immeasurably easier to stand now. His neck jolted into a simple stand which allowed for a much easier way of sitting.

‘I can finally stand and pay a break. I needed this.’

But it was insurmountable, the plain visit into their factory of pies. He saw now what they were doing, the simple amount of cruelty which was spread across the span of a few moments. They were breaking animals apart for now, entitled to what came out of them. A constantly enlarging gap kept moving through the system, to the point where it couldn’t be stopped.

Beneath the edge where the separation of the hole he had come from and the gap, there appeared to be a row which picked up the remains, pulling them in. Only a few deranged watchers stood from side to side, who had come to notice him standing there as a new comer.

‘Hey you, come here now, come here already. We’re waiting for you so don’t keep us standing.’

Each of the few meters he underwent made him feel lighter and more vulgar. Motions appeared in the stretch of the neck which weren’t his. It was a pair of seconds in which he felt like come forth.

‘Now, why are you standing here? Neither of you looks the type who’d enjoy torture.’

‘Is it because we look like you? Is that why? Frankly, I don’t see any resemblance between the two of us at all. Look closer at them.’

I turned and saw these animals in their fleeing nature. Their bodies had been sharpened at their backs. Tails were only ligaments which popped out beneath their jaws as they bore some of the touch of gravediggers. Musky bat hair appeared on a tame dog’s back and if it weren’t for him to point it out, he wouldn’t have seen its mouth extending through its stomach.

So many teeth were pulled inside the pipes that he had forgotten what it felt like.

‘I am appalled, why am I here? Am I simply supposed to take something from this?’

‘Were you sent here? I thought you were here for the show.’

Answered the mechanical figure behind the prodding white-rabbit mask, which had actual spiked needles coming out of his mouth constantly. He could a few holes at the back of his head, throwing a few ghastly flat sheets of air that they gave the appearance that one might simply get a paper cut from merely coming into contact with it.

‘Are we indisposed now? Why, since you’re here, take a seat.’

In some insignificant yet ingenious way, they had made themselves tiny baskets in which they rested. The addition of butchered sacrificial pieces with all of their liquids included which came from one of the open pipes made it so they would feel nothing less but comfort underneath their beds.

‘For how long have you been staying here?’

‘Years, why are you bothered now? Since our bodies do most of the work, we have no other reason to work up here. These are mere child’s play compared with what the others are into, if you were to dwell deeper, that is.’

‘Down there or above?’

‘It’s irrelevant which path you take, they both lead towards the same old spectacle.’

‘But it’s dark there, I won’t be able to see a thing. What if I hit myself against the surroundings?’

‘There’s no reason to believe that you might. The pipes are aware of one another, or, the bacteria, as the ones above say. That alone should force them to avoid one another for as long as it necessary for you to go on your way.’

It was tempting, more so that he could imagine.

‘Will I be able to return if I got ahead and head up there?’

‘Only if you want to, but be weary, there’s nothing worse than a mind chase, tattle tale eraser, one who speaks about and backstabs his brothers.

We are brothers now, up from the soles of our necks. Remember than while you’re out there and don’t tell them you were sent by us.’

‘I understand. But it isn’t right of you to assume I would. It’s not like you’re worth the trust by any means. Look around at what you’re doing and what you’re watching.’

‘And?’

‘You ought to be ashamed of yourselves for trying to take advantage over them.’

‘Leave then, if you’re not pleased by what you’re seeing, we shouldn’t pretend we’re entertained by what we’re hearing.’

‘Hear, hear.’

Hear she went, another rascal to amend for its sins. They threw her body in the piled, the pies blew hot air, crushing her against the ceiling and as it had, he went away, in fear that hey may be looked after his retreat. What he had achieved from it was nothing but a bitter laughter, the echo from behind which shoved itself down the gutter.

‘I won’t listen to them, I have to see it for myself.’

They would be laughing at him after he found out that the two ways head lead to the same damned place. It didn't turn into a head end, but it looked as if he couldn't return if he wanted to. Otherwise, he'd be as indisposed to look at the others.

Cat heads, so many cat heads. He was taunted by them.

'What are you looking for?'

Out of the dark came the cats. Those feline assailants revealed their glowing eyes to him, as they bounced their lights off upon the return. 'Brave is the soul, give us a heart, that's the only way we may allow you to set forth.'

'I wasn't told there'd be a fee for entry.'

'Of course you weren't. No one tells them there's a fee, it's part of the deal.'

'Part of the clueless hue they're all sent to. Now return, grab a heart and come back here once you're done fetching it to us.'

'What are your intentions with it? I can't be bothered by this. I couldn't grab it either. Yes, that is right, I don't have any arms.'

'There's your mouth.'

'And a prettily little pesky mouth at that, big lipped I see, that will come in handy.'

'His teeth are frail but near-white. How could that be?'

'Enough, you dirt cats, I don't even know why I came here to begin with but it was certainly not because I wanted to be mocked.'

'Then please yourself with waiting. No heart, no entry.'

I had been met by this rejection with nothing short of the unnatural gaze and the annoyance of waiting. Fine, they wanted a heart, they will get their heart. Even if I would have to be met by the annoyance which lay in meeting them again.

'So soon, already? Were you not pleased by what you saw? Perhaps you needed to take a breath from being completely overwhelmed by it?'

'That's not why I came here and I think you know what I need.'

This pretty faced cluster of faces turned to him now.

‘You are disturbing the watch of our most favorite part. This is when they’re dropping all the bodies and shoving them up and down into a wind tunnel. Look, they’re already going at it.’

Some wind traps had been set in the air, which rolled the bodies into them, promoting some kind of deep embedded laceration which happened inside of them, constantly, battering everything which would even be remotely whole.

From that lot he could see not a single heart, nor anything which may even be remotely close to a functioning organ. But what if there was another way?

Dour noticed that their beds had been raised high by now. They weren’t sitting in puddles but on thrones made out of entirely fully filled organs which they had misappropriated from their surroundings. One would have to be careful not to disturb what was going on there. Especially since they grew connections now, which threatened the viral bacterial forming esophagus which happened there.

Why, some pipes even formed ribs around theirs thrones in front of his eyes. They were standing like people, long legged, open armed, outstretched, and bored.

‘Why did you come here for? Oh, was it one of these? I don’t believe you said anything about it yet, but I suppose that since you’re staring so profoundly at it, I could only come to the conclusion that you truly want it, more than anything in the world.’

‘I do want it, please, give it to me.’

‘Not so fast.’

As quickly as he drew a set of pipes from around his organs, he revealed a stranger lock inside. Pulling his heart out wasn’t going to be easy at all, why, it would be rather dangerously close to the work of a simple yet significant surgeon. They were at work now, still watching him, merely being distracted for one second as they turned.

‘We missed it, the show is over, and we missed the greatest part of it. How could you do such a thing to us after everything we’ve done?’

It was because of us that you got there and this is how you’re thanking us? Pitiful, disgraceful, shame on you, we need to send you back.’

‘Back there? But I won’t be allowed to go there without a heart.’

‘Not there, you buffoon, back up there to the task masters.’

‘Task masters? I thought they were blade masters.’

‘Should we be getting into this now? Isn’t he, shouldn’t he simply return to what he should be doing now?’

‘Which is?’

‘Paying for what he took from us, Kahrn. Our time and the joy of seeing the favorite side of the show unfold in front of our eyes.’

‘Wait, what if we borrow this organ to her? What have we to lose from it?’

‘Knife thrower, knife thrower, beware of him, split!’

They straddled themselves in attempts to get away. He had come out of nowhere, in their peculiar attempt to make up for the sense of a mortician’s extraction. They couldn’t see him but they saw the knives being thrown from a dark corner.

Bodies danced the organs below stopped pushing their mad tunes and now, they couldn’t help it but shout.

‘Beware of it, the knife strikes and never takes back what it leaves. Let me breathe through it, let me get away, I cannot help it if this misery takes my heart away.’

One knife had obtruded the sight and blaster through the pipe armor, revealing his indecent armor. Pesticides started being released in order to reduce the damage and kill the insect skin which had spread on top of his organs. But it had been, in that moment, dreadful to tread in the dark. As the man named Dour came out of nowhere and pinned the heart to his teeth, pulling it away, whilst drawing no attention.

‘What have you done to us?’

The pipes activated and they found themselves trying to get as far away as possible before the organs would sign again. But their bodies were heavy and they could barely be held.

‘Release everything before we get trapped and killed.’

Each of them screwed and scarred away, trying not to be caught by the malign and the woe, the interest in the unknown fading as fast as it would be. It wasn’t clear, as for the dear sight of the poor Dour, faded from sight. He couldn’t focus on them any longer, especially since he had attained what he had looked for.

‘Time to earn my entry.’

He muttered from the heart’s play, while the others had gotten away. Not they would not be able to make use of those bodies they had gotten for themselves, as they got completely stamped out of existence.

‘Please remove this from my sight. I cannot dare look at the play any longer, my body had been stolen from me and it’s all because of them.’

‘Was it someone in his employ? How did so many knives got here to begin with?’

‘It’s irrelevant, look down there. Do you see something missing? That is your answer, and that is the reason we may take our revenge.’

Damned be the path ahead, for no longer had it been dark. Curtains drawn, red of hawk fell through the ceiling and unto them came the desire to bash this squire and kill him for his false attempt.

Of course the various other watchers only laughed and shamed them, as they grew so arrogant and useless despite their builds of meat.

‘Shall I do the honor?’

‘We shall each proceed into taking a knife of our own. Afterwards, we’ll cut him, strain him, destroy his bacteria and let him rot there. ‘

But the cats were pleased, feline of two kinds every sight appeared in a wet look of white and black, red, green eyes, fashionable and even plastic. They even had fakes it seemed, but plenty of them looked genuine enough.

‘So, I have come, stolen from my woe, please let me know if it’s a fair trade.’

‘Banished, I say, you traitorous scoundrel, you’ve committed the highest sin. Instead of eating and even sharing, you’ve attempted to show our prey inside your pipe. That is highly unacceptable. You body shall not be traded with.

You shall remain and keep the same body in the dumpster. Rot there, see if I’m bothered enough to care.’

They dismissed one of their own, who had committed an act of body-fraud. Mistreated or not, that had been less important than what they were expecting.

‘This is what I was expecting, good news, after all. What did they ask of you for that? Was it a dance, was it an opening inside your...?’

‘I’ve taken this from them, by chance, or accident.’

Said Dour, shaven of being tracked. Thinking themselves mightily clever, they had made a lot of grunts as they followed.

And each of the felines had become as estranged from courage as they saw the light and the limitless abandonment of a way of hiding as it appeared.

‘Give this to me and come in, behave not a moment’s notice.’

An intermission had been revealed in time for him to enter and strap himself as quickly as he could. Though he might have been of a single cloth, a bitter tooth, an ache, he entered the frail coronary place and stood there, on top of their tongues.

As the walls closed, he entered in time to hear the sounds of blades dangling against the metal rail, signaling that he had escaped in the brick of a stone tattle. It would be obvious now that this wasn't what he had anticipated.

'He went in, you know we won't get him now.'

'Very well, let them play with their new toy, he's as useless to us as are you. Come now, let's make haste into the fray and let us kill everyone else.'

Honor dictated that at least one of them would out himself as the knife thrower. Otherwise, they would butcher them all, leaving no one alive. This had to be it. It would be the only way for them to start on a cleaner shade.

But him, who had entered this strange palace of licking cats had looked down to see that they had been perforated themselves. Desecrated even, as it became obvious that at one end of their tongues there were some metal bindings which went down into their throats, holding the organic matter of large pink by four partially destroyed dark-iron nuts which held a screw together which had worked its way through them.

Now the light changed from red and yellow to a constant pink. One eight of a cat came in to greet him. Over it head, there was an inclusion of its teeth, paws and a single tail which dangled by the side. He was welcomed there, but not trusted.

'For safety measurements, if you don't mind, I'll have to check you.'

'How? Wait, not so fast now, I'm still trying to shake myself off.'

The cat drew in and licked him over the face once, with a circular motion which covered his entire cheek. Afterwards, one single bite took everything which was needed, so much so she could make a good impression. He didn't retaliate. Dour tried pulling himself away a few centimeters.

What he had been looking at now was the system beneath him, between and under those heads there were gaps large enough for the pies to go in and wander around in every place one could see.

'Follow me now, we're about to greet our leader, Crackle.'

They entered through the stool of many extended yarn balls. It was safe to say that he couldn't stomach looking for too long at it. As the smell pushed through his nostrils, he had figured it was enough. Even there, he would be constantly looked at and followed, so they could make sure nothing would be broken or taken by him.

‘Why are so many of you trying to follow me? I don’t understand it. I’m trying to fancy myself a reason for which I was sent here.’

‘He doesn’t know.’

‘No, he doesn’t know.’

‘Not at all.’

Laughed the cats, prizing themselves with a few yarns, those stomach grinders and a few other objects of their choosing, which were not supposed to be in their reach either? His hairs rose as he saw the knives in their mouths. Now it all made sense, how many of them were there. This wasn’t a mistake, he was supposed to be there, as a guest, by their invitation or that of Crackle.

‘Well you didn’t think those knives manifested themselves out of nowhere, have you? And what reason would there be for anyone to even wager helping you?

If you haven’t noticed yet, everyone out there is only looking for themselves, nothing more. So come on and join us, we’ll do take care of you in time.’

‘As our little pet, that is. You would make a fine servant, bearer, holder, hold the bottles.’

For as far as he could look at it, he had been treated not like an outcast but someone who couldn’t pay any attention to his surrounding, a confused runt who woke up snapped at the neck. Dour felt like a bottle cap, now turned over his head, with the bottom of his neck being used for storage.

‘See? I told you he had a stopping rail there. Someone put it there to make sure they’re not communicating with him. They are fond of him.’

‘And for that alone we shall keep you, stranger.’

‘Dour, call me Dour, but please.’

‘No, we’ll call you Hour, for that’s the amount of time we’ll need to figure out whether or not you’re worth keeping.

Or him, our master, Crackle, behold.’

The dark no longer lingered in his hall, in the presence, this apparition of feline magnificence which had rejected its body and wasn’t in any need of pipes or organs to hold him there, floating in the air with the help of the gusts it produces from beneath it. From the look which had been pulled out of his servants eyes which made the entirety of the room now, completely covering the entire sight of the pipes, he looked like a face of plastic.

A toy for them to stare but never to touch. It would be a sacrilege, an insult, to know that neither of them could own this Crackle, their worth and their need to feel something at all.

If they had tails and butts, or if they were there, above with them, they would lift them up.

‘Bring in the mice, let the stranger know something of my power.’

The ceiling broke and it revealed an empty mass, a standing round region filled with lunatics, beaten mice which were stuck in the wind-tunnels, falling now in expectation of the feeding frenzy. Their mice-wings stopped working since they had been cut off partially, feeding in their wild fear as they were caught by the cats.

Each motion felt as if they shot and propelled their heads at the falling rodents, eating and turning the room into a feast.

‘Watch it, don’t take any move, Hour, you’re not allowed to leave until your time’s up.’

Four guards stood not too far from him. They were the ones which had been the most threatening out of them all, being the ones bearing, if not playing with their knives in an attempt to show off.

Some mastery had been achieved there, and at time it felt like they simply disappeared, only to come out from inside their mouths, acting violently as they tried to dominate his very thought of getting away.

‘I’ll stay, and for that you’ll have my word. But don’t threaten me or the only thing you’ll have to show your big headed cat will be a porcupine’s spire.’

Every mouth which had been agape suddenly closed, as well as to be in unison with the very top of the ceiling. It wasn’t even as notoriously interesting as one would have to care for it.

But he was too assertive for his own good, and now, he had come under his direct attention.

‘Well, well, I see that the little mouse has something to say.’

Below the rims, something had crawled inside his body. It didn’t feel like it was something good, but more likely a piece of unwanted turpentine-bolt, which was the worst kind of appliance which may find itself connected to his old body of metal.

He was losing too much ichor for his own good. ‘Do you not see how easily it is for us to mock you? One pull of my many laces and I’ll have you dancing like a puppet on a string.’

Since he had no control over what went through his body, Dour could only stare at how the ducts flew over his sight, making him withdraw from sight before he could step back into his performance.

He danced for them like a good slave who hadn't the least of an interest to show himself walking out.

A reminder to himself came as quickly as the reflection over their shiny silver spades fell to his peepers. Not until it's safe to go. Until then, make sure to draw them forth.

Forward a few footsteps away, until he found himself biting over one of the cats' ears off. They laughed and mewed as he took another, seeing it fall as soon as they could muster their laughter. Neither of them realized what he had done. This wasn't part of his play.

It had been the act of slaughter, after a hole expanded below him. He saw the cat bouncing against the pipes before having its head completely smashed.

And in that moment of feline rage, what remained of its head pushed forward into a whorl, forming what appeared to be a hatchet which spread around. It fed every cat there, bringing the rims of its many tinier blades in their mouths.

They drank and ate a combination of their lost sister and their tongue materials, until they drowned it in their throats. Inside of them they felt the bacteria emerge, bringing forth some ecstasy which could only come from this point on.

'What are you doing, you maniac?'

Even their cat-like noble began laughing and trashing as it came into fruition with its interest and false approach. Nothing more than tootle-play, he wanted to join, how hard it was for him to only watch.

Scarlet came in their eyes and it was time that they would feed him so that he would be alive for a short amount of time.

'Oh, Hour, you've given me the greatest gift of all, look at how I shall finally come forth.'

His hideous form emerged from inside, revealing the thing in which it hid as soon as he had been washed in their regurgitated bowels. It was frightening to look at that, bronze-like coating on top of its jutting cranial mass.

For a moment it had the appearance of a molten heap of rancid drums which pushed from every side, giving the head a constant appearance of juts and cuts, and many objects inside of it that tried getting out.

They each fought and gave the impression of ever-extending, held in only by a pelt which kept it from giving the magnificent rim of destruction its so thoroughly hope to release.

He knew them to be bellies, those drum-like projections, bellies which were full. It wanted to release them but it couldn't out of the fact that it hadn't arrived in this world wholly.

As the plastic was still in the midst of changing into the creature, almost in the form of some wild manifestation, which opened its sinister green spheres, were followed by a pair of fifty smaller maws which bloated tongued in the form of the umbilicus.

Many of its fangs turned completely soft and moist until they revealed vermin-like maggot semblance. It had been a spread of appendages which shot afterwards as they began yanking the tubes and breeding those proto-heads.

It had to adapt for this new world, henceforth it had crippled its own womb and reproductive system. This would be impossible to come in the natural sense, but inside of it rested an overweighed ovaloid crude member which had sunken to deep as to drag every other organ down, including the womb.

The body would be crushed by the very weight instilled by the member, to the point where it could suffer no less of it and the head of the offspring would be completely beheaded.

It was then that he had no means of survival, unless something had been employed. What appeared to be slender puncture-filling veins came into contact with those heads, sealing their ends and attempting to keep them alive while the division happened.

They would remain animated for long so that the crude magic figures could be instilled in it so it may live.

Afterwards they had been spat and floated, as if there had been no gravity. Some came out well, others went out in pieces, another sight he had realized.

‘All of you are cruel and mad. Either this side or the other treats meat as if it’s nothing. How many lives had to end this way?’

‘Settle down, they’re stillborns, they never suffered, they never will. Theirs is little more than a force to be settled with and defied.

Hour, hour, you wanted me to come into this world, why, you have done this on yourself.

Do you suppose now that you’re better than I? Because of what? If I do recall correctly though, my coming to form was the result of you killing one of our own. Why else would I be here?’

‘That was an accident, I didn’t mean it.’

He could feel himself spitting as a burst of the stored milk popped off and made him head pop on and off, on and off, up and down into a daze.

And the cats kept laughing as this, and their nobleman became Destrackle, lord of miss forgotten heads. None of them survived, he would not be getting more servants it appeared.

‘You’re making me blush. I haven’t had such a good laugh since I have been summoned into the realm of hunger.

There at least my children were put to a good use, but here, look, they’re eaten by my fat servants who serve no thank and give me nothing short but an unsatisfactory glance. I cannot help it if they’re indisposed.’

‘When am I to be release then? Surely you’re not planning on keeping me for more than an Hour, are you?’

‘Well that hasn’t been decided either, why would you be so fond of getting away?’

Something’s the matter with you, perhaps? Do you think there’s something better out there than our shows and plays? Who do you think provides them with all the guts?

It’s us, it’s always been us, without a doubt or a shimmer of concern, it’s been us from the stars and it’s never going to be anyone else. We’re going to dig up a grave for you to submerge in, worry not for us, we’ll take you to your word and crush the sides of the pipes so you may never be able to get out again.’

‘Why is everyone trying to harm me, in some way, shape of form, I’ve been mistreated by you. I won’t be intimidated this time. I’ll stand my ground and leave.

Do not make me a part of it or I shall harm you much more than you’ll be able to bear.’

‘That’s supposed to be a threat? A laughing manner, that’s what it is, you’re a scared little cat now, you may not be able to see it now, but within the hour, you’ll have become one of us. No longer will there be a need for your head to strand on top of our bottles, we’ll simply replace it.

You’ll feel everything inside you start to pop maddeningly until one of our good spirits will start overcoming your face.’

‘You cannot force that unto me, I’d rather take my own life than that.’

‘And how would you do it exactly?’

With a snap, their cats each closed their mouths in order to hide their fangs. A pip of a sound came in unison as soon as they had been dispatched. No sharp knife in sight, he could simply walk off. But blasted be those damned doors, the more he focused on their red stare, the more he realized that there wasn’t any other way for him to set off the alarms which went inside his head.

Run, run, escape, but I cannot, I cannot, don’t make. I’ll be dead within the hour, whatever had been of Dour will have died. They haven’t realized yet, no, no, they haven’t. It was reassuring, now of all reason that he could touch himself and feel the pull around his chest. It would be over soon, if only he knew.

The other masters couldn't stop me and it only came to him that he was aware, of so much more aware that there wasn't any other way out.

'You don't get it yet, do you? I'm not going to bash my head until I'm dead, I won't attempt to crush it by any means. Instead of doing that, I'll take one of the blades and cut myself with it. That's my only true intention. Without it, I know that I may be trapped here as your petty toy, or woodcut.

It will hurt me more than it will hurt you.'

'Be reasonable now, you were given an hour and a fair treatment, what else do you want? A place amongst us, a set of power perhaps?

Pfff, do not take us for dogs. You were to stay here as a servant or as one of us, and you would throw that all away because of what?'

'Because I'm keep exchanging instead of finding a way out. Because you're making me feel as lonely as I was when I first woke up there, that's the reason why I cannot help it. I need to get away and see the world as a free bird, not as a trapped animal like you are.'

Insulting, wasn't it? Perhaps that strapping young blunting head could've jolted in a place or another. But so far, it served as a means for him to retract to his plastic form.

'Buffoons, you can all starve for now. I don't feel any more satisfaction gotten from my reveal. He gave it you, he took it away.'

And now the eyes all started at him with an unfathomable amount of dismay. In truth they showed their teeth and snarled at him.

They had this expectation for him to do it. If that's what they wanted him to do, then why not deliver?

The entry in his chest was painful, almost like that of a blow, the cut felt dizzyingly short, he was short of breathe in only a few moments. Only an image of them laughing at him remained ingrained in his mind. An unnecessary decision made him feel impatient. He didn't wake up in the chamber. He had been stored, grabbed, held, unable to comprehend that his sight and hearing had been disabled.

Perhaps it was his metal body, perhaps it had been the fact that he no longer possessed something close to being penetrable. But that hadn't stopped him from trying and attempting, to see those red sparks appear in front of his face. They made him want to end it because he felt his face being licked.

Nasty animals, nasty cats, they had him for the hour. What had been worse was the fact that he wanted a way to take it now, the release.

Only this could free him from the torment he felt. But no, it wasn't meant to be.

'Why have you brought me back here?'

I want to be back in my room, I won't leave it any longer, I promise.

'You won't leave after the hour, you won't leave after the next hour. As a matter of fact, you'll stay here with us, not as our equal, not as our toy or servant or even trinket. Take him away now.'

The same way had been opened above them, where they stored their mice. I was to entertain them in the most despicable manner, which could not be accepted, I will not stay here and I shall not leave. Was that where he had to go? Would they mess with him even further?

He tried forcing himself through them, in that attempt to get through them. It failed, they were too many of them and each of them came together in a push which couldn't even last long enough for him to lose them. It was only by their fully-combined effort that he managed to end up there, above them, inside their mice-hole.

The pipes beneath him, afterwards closed, and so came his staying. It was hot in there, more than a few distasteful licks turned him on. They were there as well, always following, always watching. As soon as they opened their eyes, he saw them there, no longer in the view of the Crackle, but still there.

After their expression had changed, he knew that there wasn't any way to draw himself over. He could only try getting himself nearer to the edge by reminding himself that as soon as he did it, he had to wake up there. No longer did he aim for the chest, but raised his arms to aim for the joints where the constant stream of pipes started.

It would have to be a great slash, one which would make up for the upper top of the chest, right above the shoulders, which would release him from the upstanding stature he bore. He drew it forward and before they could leap and start gorging themselves on his face, it had been done. His life was taken, his sight drew to a closure and before he could rise up his eyes, he was back there.

The familiar place still reckoned a defeat. Both of the jailors waited for him, looking as far as they were before, with their stained shirts with which were recently touched. Handprint lay all over their bodies and only now they had been waiting.

But before they could enter and finish the job, he saw a piece of the ceiling being eaten by one of the cats. Had their size increased past any unfathomable level? It could only mean that there was a way through to go with it. He was forced back it and thrown up there, to rest with the mice. He noticed something missing.

'Where's my neck?'

'You're no longer in need of it, enjoy living the rest of your life as well as you can.'

‘They’re expecting a show, aren’t they? Let us give them what they want. A little bird told me that they’re still looking for a missing knife-thrower as well.’

Before her laughter could endure his passing, she threw it against his face, leaving a small cut which was very much likely to be that done on a human.

‘It hurts, this isn’t supposed to hurt.’

‘If you think this is pain, wait until you’ll get there.’

As the pipes began exchanging places, they would bring forth more of their own from below. It was inescapable. Unable to resist, he endured as his head ended up being bashed and abashed against the holes from which he came and against the bodies as well. He felt his face finally succumb to their play.

They witnessed and laughed, finally aware that what they’ve done had been planned all along.

‘His face fell off, look at him, no bones. He had the insides of a toy octopus, fellows. It looks off, it’s wrong, come and see. Come and see.’

‘Serves you right, knife thrower, I know for a fact that it was you. Was it not him? Have I not told you of it?’

‘You have, you most certainly have, this wasn’t a mistake at all.’

Gritty and perturbed, they show their true faces and how petty they were, bodies of animals on pipe necks and shallow heads. All of the added together to an unfathomable last sight, which nursed itself as quickly as it began. By his likes, he would be aware, if they were there, they’d strap one another a second verse, to cope with the lepers they became. Once the parts started rejecting one another, after he’d added to them, Dour never found a way from the insides of his head to reattach themselves again.

No more memories, not a soul, this one had been foul. But his body continued nonetheless, no longer punished by the disease of seeing what lay around him. Armed with a blade, he turned from those wooden dummies, turning towards the masters. They were stricken down before they had the chance to fight back.

‘Settle down now, Dour, there’s no need for you to strike us down. We only meant for you to see the other side, where the scum hides. That wasn’t us, Dour, it wasn’t our intention.’

But they could not be interested any less that what they had been then. In a quickened pace, they found themselves out running through the dojo, taken down by his insurmountable might. One blade made another but the strength was simply too much for one of them to take alone. They came and attempted to restrain him again, but he turned and grabbed the end of the pipe and ripped it off. As the connection broke, the master fell flat on his back and never got back up.

Without an end to his body, the entire system of pipes which continued to the top of the sky would start floating and getting away. It looked like spatial worm-trap which refused to let go. As the bacteria felt more and more of their precious meat-resource give in, the metal encasing everything started disappearing. Instead of it, the accumulation of rust had prevented a proper devastation from going forward. They could've completely turned it in their malign bacterium breeding box, which would eventually shrink in size to inexistence.

But the various rust fragments prevented the particles of bacterium from ever shrinking, instead, they'd freeze as soon as they entered space, as a partially eaten trap in which they would lay forever. The top of the dojo had been taken by them with the rest of the trapped masters. Feverishly drought, Dour had been brought to wander out there, on steps across a stony reed he didn't knock, which he could barely feel for himself.

It felt unnerving, to be there at such and hour, while feeling them, the exasperated changeling-master who had become his slaves. Despite not living, he felt bodies crawl and grabbing his ankles in a pathetic attempt to get him to save them.

'Save us from this, we can still have a chance to live through this.'

But instead of speaking they threw their bile out of their necks.

A sequence of requests came from him, as soon as he turned. His head was there, it had to be in the chamber from which he left. In it, the Body of Dour, BOD saw a multitude of his faces being lain, stored by the others. There were so many units which saved his humane body but neither of them had been made in the same manner as he was. It was near perfection, a disturbing look of what should've been if the ones breathing were replaced by working intelligence which never needed to take a break.

Sooner or later, the muscles gave in and the servants couldn't push themselves farther nor fight against him. Then, he turned and used his blade to end each one of them. It wasn't a question of whether or not there had been the servitude of a storm, but the filth to which they growled. It was unheard off, especially since it wasn't intended for them to grow there.

But at least it happened after he left. A few pieces of the bacteria crawled and survived outside their zone of power. From what could be told, they had made good use of the few ones who had been butchered there, which spread their newly formed large body of veins in the air, starting the whole new process again.

'Where are you? Where should I find you?'

Taken from our chamber, thrown out there, murdered too many times to count and now, I'm the one who had been cursed.'

Battered me good, he thought, or batter me no more. Scars lay across his body but they couldn't be taken care off nor polished. It was disturbing that they were there. Fake copies, so many Dour, too many too count, so much so that they each spoke and adopted their own variants of their names.

'Lower.'

'Cower.'

'Tour.'

'Nour.'

'Power.'

'Lour.'

The list went on, they couldn't help themselves there, but the watchers were gone. Now they rolled, unable to help themselves but listen to that old fool who was there.

Dour, the real one appeared and looked at each of them, listening for as long as he needed to make his decision.

'I am the scum-lord, killer of many snails. I've killed millions of them, yes, I have. Lour the slayers of salty parasites.'

Cower, the one head which had been almost split in half by the constant pressure which came from below the grits of the hole. A few rolls made it get away from the others. It was his time to shine.

'I will find what I'm looking for, where is it? Where are you little dove of iron?'

He looked for her but couldn't see it. That had to be the strangest exit he might've stumbled on. After going by the entrance, he looked at the false engines which lay in a disturbed manner. They were placed next to one another, making their customary sounds.

They were moving, on their way towards the greater fables. Where reality appeared to have twisted itself in a most repulsive manner.

'You may follow me now, come, this is the promise I can handle onto you. As long as you'll become one of my followers, I shall one day give you everything you see beneath my shoulders.'

A unit spoke to it and came to ate accepting woe. Both would deal together, unable to comprehend the images which came from the wires. Societies had been disabled. Thoroughly disabled. This vision hadn't been a lie, but a remnant of what the over-indulgence of BOD had resulted in.

They were crippled mentally and sterile, every single one of them, out there. Planted inside objects, displaced into walls, or into the ground, but one thing remained closely in shock. Those tubes which were still in their chests made them appear like they were still moving on.

‘I think I can hear Georgia calling. Oh, sweet Georgia, where are you? I’ve missing watching your plains and going on past them, running with your coyotes, falling in love once more.’

‘Shut your filthy mouth, you stupid ungrateful wife, I’m trying my best to redecorate the carpets inside our house. Show me some damn respect.’

Her husband yelled. That was Anthony Du’ Becson. Anthony appeared to be spreading pieces of frozen resources taken from the pig den. How many workers went to the pig-den now? A hundred, a thousand? Millions? It couldn’t be pinpointed now but the pigs-dens were full and filled with solid pieces of the pigs in their leviathan forms. It looked like they grew like giant planes and pushed through their bodies until they became dead again.

At the top, or the front, depending on the position, one could see their giant widening smiles and realize that they would push solemnly until there would be the time to stretch the effigies left by the other animals. Far behind the time, during some time when the pigeons had been filled with chickens and other livestock, they had started dying out.

They rejected the gift of disease brought by the leviathanism.

Anthony had cut a piece of a pig from the pig den and made his paint out of it. Various amounts of it turned out to be standing and forming various mountainous forms which only spread and showed themselves to carry the essence of the pigs. For that he gave to gluttony, surrendering himself to the lust of eating.

‘I want to be happy again. I was given the right instructions on how to make my own meat-making machines.’

‘But you told me you would re-decorate the house, Anthony, you couldn’t have lied to me, could you?’

‘No, I couldn’t have. That was. You know what? You are degenerate and I owe you no explanation. Rot in there if you have to, I’ll make my meat-maker and share none of it with you.

This, this, this and that, always. I have to hear your excruciating voice yelling and shouting about what’s wrong with me or the house or anything around it.

Leave then, if you don’t like what I’m doing here, leave it. ‘

‘Anthony, I can’t. I’m stuck in here and you’re ruining our house. I can see it spreading across my part, they’ll reach me and I cannot deal with this growing on me.’

Her clothes had already been given the look they had carved for. Pig heads and the remains of long misused sheep and chicken parts appeared at well. The butcher's strike it appeared, the two men managed to do it again.

Even then, no longer preoccupied with trapping Dour inside his chamber, they had managed to screw the system into place. It was a despot's remains, the kind of which made him remind himself that he would never suffer being out there again.

But the animals laughed and showed joy because they lusted for her, they lusted being on her there, and inside, through the long tube, which had made her walk. So many traps had been laid for them, that it had been disabling quaint to think of them again.

'Now, now, my dear, once I'm done assembling everything and once I'll have served myself some ribs, then I shall consider whether or not I'll want to release you from it. Wonder less about it, and think of it like this. I want you to be mine for one last meal.'

But both of them were abandoned for this was not meant to be a tiny spreading corvette. Each broken piece taken from a body affected by leviathanism had the ability to regrow its body entirely, as long as it would be affected by the right conditions. And those were there, desire, lust and warmth, which spread around. They fed one another and gave birth to a myriad of wonder and of culminating agony.

Neither of them managed to escape as they had been absorbed by the leviathan, again and again, until several houses had fallen prey to them. Skies rang dark, with a collared sun which had no more of an intention to be there. No one else had. It felt maddening to look at what happened out there, but Cower accepted and followed in the footsteps of his noble tall standing unit.

'I will be granted that eventually, if I behave.'

'That you will, as long as you follow in my footsteps and carry on with my plans.'

They were met by the brigadiers, who greeted them. They had been kept to a minimum kind of exercise which kept them rather suspiciously unaware of the bugchasers on board. Most of them were bringing all kinds of diseases and infections like the disturbed flea-bitten, body-ridden degenerates they were. In some way, it could be contested. Starting from their upper bodies, it looked like they wore some kind of plague masks which wasn't the case.

For one, they leathery-appearance only made it so they looked like masks when in reality, those were their corrupted faces, which only lead to the point of them not being able to contend with one another over the face that the plagues they were carrying were eating all of them alive.

'Won't I get infected if I spent too much time near them?'

‘Will you? I do not know, but we’re both made of the same stuff and I believe I spent enough time here to know that I would never do that. Never.’

One piece of the beak fell off. The rest of the body of one of the passengers completely disintegrated itself. The passengers were much more distinguishable from the brigadiers. It was their uniforms, which had some exoskeletons which kept their bodies in check. As it was the most distinguishable feature they had for themselves.

It was bizarre how to act in accordance with their ranks. Civilians were rather neutral, or passive to the fact that members of their own group, wherever they were taken from, died in front of their eyes, while the brigadiers had been put on edge. That nasty sight had only served as some way to push through the various accommodation changed, to spare them from ever risking falling into contact with the plague-dust released from death.

Their alteration made to the chairs made it so they could create pseudo-breathing devices which went through the floor and out of the flying devices. In more than a few cases, it seemed like their chairs had almost completely encompassed their bodies, for the sole need of cushioning the forceful impact which were gathered after each strike inside their bodies.

That’s how they suspected that the plague-dust came into contact with them. Shards of bones affected by them would leave the entirety of the mass and bounced through the muscle layers until enough damage had been done that the risk of internal bleeding would be increased by a ten fold. This process would repeat itself several times until the entirety of the body became a corpulent mass of self-destructive components which eventually gave into the final decomposition such as the one which Cower had observed.

‘Will you step down now? And lower your head, he’s a distracting little junt.’

‘I will once the ship leave, please do not anger it. If you do, I won’t be able to restrain it any longer and you will have something much greater to fear than a pair of tiny sparks and plague marks.’

Holes inside their chests, that’s how they spoke. It was strange, seeing those extending like a trail, almost obscured by their clothes or in the other cases the body armor. But these creatures with their strange customs began showing interest as soon as they had left the ground. As soon as the ship kicked in its engines, they pulled out their arms further, revealing their wings, and strapped stings. Large digging nails pushed onward, trying not break anything as they began speaking of the ill.

‘Stay away, flying Ostroght, stay away.’

‘He will follow us and eat the ship, stay away, Ostroght, do not come near.’

‘We fear you, Ostroght, don’t come near, don’t come near.’

‘You’re ours and we are yours, Ostroght.’

The voices fell, you couldn't tell their voices apart, other than the snicky, snarky voice of doom, the floating gloom which fell as soon as from the sky, the well had disemboweled itself from the grander societies and the floating repositories where Leviathans were bred for another purpose than that of fornication.

'Who's Ostroght?'

'Don't bother with them, young Cower, I believe it's one of their gods. Ostroght is kind of a guardian Leviathan they said he grew not as a pig or an animal, but a deity who looks exactly like them.'

Everyone else other than the few civilians who were busy saying their prayers look in admonishment at them. It was as clear as one could tell that they weren't entirely sure on themselves, whether or not he would deliver them from the wicked ways in which they fell.

Carrion, one of their own appeared and joined Cower.

'Do you truly want to know why they put their fate in some vague and obscure legend now?'

I could not help it but nod, I was the king after all, and a king had to be listened to and answered when he asked. The court servant arrived in time for me to ask.

'I want to know? Why do they have faith in him?'

'The sole reason is simple, my dear lord.'

The last part was added in his mind, it was a slip which made him feel much better about distinguishing the others.

'We weren't always this way, we haven't always carried the plagues with us, no virus, no an infection. In the long days of winter we lived on the stacked supplies carried from the fields. During summers, we worked and we lived with out neighbors.'

Tall headed, two legged, armless contenders, a rival race which showed itself like some devouring pack of contenders bred for the sole reason of fight. And fighting they had, for their strength and speed made them an unbearable thing, going through the various mountains holes and packing throngs to steal from us. To crush us and our children from their cradling boards, it was a cruel thing, these expressionless bodies that looked like they were made of wires, which they themselves were barely attached, of filled in gaps which didn't belong there.

'Their methods of fighting were uneven, some might even say we had a chance to repel them. But that's happened so long ago, when we were peaceful and we knew ourselves better than anyone else. It should come as no surprise now, this illusion of clarity, because we, as much as we pride ourselves as the Carrion people, were ignorant of our ways and theirs.'

We made no distinction between savage and the innocent some displayed.'

'So you did fight back?'

'Eventually we had, but that's the turning point when we no longer were right. It wasn't by our choice alone to become that, what we are now. It was a mistake carried by mistake, carried by a mistake and mistake no longer shall be made. We cursed ourselves by lying with our kin who had been used and spoiled.'

'By whom?'

'By the invaders, they came during the night and used our women for their own pleasure and delight. It got worse than that, as soon as we defiled our women, as we poisoned our ranks because of them, spreading them like flies, only to understand after we became infected, that there wasn't a way out then.'

It backfired, their wickedness backfired in such a way that not only had they become in some way immune, but they also imbued their viruses as soon as they had exchanged hosts and spread. 'We were pleased by this gift of theirs, whether or not it had been intended. It changed us from the sloppy creatures we were into greater fiends, the likes of which we could never have become on our own.'

We lacked in the hives and so we turned it into our own. As soon as we have made a few generations afterwards, we started carrying termites inside of us so we could feed and ease the passing into the cruder younglings. Some didn't pass the birth process, if that's what it could be called. A strange side effect of the ingested virus was some kind of release of the uterus which would start going off on its own, being freed from the womb, whilst left to fend for itself.

'Going back a long time ago makes one realize that we changed so much so that we could not call ourselves right any longer. All of us had been broken one way or another by the changes, generation after generation of specifically carried traits which shouldn't have belonged to us. Longer beaks, smaller ones, lighter or darker skins, mind disease and the like, we knew that we would be doomed eventually but never had our ancestors expected it to reach this far.'

Our ancestors faced the invaders on their own grounds, doing nothing but shoveling them, time after time, not by force but by a myriad of other weeping tricks, and whiffs of blood-spilled spits which infested every single one of them as soon as they had entered into contact with their enraging concoctions. But our war had yearned no satisfaction from it that had been it.

'We were cursed, as soon as we started eating them and finally absorbing the rest of their females in.'

'You don't mean to say you?'

'That act of pettiness, of us getting back servers as a reminder of the fact that we may never truly get rid of this grand vileness for as long as we continue living. If it were for honesty to be called into question, you'd know that there's no hope for future.'

Which brings us to my final point, the deceivery they so-much-so desire to know off. It's gone too far and I'm afraid that they're past the point where they may go back to their ways.

They claim they had seen him, a leviathan who had been born by us, but whom had retained the traits we had been shown in carvings and in ancient paintings left by our old. Know that without them, we would've never found out what happened, and we could never have tried to learn from our mistakes.'

Cower could only bounce in his condition, turning inwardly at that. He looked at how desperate they were to get another word in, another chant, at the very doubtful lack of interest displayed by the creeping brigadiers who could not take it.

'Silence, silence yourselves immediately! I need to rest in order to offer you any kind of protection from the enemy. May he not come?'

It was bizarre, how the ship would somehow stretch its many winged cars, showing its tails aside and eighteen both-sides barred legs. Most of the metal contractions appeared to have been set in its front, where the strange fuselage threw itself inwardly a bit. The result had been only a slow bleeding of their upper gestation mechanism which had to be forced to malfunction. Otherwise, this thing would've grown in the most disturbing manner, joining its brothers in the many rings around the planet. They were unknown, how they had achieved such a levee of unity and mischievous spread. But it was irrelevant, as long as they could be attained, their insides cleaned and repurposed from within. Cower took another moment to look down at everything they had purposefully missed before. They were seriously trying to stray away from the lower tribal communities which had begged for no interaction and no possibility that they might grow from their conundrums. An inner war between them had spared little for the food and the decay.

'They're Carrions, like you are.'

'Worse for the count, they have taken this as their ungrateful mission, to get as far as possible and bring as much misery as possible.'

But their songs were so arousing, pulling, drawing him closer to almost falling one of the open cervixes the ship displayed.

'I wish I could join them, how much I would dare. I do not care for any of the sins of the past, if only I could present myself as a snail crusher.'

'Blasphemy, you wouldn't dare destroy the little sustenance they have, would you? After all, it's only amongst the only things they have!'

'But I didn't mean that, I only wanted to impress them.'

‘Impress them? Are you a child or the head of a man? Honestly, it’s hard to tell, but I wager you wouldn’t look with as much cruelty if you were down there with them.’

This obtuse head had done little to. An overreaction to which the carrion resigns at the sight of the innocence he was shown.

‘Pardon the outburst, I suppose it doesn’t happen as often for one of you to show up here and know that I’m only trying my best to stay as far away from any destructive virulent flay which may shove itself to them. Otherwise, I couldn’t think of anything at that.

But if you wanted to.’

He considered the likes of the depressed lands. Those were not songs of joy, perhaps this one had been as saddened as they were. The Carrion looked at the standing unit wonderingly. He had listened and considered. It’d be much obliged for him to barely shake, and throw the head away down there. Sludge of a move made it so he understood. It would be likely that the head would never reach the destination that had been claimed for it. But it would be worth to know if it could.

Cower had seen it all, the last moments before the ship getting away. He wouldn’t get to hear the rest of the story or what happened to them, but judging on where he landed, there was at least a hint about where he’d end. It sent chills down his imaginary spine, as he came in one piece, unable to define the confines of a body. It was unexpected. They way they kept their distance, no one would could near him. Had he done something?

‘I won’t hurt you, come near me. I said I won’t hurt you.’

But no one approached. He was struck by the fact that he couldn’t move, not a single inch on such a rough patch. Was this intentional? He could only start wondering what he’s done to earn it.

‘Could you at least help me roll a few inches away?’

Not a sound, they got away now. As far as he could tell, they were not only weary of strangers, but also distant, caught in by the fact that there were strangers out to get them. It was unsatisfactory, unsanitary touched by some kind of lost shade. He felt himself pulled but never moved. That came from lonely Carrion who watched.

‘Will you please help me?’

‘I cannot.’

His hard hands were already wretched around a face which wasn’t his, it had to have been his touch which allowed him to get away. For in the few moments he stood he shook them, trembling around his waist until it fell completely, again. Cower witnessed another one of them pass. Uncomfortably set around there were a few sardines they threw at him, which still leaped as if out of water, suffocating in his dust.

Chanting began again, and he could there, farther in the sky, adamantly insecure, obscured only by his immediate weeping glaze, that he wasn't there.

Lour had been bitten by Power who held at him in some sort of rack. Both of them had no choice but to move alone, spreading away from the others, which were as uselessly morbid in their attempts to get caught. No one paid any attention to them, nor should they care, that they had missed the chance to get on the ship as it came. The only thing they had achieved, by the time it arrived was for them to fall off the ground.

Insecurely caught by a motion of disease, they faced only the drop. Where one was smashed in half but still hanged on, as Lour carried his exposed self in the back.

'I cannot hear you any longer. Could you try opening your mouth again? I simply want to hear you say anything. A word, maybe two, perhaps a verse or.

We should share the beetles, I see that there are many of them here. I'll get out one.'

Catching one of the rolling blocks wasn't as hard as it seemed. As a matter of fact, it was easily pushed through the gap between them. Of course they'd look like tiny sticks and less obese. But it wasn't what he wanted to think about, he was concerned by the lack of pressure on his head. He felt pain, as if there had been a strong bite before he completely let go right at the moment of the impact. Conversely, he had only thought of what happened behind and what it might mean. If only a pool could show him, or anyone who followed them there.

With a quick addition of force, he attempted to throw the beetle back and forth, back and forth, a few inches in the air, only to catch him again and go back at it. By and by, the lack of another try had only spread the obese and misguided...

Least of all, he could've said a thing. Anything but that wait. It made him uncomfortable having to drag him away, this. Not the dead weight, he didn't think of it again. He could see something close to, moving grass. Perhaps someone in there would kindly reveal much. Another person lost, he had been tall and long headed, beaked. That was all. He looked at them and hadn't said a word, not even to admit why he was willing to wear such a silly cone in the front of his nose.

'I think we'll find someone soon, they'll find us great. I know they will, this one was a failure himself, don't mind him. Who'd pass on the opportunity to miss us, right?'

Bleak flowers had been crushed. It had been part of their movement, removing anything which looked even remotely beautiful. Both I and him think the same thing. Ugly, messy, unlike our room, speaking truthfully about it, one share of a view behind revealed much about the building the room had been set in. For one, the giant passage left for a lot of room, not only for the fall to come in, but it seemed to have been cut or separated from a larger structure.

The plants didn't even grow naturally where it ended. And that wasn't the worst part yet. It was those annoying flashy insects which never went away. It took a while to see them for what they were, blank spots in his mind which made it so he'd see them around.

'I've been hit as well. I don't know why but I started to feel like I wasn't made for this.

So many things don't fit here. I wish didn't see it from the outside. I'll make note.

More notes, more notes. And I'll document our adventures. Even if it doesn't always work out. I think I remember something, shoes, both of my shoes had holes in them didn't they?

I don't know what this is important to me, I don't have feet. Neither of us have them, but I think it's time I threw them away, don't you think?'

For some reason or another, it felt bad, likely because he didn't like it at all.

But there was one thing, beyond the grim ends where they had found themselves, in the back, that Tour had been given a vision from that chamber of his, at last. From the safety of his hut he looked at it and saw.

House near the lake, in the middle of the forest, where had it gone?

Jeroge Lemotiff returned back home only to find it missing. His mouth could only stay open for so long while he questioned what had he done wrong.

'Have I done something to anger you? Tell me, and I shall correct my mistake until the day where a hole near my house shall be reserved for me to settle in.'

To which, he'd been given a shovel, pushed a few feet away by a smothering mark upon his neck and waited, for another sign.

'May I be given one now?'

The constellation had shaped itself in the form of a spear, out of the hole, in which he found some hope. He wasn't staring at the sky, but at the ground the entire time.

'What have I done now, what have I gotten myself into?'

It was clear, near the entry, in which he leaped, he found himself standing in his house again. Pure agony had entered him after seeing the entire thing buried underground in the most desperate fashion. The door close and the mount of dirt started falling in. Lemotiff couldn't fight, he couldn't find the strength to fight. Only the struggle remained, as he had been there, caught by the pain of them mocking him, the death masks made by him as he repeatedly bashed his head inside. Unconcealed by him or her, his mother was there as well, dead, above the head, stranding in a fashion which begged the summon, closer to the fact that he realized what she had done.

'Mother, you've forsaken this place can't you see what you're doing?'

Before she turned, he saw now that he mourned for her, his father, his grandparents and daughters, all of which were attached to her, bearing not their human arms but blue colored, largely planted, almost ritualistic finger artificers who did what they were begged to do. Act upon the will of the dead, unable to correct the mistake, but furthering it much more than it was needed. For them to succeed, he'd have to give in, now realizing that he hadn't been given chance.

'Join us and you shall avoid suffocation. And in return, your daughters and I won't die. Think of my daughter, thing of your poor wife, we're not the only ones there. Look below one of the walls.'

To the advancement of pulling out one of the planted pieces of the wood, he saw all the previous generations who were waiting for him. Unable to continue on this path, he gave in and asked.

'What am I in need of? What must I do to pleasure you?'

'Draw the ritual out and do what we must plan. We can be pleased only if we shall swim in it, not walk. Look at our legs and what they've become.'

He saw only a single conjoined tail upon which they stood, scaled but not by the likes of reptiles or those who swam in basins, these had been crafted and appeared to resemble gems which pierced one another like an armor, so they may ever ought to be touched again. A pain would be mandatory now, as a sign. One pulled an arm and started pushing through his ancestors, clearly signaling the pain.

'Stop it, I told you I will help you, no more suffering.'

'They'll remember this now, don't worry about us, only the best waits while we join him.'

A few meters from the ground, as the house raised, he saw the fall, to which they moved closer towards the middle of the lake. In there, the many reeking entries where the dirt conjoined itself to the likes of dirt formed the first filled craters of dirt. It wasn't the normal kind of worm-infested slum, but a kind of infused one by their rings which formed tiny boulder-like statues erected for their own.

'Those are the signs of our new gods. You shall worship then.'

'If that's what I must do farther, then I shall obey and do what I have to.'

‘Know their names, Illishwurm, Kertungurn, Boorhum, Hlehnoktuwrm and Illoghmwurm. For now they shall take your worship for their pantheon is in need to rise from the grave ends of the dirt, where you shall one day be allowed to live by us, in pockets of air, as the last man to be alive.

Your only benefactor shall give you a single woman to copulate as we shall keep you alive forever.’

‘But won’t there be any trouble with them becoming inbred?’

‘It’s little of out concern, you are only to wait and observe through our cycle.’

The dirt was starting to collapse from the windows and he could finally see what was going on around them. A malady of spectral points of dirt came. It looked like he was staring at the ghastly remains of the very mount on which their ancestors stood, how plain they were, how they moved being recorded in it there. With only a vague impression he had been met by one of his great-great-great-grandfathers who stepped into the house.

‘My boy, you’ve done it now. There’s no escape from what you gave to them, not this world, not in the afterlife. But what am I saying? There won’t be any for you, breeder of worms that will be your legacy, your likes shall be abandoned for theirs.

‘But that cannot be. I was promised children, I was told that I would have them for my own.’

‘Look beneath you and you shall see.’

What had become of him now seemed to be like that of the beings he most despised. It wasn’t likely that they would be seen again together after this.

‘I don’t need you, leave, and leave and leave me alone with my thoughts. I cannot suffer your like here.’

Lemotiff wished there was another way, but he had lost control over his legs. They were numb, and appeared to desire to go on either direction they desired to.

Chapter 4

The bunker

Two sets of sub-machine electric decompressions started the alarms. Rooms were being battered up as families were forced into hiding.

‘Door Four Hundred and seventy-seven, respond immediately!’

You have been called upon. Any lack of interaction will cause us to consider immediate intervention.’

It wasn't a normal voice that came out of their diaphragm device. By the looks of its robust sphere, it was a large inviolable box with metal screws attached to its side and lines spread around the circular extremity from where the voice sounded. Two men pulled the device out of the computational box they carried around with them. Five cylinders entered it from beneath. They also bore a pair of large old tubes; black and grayed out by some dust, yet they were connected to the vernacular head from which the box came out of. It appeared that the cylinders contained an amalgamous substance which powered this extremely strange machine.

It would not only store the surrounding sounds but with each passing second, it would cause another one of the ciphers to move on the door.

Oblivious to any human emotion, the dispatched squad was made of four sentient machine parts, and the remains of a well ripped out of this world humanity. They looked like anything but human, even with everything else taken into account.

Something contaminated their skin, giving it a dreadfully discolored look. Within a short pause, their static, emotionless faces and frictionless bodies turned towards me. We stared at one another in disbelief of our existences.

Usually there'd be no deterrence towards what was going on now, but it could be played off as some ignorance since neither of them got alarmed by him being there. It was a restricted area after all.

Their eyes stood there pointing at him. From inside their boulder-like watch visors, they extended a few inches away, as a camera would, pushing far enough that they may see the image of themselves being reflected against the second lense of their recording apparatus. With each second, it looked like they were trying their best to make something out of it. No consistency lay in the type of recoding they produced. And everything they recorded was stored inside a box inside their heads. That had been their black box. The one below them, who was tied to the noise-machine, served as some kind of charge in needed of being emptied.

Doubt stood in their minds, this one was different from the others. A clearer choice of actions came to their minds. They would have to do something in order to woo the man away in order to carry on with their interrogation.

It was that after all, as each number which appeared to be strolling down, counting downwards appeared like. Being unnatural, to say the least, this would be the kind of approach this man would take.

He stood there, dressed plainly, looking rather obscure in terms of how he had been, yellowish teeth and a face that was about as long as the shades which hid underneath his creeping shirt. It would be unlikely that he'd want to try something there, not then and not now. At least this Malt looked caught on with the moment.

Clearly they had been as well, as neither of them dared pushed themselves that close to him. They could only register still images of him standing there. If he were to stay still enough, they'd ignore him. It's what he thought they'd do. Why else would they stare for so long?

It would be impossible to know otherwise whether or not it was true. But Malt waited, and for his patience he had been rewarded.

They retracted their small binoculars and returned to what they were doing. It was almost as if they had little care for what had been going around them now.

Malt looked behind him at the passing people. A family of four had already brushed past them in an attempt to get away. Without any consequence to be immediately observed, they simply brushed past themselves. One of the tiny girls of the Milton's only tried waving at Malt.

'Lisa, stay low, don't look in his direction. Don't do anything.'

As they brushed past him by, it wasn't worth it. Lisa looked through the many red-colored bars of wood, trying to get at least the hint of what the man was trying to get at. He had been somewhat of a mystery that one, the stranger in the block.

His sudden turn towards the family had alarmed them again. Noises stopped, not recording again.

Stay still Malt, you know what they do to people who move a lot. Barely breathing, he had taken upon himself to draw near them again. He walked a steps, no longer would be contained.

He wouldn't stop at anything but come near them and see what they would do.

Once he had been done with this, Malt finally found out on his own skin what the price of disobedience had been.

Between the two of them who had reinstated themselves back into their observation mode, there had been at least a few calls he could've made in order to escape. Unless he had done something to draw as far away from him, he would never leave the confines of that board room.

He looked dangerous, this soldier, this guard, this stranger who had hid himself behind a mask. Both his front and his back bore the same face and he couldn't tell whether there were two minds inside his head. Right about a foot's mark and he had stopped.

Within his hands rested the gun. It was the first time he had seen one so close, and, it wasn't exactly what he expected it to be. Malt thought it would at least show some kind of light pressing inwardly from him, right before it shot. It hadn't got to that point yet.

A metal door, with the ciphers that turned to a result of many fours suddenly opened. It wasn't the one they had gathered around, but the opposite one behind them. Now that it had been in their reach but they chose to turn.

So did him. No warning next time. He knew there wouldn't be, especially after being met by his back as well as that second face which had been staring at him ever since he left, with its small visors and that recorded moment when he left.

At least they had managed to get a good shot of my face. Malt thought. He couldn't face himself either. There would be some dangerous whispers around the block at the time. No one wanted to approach the weird man with his weird looks and his weird almost suicidal temptation he felt then. Without a doubt, he would've found himself unhurled, out of the door, caught by someone out there on the streets if it wasn't for her to stand up to them. His neighbors kept pushing and shoving past his apartment.

Malt could only listen while standing, at the door's delight while they kept knocking and knocking without a stop in sight.

'Open up, we know what you did. We heard it from the first ear's account. Don't make us step in, you won't like it if we do.'

Twice that already, and even more.

'We won't allow you to draw attention to us, you here Malt? They want something from you, we know you do. This isn't the first time you happen to show up and anger them.'

There are signs and notes all over, showing your face, warning us about you.'

'Listen to Collroy. For your own sake, you need to stop everything you're doing now. What would your mother think if she knew what you were doing?'

Simply take a look outside and see for yourself.'

An eight-pointer waited at the rear. It had a moving, seething trajectory which couldn't help itself but get drawn by the light chart above it. A pair of metal hinges held it, moving while projecting a pseudo image of his head shape. That had been way too much, especially since every single man, woman and child had been passed in the records. Without looking into it too much, it could only be that they tried scaring him.

Of course they didn't immediately get him. He would have to be put up to shape and made as an example first.

'I think they like me.'

‘I think you’re your being head blunt if you expect me to cover up for you every single time you do something irrational.’

Said Claire as she burst in through the door. Malt only saw a few men standing behind her, who let her through without giving in too much.

‘Still, I think they enjoy how clever I am. Why else would they give me so much attention? They could’ve shot me while I was there but they hadn’t. You want to know why?’

‘It’s because they like you?’

‘I know they do. That’s why I’m planning on inviting them inside my house.’

‘You’ve mad.’

‘My dear Claire, I’m only trying to push my luck. Know that I haven’t even started yet. As a matter of fact, I’ll make sure they’ll get a taste of what’s coming, especially after this show they’re putting on for me.’

‘About the entire eastern bloc is talking about you, are you aware of that? I know you enjoy having your fun here, but there’s no need to drag the rest of us with you.

My family lives here as well, Malt, don’t make me do this.’

‘Do what exactly?’

She raised the butt of a chair’s leg to her arm’s length. To it she attached a small and dirty cram which held itself locked on top of the leg. It had meant to take some of the weight away, or to make it look fancy.

But she didn’t look that threatening at all, not to him. He knew well enough that she wasn’t going to hurt him. Plus, the four corners of the city had been surrounded. Their buildings which connected the power lines leading to every building in the city could only last for so long before needing to be replaced.

Every time it happened, the citizens were to be asked to stay inside. Only the outlines of the dark forms could be seen when the replacement happened, and it would be frightening enough to look upon it carry on. Where had they taken it from? How did they manage to move as heavy a building as that had been?

There’d be no way of knowing and not a single show for them to put on while it happened. At the time of the replacement, lights died out. By then, everyone had to behave. Afterwards, they had all the time in the world to go ahead and harass the people. No one knew why that was.

But those guards of theirs haven't killed anyone, or at least not publically. People went missing from time to time. Sometimes they returned, but that hadn't been right either. The circumstances of their return couldn't be recounted for. Many seemed normal but less inclined to do trouble.

Not brainwashed, not brain damaged, no lobotomy which they may remember, they wouldn't come back as vegetables either. Something in those buildings they had been shown, or must've been shown made them so afraid to speak about it. But someone had to eventually. Silence wouldn't be kept forever.

'Not that I'm trying to make you sound right, I won't give that to you, but I can see some resemblance to you.'

'That is me, like I told you, they're trying to get my attention.'

'A coincidence.' Said Claire, looking mightily bored, while rubbing the chair with her small cram. Some sparks were being shot by it, that old tool still worked after so many years it seemed.

But as much as she had wanted to give him a good old blast or a poke, she couldn't help but look at him and be saddened. This man she had grown up next to had changed. He hadn't slept as much as of lately. It wasn't like him to pretend. Something bothered him.

'You want to talk about it?'

'I'm fine, but listen, I swear, then, when I looked in that corner, that light flickered as if it saw me.'

'That's one of surveillance cameras outside, they're supposed to go off every now and then. You're imagining things happening all over, it's because you lack sleep. And you know what happens when you're not getting enough sleep.'

'I don't. Why aren't you?'

A loud and distant sound came and appeared to go without a stop. Suddenly its reverb came and he turned to her again. She was waiting for him to finish. By the look on her face, there hadn't been anything to it. No attempted question, no desire to come forth, no way of asking her whether she'd give him the benefit of the doubt, that.

She stepped forward, looking at him up and down. Both of them looked drowsy in their plain clothes, in that simple room which had little to it inside. Only a bed and a drawer, a simple carpet which had a red sphere embroiled on it, the texture being that of small overlain locusts drawn to the big red orb around. Nothing could be said about the colors of the wall, other than the fact that they each had a bleak shade, a plate laid on a single one of them.

He had received it as a gift from a neighbor, a small talking fish, which had its head ripped off. It had revealed the dark plasters as well as a spider which had made its home inside. There had been another door leading to the bathroom but that had been it. Well, there had been the exception of the chair Claire held in her hands, as she preferred standing, but it was indeed a fact that the mood couldn't have been set righter than it had been then.

'Will you step with me into the bathroom?'

By now the neighbors cleared out of sight. It wasn't long until they started patrolling those corridors where they had moved. Those long-legged walkers, which hid in their bodies infested pools filled with tiny round modified electrical ticks. Small nursing electronic components would be thrown inside those pools from time to time, as some kind of donation given from every apartment.

Someone had to feed it, as hardly as they could. It wasn't its fault that it was there, and that thing didn't appear like it had come out of the buildings nor had it come to appear like it was affiliated with their control facilities. It simply was there, an android carrying its children. Its legs and body appeared large enough to hide some kind of living body, but that could only be contemplated upon.

Without any confirmation, no one could tell. But it own kneeled and seemed to use some magnetic spell or the help of some field it produced to push those small devices which had been obtained by the people. In that way, at least they managed to keep everything clean.

Since everything would be used, there'd be no trash to spare or throw. And those small ticks drew upon their newly found mother figure, drawing from it, placing their small spreading legs upon it, blistering its strange device of a body with smaller thick lings which formed in there.

It was a strange relationship between the two. Impossible to say whether those walkers were their mother, father, of a simple means to carry it out. But no one dared approach that thing, not only because it had been dangerously big, but because it shop small bolts from time to time. And its joints had been too unstable to be dealt with, if one were to draw near the enclosure.

What had been realized then was the fact that it had never showed how it had gotten inside their bloc in the first place, or how it would always avoid capture. In a stated event such as this, what followed were a few thumps which would be felt through the ceiling and such.

At the time of them coming and heading through, their small black boxes would start acting up again. They would disturb everyone in every apartment, making sure they weren't allowed to open up their doors while it had happened. Each number went down by four on each door. It was the best way to make sure the doors would be locked for the foreseeable amount of time needed for either one of them to get away.

Without a way of knowing they'd be stuck in there, behind their closed bars, unable to protect one another if one were too blocked outside. So far, it had been another one of those close calls where the sounds of the shots hadn't been heard. No one knew what they sounded like. Some were even too busy to mind themselves under the sound of showers.

By the time of this event happened, the outskirts of the bloc appeared to darken. The watch light which had been trying to get a grasp of the Malt shape now came to disappear. Nights were left undisturbed; at least that's how it's been for a while. No alarm this day.

Farther away, on the Southern block, things were left undiminished. It seemed like one of the power-lines had been ripped and misdirected towards one of the local buildings. The cause for it had been unpleasantly, a cause of local misappropriation of the goods of the central powers.

They had made it so they would not only get free electricity but something to power up their own miss-placed engines. For simpletons they had been clever enough to misdirect the power from the conduit to their line alone, which pushed from above, lending to the basement. There was little benefit from it and neither man knew who had done it, but what seemed too had happened was the fact that in the city, there was this space which had been lit all night.

‘What if they catch us out here?’

‘They won’t, as long as we’re not overstaying, we should be fine. No one will look after us as long as there’s light. Take a load Malledy.’

Past her, he pointed at the zone beyond the fourth lit panel. Beyond it there was only the dark which had been left by the constant pushing of the light which had occurred as soon as the system restarted.

They were sitting there, waiting on the backside of the light. A few busy bodies which didn’t move at all for no reason whatsoever stood there, unmoving, silently standing in awe. Though still there, they were absent minded, because of the mere fact that neither of them looked functional.

‘Go on, throw a rock at them, let see what happens.’

‘What if they start following us then? Or pull out their electrical arms?’

‘Then we’ll cross that bridge when we’re at it. If not, then, let’s carry on and see how it goes.’

‘It sounds like a bad idea.’

‘Listen, I know what I’m doing.’

The four teenagers suddenly pulled away from the single knuckle dragger in the back. He threw the rock with hope that no retaliation might come or befall on him. It landed on top of that mask and bounced back down.

Immediately as if raised from the grave, this two faced statue started sprinting towards him without a weapon in hand but with two strong arms which had come into the light. This one hadn't been the lipless, weak-legged, pissy armed harasser. He had been a strong man, at least by the sheer size alone. It couldn't be questioned at all, as if not to be taken lightly, there had been it.

He needed to limp away like a rabid dog while he was being chased by the guardsman.

'I told you not to do it.'

'Please, make him stop, I don't think he has it in for me. I'm really afraid.'

'He won't catch you, go on with it. Simply outrun him, you'll manage to do it eventually.'

They appeared to be chasing dead ends as they trailed one another around one of the planted shrubs. While that was going, the electricity couldn't be accounted for. Eventually it would stop. As soon as their fun was over, everyone stood still in the dark.

'Come on, one more moment now.'

'Don't take it away, we were trying to.'

You know, we were trying to have a little fun around this place.'

With two flickers, a coincidence no likely, the light came back on. Standing there, slumping near a bunch of rocks, the kid only watched as the guardsman stood there still. Though he was in the light, it felt like his mind rested. Two hands went back and forth, going as far as to signal for him to carry on. He wasn't intending to do it.

The wind was barely blowing then. Four tall metal gyroscope tubes stood up rose to the very top of the buildings. From there stemmed the problem, as not only had the power cords connected the rest of the apartments to the main electrical grid, but it also seemed that it was that point which sprouted the whole misused energy.

Someone crawled on the top of the buildings, somehow getting access to it. From that point they managed to misdirect and take away from it. A figure could be seen from there. Obviously it hadn't been the central power, the one which took and gave it away.

The Northern bloc, as expected. Cold, too cold, it would appear that a good side of it had been affected by the falling blocks of snow from the nearest snow Alps they had been adjacent to. Grim winds of frost drew forth.

As opposed to those bleak clothes the other districts had their people wear, they had embroidered coats which were dark grayed and white patched. With that much snow spread around, there was a lot more to do around there than in the other areas.

From the overtop view the spot looked like some barely inhabited base placed inside a Tundra. Small leaves carried picks of snow which could only push them forth.

It wasn't obvious at first, but there was something there, in the snow. Without the proper means of scavenging, one would have to think twice before making a mistake. They were forced to look for food after all. And it hadn't been easy.

Far in-between their likes, there were small snow pulps which could've been obtainable if they had only tried their luck in catching them. The guardsmen weren't any better in what they wore. Wrapped around there, uniforms had been overlain in weather fatigue. It was what they called in.

A small box pushed it out, producing small starred covering winds which enveloped them like mantles. They wore pieces on their masks and faces, which could only work as a way of showing how thoroughly they went ahead to make sure they'd be well prepared to deal with them. Unlikely, they wouldn't last long before melting, even though the temperature sometimes dropped to a server twelve minus on a scale of Fahrenheit.

While they were getting prepared to go at it again, seeing how this had been a recording in the midst of day, it wasn't likely that they'd be caught yet.

One sign clearly read:

'No cheery-picking.'

There stood small pulps of snow bugs, rounded, flat beneath their feet, with a tiny gap where they fit the cherry inside. It was a treat, because those modified fruits were much tastier than the common ones. Unfortunately, they also acted like some kind of weird bee-sting system, which enabled one to kill the bug if he were to pick the cherry.

Indeed, this was more like an act of preservation than anything else. With little in mind, it couldn't be account for. Those wild insects had to be kept alive for some reason. It was obvious that the central power wanted them there. And they knew that, henceforth why the young men came and grabbed the cherries before throwing the hard shells back at the guards.

It wasn't an amusing watch, not by any means. One could make amends with such an impulsive lot, or would've if it weren't for the fact that they didn't allow any means of joy to happen.

'There they come again, be careful now, if you trip you might end up being stepped on by the passing trucks they're trying to bring in.'

'Wait, where?'

While they busied themselves around the snow floor, they seemed to have forgotten what happened there. by a few feet, they started planting the radiators. Heat constantly spread like some wave of dissatisfaction which spread around like a leaping leper in a crowd.

On the other side of the road, they were bringing some large transportation vehicles, four wheeled, large, compact, painted in a shade of bleak yellow or some orange, which only bore some inscriptions which couldn't be properly read by anyone of the matter. Obviously they hadn't been aware of what was going there. Second account basis only told that they were releasing a lot of their troops so they would start surrounding the area.

By the onlooker on the fourth floor, they had shouted across the room, getting through from one point to another, through some solid forty feet away, getting through each step until they got down there. It had been obvious what they were after, without a doubt, to no clue at that. Some would have to say that there was, if one saw it through, a way of knowing whether or not the message landed.

Clearly, they were trying to take the whole area down. It would be lost in obscurity otherwise. One bottom, fourth row, they looked upon it as if they'd know what they'd be after. Every guard wanted the frozen thicker, the planted concoction of pine and metal which had been hid below a block of ice. It kept the area from spreading and it was in a thorough need of recovery.

Likewise, they would've pretended to be doing this to control the area, but that concoction, which resembled a small conditioner box, could have itself be inverted as to control heat. A miscalculation forced it to end there and now they were after it. That device had to be recovered. Without it, there would be a large problem on its way.

And it was laughable how it managed to find itself there.

'Look, I think I may have found a way to make it work. give me this opportunity to speak to them. We should be able to meet.'

'No, you're not. It's clear that you're going to get yourself shot if only you, you.'

The man's voice suddenly shuddered as he looked above him, at what was going on there. Someone had placed a giant plank between two buildings and came over. He decided to wave at them, without making too much noise to alarm all those who had gathered around them.

For a fact, they were uninterested by there being a way to connect the two tops of those buildings. Clearly, there had been something which enabled them to look and register. And so many eyes did that that it had turned in a creeping stare which could only watch from one corner to another there.

'I'll step down in a minute. listen to me. There are too many out there and you're not helping yourselves now.'

He took a look at how annoyed they had been. Far too many times, they had been forced to push themselves past the limit and try outrunning them around the edges of their snow shades. Eventually one guard tripped and fell, dirtying his snow shield. Others weren't pleased by it.

But if there was something to be recalled then, it was that sudden change into motion which happened. A change that not even Malt could ignore, that no man in that boring city could even care about enough to ignore it. The various living devices and those abominations of steel had been alarmed as well. Towering like rotund metal termites which had their flying wings push their smaller bumped and scarred dwarfish sacks looked out of their hiding spots as well.

The very metal fences which had surrounded the entire confines of the zone shook as the buildings belonging to the power started producing heat. Whatever they were doing there wasn't right. It wasn't supposed to get to such uneven temperatures or even raise them that high. Everyone look in shock how they started pumping, revealing themselves to them.

'What's going on? Are we going to be destroyed? Is this is then?'

'I don't know.'

'Sit down, under the table, before something falls on you.'

A surge came from there, which turned the power lines inwardly, to the point where they started being pulled and gave way for the sudden loss of light to occur. Next, what followed was the sound of the steppe, as something was crushed and for the first time in a long time, thought they may not have been able to recognize what it had been, the sounds of the animals came. Then the machine.

One building pulled down, without replacement, leaving the count down to a seven.

'Where did it go? Where's that building gone? It never did that before. It's never been doing that, where is it?'

'Calm down I said, you're going to scramble your brain if you keep shaking it like that. Don't go out there, the count down, remember.'

It was never answered what those ciphers did, those numbers which were going down. Everything was dull and old, and food always came at dark intervals, brought by tall standing legless androids. One such android came out of nowhere.

The feeding had come sooner than expected, much too soon to be ignored by what was happening there. Power stations settled down. From above the crown of the air, they had placed themselves like some kind of belt, kept by a field of gravitational power which forced it to stand still. Many cables fell and started connecting with the metal fence which surrounded everything.

Each and every single one of the metal buildings began pulling down.

‘It’s happening again. Do you think this time it will be permanent?’

‘I hope so, this waiting is killing me, and I don’t know one way or another what’s going to happen. Hold me.’

On a quarter of a half a mile, Malt stood there with Claire. Both looked like they couldn’t spare a moment longer, since everything appeared to be ending. A state of emergency had been set, the various devices above their building spread. It was a continuous feed which fed into the cables.

Sleep-inducing lights came. No one had been presented with.

‘Malt, get into the room, now, and close the light.’

‘What for Claire?’

‘do it, now. I think, I hope.’

They went into it. Usually when this happened, either there’d be a delay before the light would kick in again or it would simply be unresponsive. Clearly that hadn’t been the case there, as soon as the light in the bathroom turned off, it stood off.

‘I’ll be damned, Malt. You were right, you were actually right.’

‘How? What are we talking about?’

‘Can’t you see it happening around you?’

‘What is it?’

‘It’s almost as if the air is drawing in.’

Every room had been locked on. Many of the areas which had residents outside their houses appeared to be blocked as well. Finally, the belt had connected with the city, after the exchange was done with.

Now the buildings would pin the city in its place no longer. It wasn’t normal by any means, the place they had been brought to. The more one looked out of the window, the easier it got to observe, how the sky had been filled with steam.

They hadn’t moved at all, as there was no motion felt.

What had been brought from all the way up had been a bunch of cylindrical tanks filled with waste? Electrical waste to be freed upon the areas. The process of mental alteration had failed in some ways.

In the outskirts and the darkest places of town, those part machine invaders had taken their weird forms to some extent which wouldn't be permitted. Some ticks started growing up into bigger sacks. And their mothers gave them mechanical bodies, which resembled androids, but which had been hallowing inside. In them they would grow to take the form and may never be released from their bodies of metal.

At they would stretch and shape, they'd give the appearance of a human face, which weren't seen as living beings. There was something on its way though, a means of controlling those factors which only got in the way of them being forced into staying.

'Malt, I think it's safe to get out, look, the light is clear.'

'Are you sure about it?'

'I'm more than sure, of course. They certainly look busy now.'

Her fine red dress couldn't have been made of one color. Stains remained there; it looked like it at least. With little in mind, one could draw the conclusion that the two of them had, looked out of the window now.

Malt couldn't help but stay focused on her banded hair-do. It was so-close to having on early hair of grey, yet neither of it stained her delightful light skin.

Out there, nothing went right. Tanks had been brought and placed about everywhere. It wasn't safe any longer, and those trucks they moved around from bloc to bloc only served to bring out more of them. Neither of which had been set inside those area which had those people in.

The fourth escape had fallen forth. From about the orbit came the great magnificent power-drill. On eighty sides there had been many rotating stationary units which forged the connection with the rest of the city. Though there wasn't much explained, the trajectory hadn't been set to that point for a reason.

A depressing feeling overcame about everyone out there. It wasn't likely to be told. The drill had been aimed at the middle of the city and the time in which it was placed had only been a coincidence with the bringing of the tanks there. Why, they both acted in different manners or not. It seemed like the drill hadn't been active.

A panel shot from one sight, revealing eighteen smaller drills. Five more panels follow, eight more, twenty moves, until they kept shooting, revealing a ceiling made of drills which had covered about every spot, preventing any kind of escape there'd be.

It took some time but the shocks waves around the affected areas stopped. Not every place had been affected by them, enough of them were though.

As strange as it had felt for the citizens who had been under constant annoyance, this had been met by little interest as they had began waking up. That and it had been seen as rather mundane. Lights still went on now, and around them, there could only be seen some kind of artificial day. A new wave of guardsmen simply came and started prodding around like they usually did but somehow, those electrical tanks had failed.

‘Clever little things, aren’t they? I kind of think I’m starting to root for them, Ashley. What do you think?’

‘Would you invite them in your house now and feed them as well?’

They’re dirty, let them be. I think it would be better if they remained that way, as they are now. You know I can’t stand looking at them.’

‘Oh, shut it down, they’re not so bad now.’

One pyramidal top suddenly came out in the open with it eight legs, carrying underneath it eight android heads which had been popped. Alive, looking back at them, this was the sight people were begging to see. They put on quite the show for them.

The pyramidal structure opened and revealed a floating creature in the form of a flattened mushroom cloud made out of battered sacks held together by a net made out of veins. As soon as it had escaped its prison or its body, whatever it may have been, the tanks went on again.

Either they detected motion or the magnetic structures which were in the area. In them there had been a stop, a clock like tool standing at the end of the cylinder opened the valve which shot electricity in a cone from its tiny popping tube. An electrical waste had entered the metal casing of the body, suddenly bringing all the androids to life.

It gave them a twirl and a jolt.

‘Release release, program, check, check rooms twenty, eighty, fifty, sixty, twenty-four, take no break from it, no power, left inside.’

‘Make arrangements of that oak, place it eight squares left and make sure the cameras are going to be resented.’

‘Feeding hour at four, feeding hour at five, feeding at six, six, seven, eight, nine.’

One tuberculosis-android snapper one hand from inside the small metal chest it bore. The metal body that creature had taken a few too many hits. Too much power had filled its small enclosed space, turning it to that strange flickering trap which now stood there.

The creature which had managed to get away flew in a dark spot where it hid itself. Neither of them felt welcome out there, where they could be seen.

Every now and then, days and nights went as quickly as that.

‘Another one’s coming.’

‘Fourth one now.’

‘Malt, can I ask you something?’

‘Shoot it, you know I’m here for you, for anything as a matter of fact. Anything you need.’

‘Do you still think they like you?’

‘I don’t know. With everything that’s been happening as of lately, Claire, I’m bound to think that they’re not. There’s one way to find out, I think I can hear them down there, beating of a door. Can you hear it?’

Look down there.’

He pointed at a corner in his room. She paid a special kind of attention there and followed him outside the dorm. Both of them headed down the stairs, went down, sight after sight until they were there.

In the same kind of circumstance he had found himself face to face, met by them. Though they all wore the same uniforms, he thought he could distinguish them from one another. One was taller, or shorter, more buff, well formed bodies or weak. They displayed something which made them distinguishable from one another.

He even thought, as mad as that sounded that he recognized one of them as a friend or a man he had met before. It couldn’t be but it must’ve been that way. Little idea had he that inside of them, there were big worms, not worms but metal springs which had taken the appearance of the earthy movers, only so they would power them up.

Those things had replaced a piece of their gut and were filled with, as hypocrisy dictated, electrical ticks jumped in there constantly. A motion which never ended prevented them from growing inside their guts and spreading. With a wire being connected to the worm, they would bring some power to their weapons, drawing forth their needs to shoot when it was needed of them.

One time, one of them had stumbled and fell on a sharp piece of metal. It had pierced his gut and stopped the motion. A dangerous thing which had forced the ticks to grow and grow until his insides had been toppled to the size of a boulder, in the form of that solid thick-monstrosity made out of all of their combined bodies.

Neither the ticks nor the guard survived, and that had only served as a means of showing what happened to them if they tried too hard, or they pushed themselves beyond human-limits. Cruel, to be told, one could think of nothing forth.

But it seemed that there'd be something left to do or say. At least as they started their obvious process of lensing.

‘Malt, are you sure about this?’

‘ stay out of sight and try not to get in their way. If something happens to me and in case I'm wrong, stay still for long enough and you'll be fine.

Trust me, I know this. I've done it before.’

There wasn't any expectation any longer. He simply jumped over the level of the hall and came into their view. Malt expected them to retaliate as soon as it happened. Why, they immediately stopped recording and watched over him as he approached. No one's ever done that before. Claire watched as her only friend rushed to his untimely end.

Before it could be considered that they were done with it, he had looked into getting even closer. For the last twenty minutes they had beaten on eight doors, started and stopped their sound machines and knocked on floors as well as they had threatened to shoot unless responded to.

And even though he was met by them, Malt couldn't help it but look at the door and notice how the numbers keep turning down. What had been the reason for that? Was it a death clock? Could that be it?

It certainly couldn't, after all, there wasn't anyone that ever died. Even those gone missing had returned. And in their absence, their numbers had stopped going down, so it had to do something with them now. A guardsman made a move on him now. He placed a hand on his shoulder and only bobbed his head for a second. Do they take me as one of their own?

The expression on Claire's face was a mix of confusion, joy and satisfaction. For some reason, she actually took pride in the fact that her friend had done so much in so little a time. Malt was winning them over. Sounds got lowered and now they even made way for him to draw near the door. With his fists clenched, he began punching and hitting, slapping with his fists uncurled. It was something he very much enjoyed doing.

A smile drew near his sides as his new friends seemed to laugh as well at that. Laughing?

Were they showing emotion now? They were stopped and apprehended by a sight at the opposite end of the corridor. One android looked in their direction, busied by his tiny pack of stacked carbon nano tubes he was carrying for some project. It wasn't a man, could it be?

Malt actually wondered, why, could it be that someone was working on something there? Perhaps in his lonely apartment alone, buying or trading their things for those tiny trade tools? Before he could continue his fun, they began chasing. All of them had been gone with the exception of one uniform that stopped right at the end and waved him to follow.

Little subtlety there though he came to his senses and followed through.

‘You were right, I, I was. You did say and then.’

‘I know Claire, I told you they liked me, I think they really do. We’ll talk, right? Afterwards, after I’m done with them.’

‘Malt, you’re not planning on leaving me here, are you? I’m coming with you whether you like it or not.’

‘Claire, this is getting out of hand. It may be a bit too dangerous for both of us to be amongst them. Wait here and I’ll return for you.’

‘In the middle of the hallway?’

‘Fine, go and wait inside my apartment and don’t go out.’

‘But I want to come with you.’

‘Well, you can’t, it’s far too dangerous for both of us to follow. go and wait.’

Claire wasn’t going to give up easily. She only faked going around. Of course it had to follow as well. That thing from behind, the small body of the mechanical leg-formation which had been controlled by a balloon made out of glass which had a single floating electrical thick powering it. They found the weirdest ways of preventing their growth.

Beneath that entry which connected the lower body and the electrical source, there had been an electrical wind blower. That kept the tick from ever reaching the ground, which was required for it to grow. She couldn’t explain why, but that electrical insect looked sad.

By its disturbing looking figure and its small moving bobbles popping out of the way, it looked sad. It followed her for some reason and acted like a child trying to get her attention.

‘Be quiet if you want to follow, all right? Don’t make any noise. We’ll work something out.’

That thing nodded and came nearer her. There wasn’t any aggression yet. For now.

Only the large panels which had extended from far away could do something near the rotational system which could be held into the matter at hand. Being in danger had been constant there. And the life outside had been of no interest to them.

Why, even those in the Northern bloc had taken a liking into fashioning snowballs and throwing them for the sake of being chased. But that had become boring, even for the other party. Now, they had picked snow up, locked in inside their guns and shot them at the residents.

The look of surprise on their face flew right on. A function which didn't involve shooting them straight on wasn't exactly what could be expected of. Neither was the crowd which had gathered around them. Be it the top of the building or those who had entered through the gate. It had been full of them.

Still no spin in sight, but if it came right to it, there'd be danger. There'd be dragons ahead, a sign said. It had been placed only recently. But that thought had to be over.

'Malt, what are you doing? Could I have a word with you?'

He turned. Barnabee stood at the door, half-opened. A haircut which looked like bowl cut, with tinted glasses and a dead rabbit on top of his head. The cause of death had been a suffocation toxic caused by the sudden insertion of many needles it had suffer through.

Barnabee enjoyed animal cruelty. He took it to some extreme sometimes. There weren't many animals out there, so he made them himself, giving no explanations how he had acquired the materials or how he made it. Everything had been kept in secret from him, the entirety of his life had been that way. A secret trade between the residents, the androids, and perhaps even those guards out there, who sometimes acted in some way or the other? His entrance had been different.

As far and often as he went ahead, it looked like every door had been forged out of metal and everything else seemed stapled on by metal pins at each side where every edge ended. There wasn't any way to break the lights eight, from anywhere, as they were part of the ceiling as well. He had considered doing it as a child, but that had failed, as his every attempt had.

But enough of that, what did Barnabee want?

'I'm onto something; I'm trying to chase them.'

'Why? You plan on joining them?'

'I can do that? I wasn't aware of it.'

'Well, don't look behind you yet but he's there, behind you, at the end of the lane. Waiting, for you.'

'Barnabee, I don't know what to do. My life so far had consisted of me stalking people, doing nothing in my room and doing it with Claire. I don't know anything else other than that.'

'What about eating?'

'What about it?'

Barnabee frowned. Claire was behind, in ear's reach, point obscure. She was cowardly, a bit, eavesdropping as well as she was trying to hold her follower in end's reach. There wasn't any question about what they may do to her or it if they had been caught together. Yet she still chose to protect it.

'Shh, let me listen to them.'

'Look, Malt. We don't know each other much. You don't speak to anyone, I'll be honest, you're a weirdo. Don't do it, don't that. don't join them, there's still hope for you left, that you may somehow recover and do something with your life.

There's no need for you to throw your chance away, you know? They're not like us. They stand and do nothing.'

'Aren't we doing the same? Most of the time, everyone seems depressed. Other times, everyone acts like when they're drawing near my door, they punch it, and they're never leaving me alone.

It's never this or that or Malt, let's go out there and do that. Every single time, it's me and Claire. And she's not always there, for me, you know. I'm not expecting much, I don't want to be alone any longer. There's more to life than doing the same thing over and over again, you know?'

'Certainly, which is exactly why you can't join them? There's seriously something wrong about them. This is a feeling, or what I've heard.'

'Don't go all conspirational on me now. '

'I'm serious. Those designs, they're taken from the days of the Black Death. They put something in them which affects how they see the world.

They consider it a disease, the way we see the world. You'll never come back once you put that. Your head with spin both on the back and the front and you'll never come back.'

He had never seen this much life come out of Barnabee, almost teary eyed as well as expected.

'Close the door, please.'

'I know we don't know each other that much, Malt. But I can't stand seeing people disappear. That's not right.'

'They return, I've seen them.'

'No, they don't Malt. None of the people who leave ever return.'

'Yes, they do. I've seen them come back but they don't talk about what happens out there. They keep it to themselves you know?

No tip for tatter.'

An arm appeared and as it had, the door had been forced shut on Barnabee. He had been waited for far too long and now he followed. On his way though, a few more ticks and the thoughts remained.

What if he was right? What if they didn't return?

His life had been that. A constant breeze, which was not set to an abrupt ending, seeing how they had been brought to another one of those closed areas.

Now he understood. For that reason they were they, processing and playing the sounds from their black box-recording. They were simply re-playing the evidence, expecting them to understand. At first it sounded like nothing but now, after exposure to it, he started comprehending the words. He'd understand what those were trying to say.

But, then again, hadn't he heard a similar message before?

'You have been found guilty as charged for having received spare parts that do not belong to you. Dangerous materials went unchecked and delivered without permission.

If immediate release and allowed reappropriation of the goods, there shall be some punishment in store as well as an increase in the sentencing.'

That one hadn't made sense at all. 'Give all belongings now!'

An awkward break came in as soon as that cut off during the replay. For now, Malt only observed them. Behind, there stood Claire, exposing her back end at the corner.

'Pssh, pssh.'

Only a most subtle hiss came over her. She couldn't help it at all but take the opportunity to wave him over.

Behind him, they looked busily enough, so he only did the natural thing and came over her.

Farther away, it seemed like there had been an error in the plan. Molecular metallic sides apart, the apparatus started taking itself apart. An android came out and went inside a notch. In front of him, under his colored vision filed, which had been promptly deactivated as soon as he had come in contact with light, had been the entrance. Shaped like some case in which generators were stored, he revealed a hatch with a ladder on it, wide enough for a person of wide proportions to flow through.

As he lowered he went into the belly of the beast, the bottom row, only the storage hole this one group of androids fashioned themselves. To each of their own, it looked like four androids were in the waiting. Each of them had worked through a hard schedule, work day after work day, picking up another thicket. Someone from their group picked up a lamp and hanged it on top.

It was a neat method of illumination.

‘Is everything still standing?’

‘We’re in a few more now, don’t worry. We should be fine for at least a few more months as long as the trade continues. They don’t even know what days of the week are. Them nasties.’

Every android laughed their pitched metallic bark echoing in their tiny chamber. In the back there were metal grates which had been interlocked. There was another thing going on in Malt’s mind. After getting done with waiting in front of the door for so long, he returned to Claire.

She waited there for him. No doubt about it. No one tried to stop him from going back and they appeared to be enjoying what they were doing. As dull as it was repetitive as it was, that’s how they got their kicks out of life.

‘Hey, why are you?’

‘Long story, but I think it likes me. It’s been trailing me around ever since I decided to follow you.’

‘So, you heard? For how long have you been following me for?’

Recalled into action, there had been something close to that extent of power the tick produced. It disliked him being around her. Not enough that it’d get aggressive to stop him, but enough to.

‘Watch out.’

The four guards took a hold of Malt within a second of appearing in her field of vision. She had been pushed behind as well as the mechanical legs which followed her.

‘Claire, run, don’t try to fight them, I’ll see.’

His voice cut off. Their recordings stopped and it looked like they were already on their way to get him to the central power. It was almost as if they had been way too fast for their own good, having come in terms of pushing through the doors and getting away. Without a doubt, he had been an adversary to be looked up to.

Malt fought and looked behind how door after door opened, his neighbors looking back on how he managed to get through now. Not only had they been called into question, but it was obvious what they had to leave behind, a kind of strange and vague desire for him to come back.

He could see it in their eyes, at every turn and every corner.

‘Malt don’t give up.’

‘Stay strong, don’t let them have their way with you.’

‘Fight at every turn, boy, don’t let them have you!’

‘Malt, Malt, sir, Malt, Malt, trip them, you can do it! I believe you can.’

‘Try, little man, try to push it, here, take my hand.’

One resident tried landing a hand but he couldn’t do with what he had. There was so much more he could do then. Without having anything asked for in his entire life, other than what he had, he wanted to yell at them. Help me, I can fight, if only you’d land me a hand.

No one stood in sight. As much as he thought he stood a chance to fight, he couldn’t have tried any harder than that. Clearly, they’d see each other eye to eye at one point in their lives.

Such an immeasurable amount of guilt and shame he felt, being looked out after for so long a time, by Claire who was in there, who had let them get him now. He couldn’t focus on what he told her before, only that she wasn’t here for him. Or inside of.

‘Snap out of it Malt, you’re dozing off again.’

A man from the second floor saw him on the square area and threw a bucket of water on him as well as them. It gardened a reaction which was compromised of them having stopped.

‘Look, hold on son. We may have put a bit too much on your shoulders, but that doesn’t mean we dislike or hate you. Don’t give me, as long as you have faith in us, we’ll see it through.’

‘How? You can’t fight them. Where did get that bucket? How come I never get anything?’

‘You don’t need to know this son. Trust me, you wouldn’t be able to keep your mouth shut, it’s for your own sake.

It’s your mouth, you keep babbling on without thinking about what you’re saying. Don’t take it personal, it’s how you are.’

It didn’t take long for them to kick in back the wheels and push their minds to work. Without question or without means of doing anything of the sort, now they went back on it. Carrying him as far as possible.

There were men on top of buildings who looked at Malt being taken back to their place of power. He had been the first one to go missing in a long time, which made it all more of a disturbing sight.

‘None the better, I presume he wasn’t one too clever to avoid getting caught, was he?’

Malt saw the metal trap, he saw the snow from the distant bloc, the wires and the tubes which had been misappropriated, the metallic drills which threatened everything, the androids and those strange beings which looked at him from their dark corners. All of them, which he either knew or who may have vaguely heard about, as the one man who made a lot of mess and a lot of noise around.

‘He’s that lad, isn’t he? That one who keeps taunting them.’

‘Everyone does that, don’t they?’

‘You dummy, they’re not doing it while they’re alone. But he had no one to do it with him, that’s what’s making it so special.’

Claire had been grabbed by the metallic legs as well as by two of their nearest people who found themselves there. It was obvious that there was an entrance to the whole premise which had been left undiscovered by everyone. She only had to take it and rush through the second pair of stairs which lead below. On top of it being hidden in one of the rooms, there were some fake numbers which couldn’t have drawn nearer to the mark.

‘Let me get to him, he needs me, can’t you see that he’s not going to be able to do it on his own? He’s helpless without me.’

‘Leave it be, girl, you won’t get him out of it. They’ll simply take you with them as well. We’re as hurt as you are.’

In the bloated heart of the machine, where the engines turned, towards the central power building and near its core, there had been enough turns to make a new uniform and a mask. Both of them had been worked at for such a long time. Only then, there couldn’t have been a better time to look for a proper replacement. Its ramps of metal drew forth and the slaves had gathered around it in to pull it down.

The suit had been powered, the uniform would have to be skin-tight and the many metal limbs had only come in their place, pushing and drawing up and down in order to get powered for what was to come. A play of small iron nails would hold a man in place before everything would be placed. Less than a great degree of Fahrenheit heat-enablers would spread and connect with the joints and the ends on both sides.

Unpleasant as it had been, this meeting had to occur. In the midst of a meeting, the many denizens had arrived. Representatives of the southern bloc, the northern bloc, even those from the east no one spoke about had gathered in the middle point outside, where they would be met by many more no less than everyone had come.

There were the mad who had bore the rags of animal skin and eyeless tender flowers which sprouted showers of growing leeches on the ground. And the androids had come there, beating their flags, the many creatures and even the mother-prosecutor of the electrical ticks, the headless monstrosities which had small mazes embed on their skin, revealing their dark forms and filthy whispers of terror, which had sprouted from the dark. The guards were there as well, at least those who had grown attached to them and their cause.

And in the midst of that place, here stood Claire, met by them, an entire army at her disposal. More importantly, a lot of listeners who stood there waiting for a speech.

‘How did you get so many people to come on? I doubt most of you even know Malt as well as I do.’

‘Ma’am, I think we have heard enough the lad to know that there’s nothing right in this world as long as that man is lost somewhere out of place. We shall not give up and make no mistake, we won’t let him take away.’

‘They already have him.’

A mad voice had come from the dark corpse, who had developed or had shown its mad vortex floating on top of its cut off neck. From every side, it span in circles, getting as many air molecules in it as it could. Each time it spoke, several voices could be seen in unison, as well as his body had changed in many shades of dark then, vibrating and switching between all of them as soon as it happened.

‘We shall embark on this dark journey then and follow them to their base of rescue. But you, Claire shall lead us.’

‘I can’t. That’s too much for me, I wouldn’t know what to do.’

‘Then we shall look after those who can, since we cannot be trusted, it will be you, headless man.’

In truth, that creature looked like some out of this world symbiotic of a descent into obscure moist earth holes. From inside his tiny vortex, a small dark worm sprouted and began going through its maze at a speed which couldn’t have been accounted for by the common eye. It was a sight which may believe they could count on.

‘Very well, let’s do it then, let’s put that thing in the lead.’

‘All of us shall follow you, strange creature, we shall be indebt of you and make sure not to trip. Or it shall eat you.’

A quick observation could cause one to see the fact that the vortex was actually physical in that, it had been its head and mouth and source of all the whispers it had pronounced. That head had been stretched and forced into that never-ending loop which couldn’t help itself but destroy every kind of normalcy this creature had.

The androids turned and flexed their human limbs, raising their metallic fists and giving in to the electronic disease carried on by the others. Mad thoughts had not only occurred but appeared to have cleansed all others from view. It would be unkind to call into view the fact that there was agony as well as uncertainty as to where this creature would lead them.

‘Listen. You may not know what we are, but know this. We share a single consciousness caused by the constant vibrations our heads are in.

And we have observed everything which happened here throughout several of your life spans.

We have seen the androids move in through the nights, bringing in goods from their hiding spots, trading and defying every expectation each and every single one of you had. The men who had created life in their chambers when there would be neither camera to record them nor any light.’

At which they pointed at Barnabee, from where he stood. It was quite obvious that what they said had to be understood.

‘Our ways have travelled and influenced you, the architecture of the devices you see above of you. For, those were our creations as well, the makers of destruction, the givers of metal attractions.’

Next they pointed at those who had been part machine, or hid in their metal shells, pushing through, more than anything, quite aware of what was going on there. It could be less clear than what was going on there that one had to be out of another speciation to know what was going on there.

‘We have created everything you see around here.’

‘Even the guards?’

‘Even them, we have made you as well.’

‘Are you our makers?’

‘No, we have lied about that. It is our flawed sense of humor at work. We have not made you, but everything else, that is all us.’

‘Why have you make beings to harass us, like them?’

Another man asked who looked at him like some confused person would.

Everything acted up, and it was at that moment, before they could explain everything that the drills activated themselves.

‘There might not be enough time now. As soon as that Malt enters the suit, we shall be deemed unworthy to live.’

Claire stepped in as soon as she had the chance.

‘Why would anyone want him out of all the people? He’s a simpleton, I know him, there’s nothing special about him.’

‘Oh but there is. We couldn’t even begin to tell you what he’s destined to become.

Look at us, look at us and what we have become.’

This dark corpse moved nearer to one of the uniforms, pulling off its mask by force. As soon as that happened, the missing head piece came into light. It had been the sight of something so vile that no one had ever questioned it again.

‘It is us underneath those masks. But they aren’t part of the consciousness yet. No, for that, they need to make their own choice and remove it themselves. Otherwise, it would kill and break them apart, mentally as well as physically.’

‘And what about?’

‘Enough, we could tell of it later. Make haste now!’

When the pleading had ended, and they had settled on what was to be done, they followed through to where the central power had gone.

The suit we being prepared, the mask was in there and the sight which lay beneath this chapter of his life had gone. He was brought before the fence and beyond he was met by an inner courtyard, which had been hid behind a gate. The building of a central power stood pace on top of a large floor made out of the many bodies encased in metal. as he expected, they were the masked uniformed men.

‘I’m going to become one of them, aren’t I?’

Not only that, but the generators had been started. A remark to the way in which the building had been shaped could only bring one to think of brutalism, but overexposed to the dead. Two turbines had been spinning mad.

They were already planning on setting flight in order to get away. It would be highly unacceptable, now while there was still a chance for him to get away. Come to think of it, he actually raised his head and looked around him. More engines lay widespread around the courtyard. Clouds lay everywhere around them. It looked like they had already set into flight, but this giant ship they were on was getting too heavy.

He felt it, he actually felt it. Only a special chosen few were selected to survive.

‘You were chosen, you were chosen, and you were chosen.’

‘Was I?’

The many encased uniforms didn’t answer that. He might no have been chosen specifically but by mere accident. Though there wasn’t any going back now, the drills were set to go on and be active. Malt may not have been able to see it, but underneath them stood the civilized world. If one were to put and end to it, a lot of lives would be in danger.

One quick drop and fall, millions of lives would be extinguished. A feeling overcame him, one which had made him realize who they were. Many of them did look so familiar, even underneath it, they had still managed to contain their personalities through some mean or another.

He felt as if he himself would’ve felt the same. But now, he would have to be forced to be like them. As they took their break and waited for two more of them to come, he saw a small drawer being taken with them. A kind of prototypical mask was being brought, much wider, as it had a pair of shoulder extenders as well. It couldn’t be permitted for him to know anything else.

Not of the inner workings or the insides of what happened there.

‘You’re putting this on, aren’t you?’

He had remembered what Barnabee said. He would see things once they put that on his face. Whatever they had stuffed it with, only danger could be felt by him then. Malt would be afraid and paranoid, he would be caught by something nigh-impossible to avoid.

As the visor came on his face, he saw the various stuffed tiny glassy containers which had been set inside of nose. They entered it and as they had, those blue and green and red and Carmel colored puffers started producing the gases.

This sight he had been presented with explained it all. He knew why they felt the need to harass everyone then. It wasn’t the vision which had been affected but some kind of brain damage caused by the mix of various gases which had come into contact with his nostrils and reached his mind.

A vision obscured by false colors and views of the bodies which had been forced inside their uniform coffins below. He himself had been atrophied to the sight of hands and arms which were too thin to be his. More than, he looked at the sky and saw those creatures which inhibited his world and didn’t have to be seen.

Giant humanoids stood and various falling star-like claws reeked as they had been attached to maws which floated, peerless as they bred in front of him. Smaller similar creatures had been sprouted and shot from their invisible insides.

Those giants looked like him, or what he had been come, trailed around their bodies. Giant heads stood on top, wide opened at the area where their mouths had been. From one passed a dark cloud which threw lightning from its inside. As soon as it came out, it became a dark vortex which shot those bolts of pure blue inside each other's open mandibles, revealing the power glow which had come in their eyes.

Malt hadn't observed it then, but there had been tiny ticks spread around everywhere. It was those giants who had shaken their hands as to shape their cloud into a vortex which had powered the ticks. They were their source of power, towering their sour mouths and empty sockets from which came those spheres of lightning which were there. It was obvious that there was emptiness inside of them.

An empty existence which had to be stopped, as he had looked upon what they've done, he thought, what a sad life that must be. My life, boring as it is, mundane, can't compare with theirs. They stand there, rotating it before forming the dark cloud and taking it inside their bodies.

No precise reason had been given there, only that. And he had looked behind through that open gate. Many giant had been there as well, he could see the lightning and the reflection which had come from their small recording goggles. So that had been their true source of power, not the ticks, not generators which couldn't be seen, only those giant humanoids.

Though the insides didn't look like metal but some yellow dark, brown lark, a kind of bark-like texture which formed around everything. A living tool, seen by him, who had been lost and didn't know what to think,

Had it been another world? Was it a hallucination? Could the generators have been the ones who did it?

Malt couldn't tell by the toxins had killed many of his brain cells. He was being taken now.

'I want to be released, now. Let got of me, I have to ask Claire, I need her help.'

Sloppy, sloppy, ever-more, they were after him no more. The door closed inside the central power and behind, he had been found by them, who'd tower the place.

'Look, there's more to life than this place.'

'Not now, girl, we have a mission to give to.'

Behind came the entire machine that began the assault, trying to break through the wall and crush everything in their path. Though the hull of it had been dangerously hard, forced inside that plane would be some hidden place without a name. Destruction followed from their sides, and they had achieved it.

They had it all in sight. Plenty of gaps and dents had been formed in the wall, as they bounced against it in awe. One metal casing arrived, carrying all the android heads it had collected, standing tall. They had all arrived, and seemed to be on-set on the fact that Malt had to be saved.

Inside the building of the central power, it had become rather obvious what happened inside. Their vile plan would be completely set and drawn forward to no end. Such a mysterious thing as they had planned, killing everyone in time to perhaps avoid the beginning of the war.

‘Attention, all attendees, we shall set forth for the bunker immediately. Entrance five-eight-eight-one.’

A special grandness came to it then. They wouldn’t even be made aware of what was about to happen, in this grandness of hope.

Malt couldn’t regain his mind, but in that moment when he went through his psychedelic psychosis, he had entered a trance. Those numbers, he understood what they meant, countdowns. Sentenced to death, they were criminals. Brainwashed, brain-dead, beaten, and brain-starved, so many things went wrong.

Five glass walls appeared and surrounded him before he had the chance to react. There was enough room and there had been enough supplies inside for them to last enough. These creatures which had their ends caught inside one another now came to be filled with joy. Some even got arrogant and restless before realizing what had come to be.

The doors got blasted and inside they marched in. So many men and androids and guards and about everyone who had been there escaped. A failure, this had been a failure of such magnificence that it couldn’t be forgiven. Who had designed that place to be that widespread?

It would be nigh-impossible to get through so many rooms without realizing that this building would house them all. Birth-rates had been way too stable and now, each of them found themselves near the operating tables and the various apparatuses which lasted, be it well enough. One only had to find himself there, in sight.

Suddenly the androids placed the doors where they belonged.

‘Claire, now it’s time. You’re the only one who might be able to get through.’

‘Now you need me? I thought you were supposed to be the creators, I thought you had this all as a part of your grand plan.’

‘What are you talking about?’

‘This was all planned, Claire. Look around you, there’s enough places for everyone to fit in. We have managed to wrap enough people inside our small man-sized shuttles. A few billion people will be saved inside our bunker.’

And that would include you and your people as well. But Claire, you have made a good choice.'

The other dark corpse spoke.

'We have decided it would only be fair for you to have a choice of your own. After this, know that you may never meet him again down there. Amongst all those people as well as our machinations, this is what we will have achieved.

The choice of a mother and whether or not she wants to save her lover.'

She hadn't known herself that she was pregnant. But she had known now and she knew who her father had been. With each step on the metal bridge, the uniforms almost came to threaten her with their electronically compressors, yet they immediately stopped at the sight they had provided.

Now that the energy from around every other corner of the entire ship had been diverted to the small central building, it released itself from the source and flew. By the time the citizens looked at the sky, that giant platform fell immediately to a point where none may be able to resign. It had been hopeless as the destruction came and war emerged, unfathomable and in-flight destruction.

Only a few moments could be spared inside the floating building before it could get where it needed be. The sky had been filled with those floating pads and many carriers, which had taken the human life to the one safe place to be in.

'I want my husband back.'

Claire yelled as she bashed her fists against the glass case. They had already removed the prototypical helmet and appeared to have paused the process of placing him in the suit. Everything appeared calm around her, and it could only seem like he was there.

The same Malt he had known for most of her life was there. For a moment.

The entire world had been forced in a single bunker underneath the West. Not many knew what happened outside, ever since the fall of millions of atom bombs which followed. At the end of it all, the radiation had pushed itself to unfathomable levels, raising the crust of the planet into a green and yellow debauchery of floating atoms and many alkaline winds spreading disease coming from the decaying bodies.

Floating pieces of human remains helped spread about every kind of plague known to man inside the air particles through which they floated and moved aside. As they came into view of the floating pieces of shrapnel, remains of metal, floating radioactive magnetic distorted field had finally revealed its true mass of destruction.

From below and from above, a concussion field had crushed most of the vehicles, leaving behind only the broken and unresponsive remains which had their element taken from them. This defiling kind of mess had taken to itself no doubt to what it had been. It had been the end of ten billion lives, souls which had been ripped from their bodies and left outside.

Below the ground, life was ill. Conditions were poor. Most births haven't gotten through. Most groups had been separated and left in systems of chambers which spread and moved at intervals. Some spaces had connected to various supply rooms which contained the bare minimum for the obscure needs.

But those chambers which connected rooms had wheels to them. They were vehicles which had to be droved and acted accordingly. One designated droved lay for everyone and in that underworld bunker there had been enough space for everyone to drive and live by.

It would be hard for friendships and relationships to be established, but that had been only the price to pay for it. For establishing this perfect system of perforation, as some enchantments had been made by the underground engineer class.

'Nadya, I need you to look after your father today. I don't think he's feeling fine.'

The girl looked up from above her plain shirt. Her dad had been dead for eight years, at least that's what the number on the collar around his neck said. Either it was going bonkers, or he wasn't her actual father.

'Come one Nadya, call Ivan. We're having dinner.'

Nadya still didn't understand. Ivan had been dead as well. His body had been placed near his father, apparently he had been killed by him. No collar included.

Dinners like these were peculiar. There was so much on Anna's mind. She had been the driver, the piler, the defiler, the one who cleaned and took care of her children while her husband was off at work.

The bed in which he had been place was a tiny modified mine cart, which had its railings and wheels taken out, and had two rounded fans made out of metal attached on each end. She always looked around the room expecting something new.

But that plain room was all painted white, with strips of metal attached around each corner above from which the air came in. On the reverse, on the floor, it had been the same.

So much hot air coming in. A pair of toys stood broken on the floor, mostly Ivan's, but he wasn't going to use them anyway. An oil stained shirt somewhere thrown across the room and mainly unpacked boxes stood waited in the corner. It was weird how the rest of them actually trust her, as even Nadya knew that this woman wasn't right in the head.

'What are we eating now?'

‘The outsiders.’

On the food tray, there stood an eight headed Dandrillon. They had been bunker-meat creatures, biologically engineers to act like cattle but grow like plants and act passively while being “hunted” down. Their bodies had looked like blown cacti, with the texture of tendered pig-skin, giant heads emerging from the top, having small tubes and claws and a crust which grew inside their mouth formations as to prevent any retaliation.

While extracting and splicing the various DNA codes from various creatures, the result had been some kind of mutation and some left-over limbs which interacted gravely to one another’s grasps. They had been frustratingly erect, grown only to be dissected and eaten away.

The taste replicated a various arrangement of animals which ranged from rooster to cattle, to fish and in-between, resulting in every nutrient which was needed. But every new generation grew wilder and began fighting their natural impulses. Now they’d fight and out of spite, they’d go ahead, trying to strive on their own appetite.

Out there, they formed packs, moving without their legs but dragging in the dirt regions which had been designated for their growth alone. Despite this dinner being only one eighth of its body with the heads present, Nadya noticed some small horn-like hornets popping out of the body. It was clear that they couldn’t keep being safe inside their own bunker.

Not there, where they had suddenly formed a worming connection between them. Each had their squealing bodies connect with one another, bringing their heads closer together. The inner acid which had been developed over generations, though it may have been harmless to humans had melted their necks, and welded their own heads together. They’d form many headed terrors far away from the others, laying in hiding as they grew.

For sustenance, they only needed to eat the dust mice which flew around and formed about everywhere. As long as that had been the case, they would be nigh-immortal and ever-growing. And more head meant their minds could only develop.

‘Are you doing well Nadya?’

‘Of course mother, if I may.’

‘Go ahead, dear, make any wish you want and I shall do my best to grant it.’

‘I want to step outside and meet Mare.’

As the words slipped out of her mouth, she immediately went ahead and activated the device atop her father’s bed. Both he and Ivan had been sealed shut.

The other beds had still been retracted underneath the floor. about everything had been, from the drawers, the bathrooms, the intersecting walls as well as the other and tighter level they had been instructed to get down to in case something happened.

The other room had passenger seat taken by default. A man named Ulrich worked towards being an inventor. He remembered his plan well enough.

‘One day I shall become a great inventor and I shall cure the world outside.’

He dreamed of bringing life above the bunker. Only his twisted imagination could bring out the worst things to mind, the destruction which had come and brought only the most disparaging of efforts he needed to keep him alive.

Out of the few people inside their “mover”, or how they called their machine, Ulrich had contemplated ending his life a few too many times. What he would reverse-engineer now was some new life-form which would life outside and clean the place. Either that or they’d adapt and carry on the torch of being human for them. Nothing else mattered, other than this end-goal of his.

A pause of thought occurred. He had achieved it all over again, a new kind of life form created inside his cage. It was easier to keep them in check. This tiny baboon, with his face split in a swoon of many moving fish-scale extensions which came out of its head but retained the hairy texture and the skin wasn’t dead.

It should’ve been by now. He had taken twenty to eight pins and he had strapped in all of the scales. They were moving even then, trying to raise themselves. It didn’t help that its arms and legs had been pulled inside, giving some additional growth inside their small scale-girths. That baboon lumped itself into a ball and from there on after it waited.

A half-man into a box, that was his first major breakthrough, or so he hoped. Ulrich hadn’t done it yet but he hoped to achieve it.

Out of everyone, he had been the most untrustworthy, because everyone had been aware of his experiments.

Five knocks on each door. They opened and into the main area, between the room-compressions and the driver’s entrance, these survivors stood on a few handpicked chairs. It had been a nice way to meet there, in that eight-squared, sided glance, where they had looked at everything they kept in their storage facility.

It was a great view, what they owned. In one of the rooms which didn’t belong to them, there had been stored simple things, like food, electrical appliances, spare lights, and some dangerous tools which could only be accessed by a multi-key entry with acquired permission from everyone aboard.

Anna and Ulrich kept looking at one another, distracted by the retina of their eyes.

There were other four in the room as well. Jonathan, Deva, Ollroy and Rolls, but most of them were decent folk who weren't interested in the politics of the crew. For them, it had been much easier to enjoy themselves there rather than be drawn inside it. Clearly, they had been a match to be held in contempt with what was going on.

'They're at again.'

'It's going to be that way until the day we'll all be resting on our graves.'

'Lave her alone, you know she had a child with her.'

'We know that, Deva, but you know she's our drive and that she's out of her mind.'

Ollroy looked around. So many pieces were strapped beneath the anchor of the deck. It was obvious that no one had been content with what had been going on there, it was a sloppy job by the mere look of how everything had been arranged. Tables underneath, slightly raised so many miscalculations near the distance and that.

A monitor, a legacy edition which had been given a feed of what was going on outside. Everything had been obscured by the limited sight. Every now and then another mover would come into view which would force them to stop. It was interesting, how much they had been given there.

One day they were in their laboratories, homes, outside, and the next they woke up there. It had been peculiar, but so was the time. Some of them woke up with collars, but not all of them. And each bore numbers which had little no to explanation or reason for them. Nothing made sense, yet they settled with dealing with the stress and what was going down there however they wanted.

'I think I heard something, it came from Rolls' room.'

'What? My room doesn't have anything going on in it. I've done nothing to you Jonathan. You can't invade my private space.'

'But I've heard something from inside of it. Don't tell me you got something inside of it? We can't even leave the movers, we're not the ones given a suit.'

Which was indeed the reason why everyone based them on picked and defined jobs they had to carry on. Each had a job of their own with which they would have to comply with the rest of their lives. It was how it had to be.

Tension was present but the levels were fine. It couldn't be any better then, than it had been before.

'We'll see then.'

As the party approached, there had been the first signs of unrest and defiance.

‘Someone entered my room. But how? When? I never leave my room.’

Everyone turned to Rolls and stroke at him with looks of pity and amusement. This man would be looked down upon for the rest of his life down there, in that metal box.

Why, he was shaking around his ankles, his arms had been wrapped, his eyes were depigmented, and he had been caught off guard then. Someone had actually managed to place something there, a small object which didn't belong yet.

But that was one of the movers.

They haven't been made aware of then, but the movers were vehicle-like death traps, programmed to draw their walls inwardly until they would be crushed and killed. That death trap could be avoided only if they could overcome the nature, if only they could.

Many of the movers had been lost, having crushed themselves and the people inside of them to the point of complete annihilation. The air in the bunker had been limited and wouldn't last forever. It was obvious that it had become less of a bunker once the metallic delimiting walls had been penetrated and some of the movers started making their way through the dirt.

But out there, outside, they had reigned alone. In a plane where life couldn't survive, they had manifested physical forms. Those giant humanoids now sparked no more, as they exchanged clouds of pure toxic radiation, a neurotic gas which lit their eyes green. Now that they had their way, they continued walking in their newly acquired world.

Their servants had done well, and now they had been given what they wanted. As petty of creatures and mindless as the headless ones were, now they would torment the human beings until they would be eventually dead. It had been the plan and the exchange between the two. Clearly, instilled in them, had been the difference between their kind.

While the giants enjoyed this chaotic destruction which had happened, the tinier ones enjoyed a limited unity which they didn't want to share. They wanted the world below the bunkers to be clean and less disturbed. It is for that reason why the metallic movers would completely destroy themselves in such a manner that they would leave no trace at all.

And if it did, it would be as well, for everything else would be obscured by the vision.

For now, the world only moved below, outside it had stopped. Nothing could grow or stray ahead, everything was eight caught off guard or dead.

‘I need to return to my work now. If I stop, I swear, I'll have no other option but wait for the cruel embrace of death.’

‘You’re being way too dramatic Victor, you’ll overwork yourself to death otherwise. Can’t you see that there’s only the two of us left? The other four colleagues had hanged themselves already.’

‘Why do you have to keep remind me that, Lara?’

‘It’s your memory problems. Ever since they all went out, there’s nothing to keep you in line. There’s something about you who prevents you from moving on and you keep drowning yourself in work.’

‘Lara, you know I have to. I can’t explain it, but I have to. I am meant to this.’

‘But it’s pointless, you’re only turning a lever back and forth.’

‘It’s doing something, I know it is. Perhaps it could be sending a message for help.’

It wasn’t. There wasn’t any confirmation that it was going anything. From what he could tell, he acted as if all of his efforts could eventually raise the dead. Perhaps they could. Every now and then, unrelated to what he was doing, there would be some kind of shaking of the entire room. Without a doubt, he thought that had been it.

But, it came at irregular intervals, the fact of which he had simply ignored because there wasn’t any way of checking it. What else would there be?

She, the woman who had been him wasn’t his wife. They never married. There wasn’t any priest in any of the movers down there. It could’ve been long avoided by then, if one were to take a leap for their tiny groups.

‘Well, if that’s the case, I won’t have any other option than to crash our home into some place where they may never find us.’

‘Don’t do that, if you do it, then I won’t have any other option than die here. And I don’t want to die.’

‘What are you going to do then? Wait for someone to rescue us then cut off a chunk of the floor so you could take your lever with you?’

Get your damn senses back together, man.’

‘I’m trying my best, Lara, but can’t you see I’m suffering here? It’s all I do, it’s the only thing I know I can handle. There’s nothing else I’m good at.’

‘So that’s it? You’re going to keep turning until you won’t be able to do it any longer, right? There’s no way for you to change your mind, is there?’

Victor had looked into it far too much. He had made plans for the future, exactly how he would do them was quite peculiar indeed. A piece of his stomach had been removed and attached to a waste compactor, attached and shove deeper in him, which only helped disperse the waste. As a matter of fact, between the rest of his friends who had ended their lives, he had been relatively filled with joy. It felt like this mover had been made solely for him.

Out of all of them, he had been given the easiest of task. If one was given the job of maintenance, he had hanged himself with an electric cord, removing the electricity from his chamber while feeling helpless no more. Another had the responsibility of the waste disposal, but he had succumbed to the fact that there were too many tubes which had to be attached and too many buttons and functions and combinations which couldn't be forgotten.

But it had been clean, and he had found a way to disperse the excess oil which had scourged the like of drawing inward and forward in the various machines which were there. Less than kindly aware of it, there had been those filthy hidden boxes which laid everywhere.

This Malcolm had been tricked. He had thought it a valuable component of the kind and he had become so aware of it that he realized something of its importance. One sniff had been enough to send him in a rampage of tool destruction which had eventually become the death of him.

No longer would he feel pain and remorse. His eyes were filled with the grey and black which had become the oil at that moment. In which he suffered a concussion as the lower level, which hadn't killed him but forced him to come into contact with the whispers from above.

Even after so many levels he could hear them crying high and mightily, forcing him to give in and meet that thing which made him suffer until the very end. They strangled him, with his distant arms. Out of all of them, the circumstances of his death were the most unexplainable. Everyone there showed the marks around their necks, which had been either forced by the collars, or by mere strangulation by some cord or rope.

But for him, there wasn't space, there wasn't any tool which was used. Only the suspicion of murder.

Victor remembered that. He had been there, in the same spot, removed a piece of his body and pushing it in one of the raised evaporators, in which his body canteen had been released of all the waste. It felt like yesterday, the day it happened.

'There's been another suicide. On the lower levels, Malcolm is dead.'

The words had brought quite some shaking of the bones, of the paranoia, of the metal hall they were in. Even then it shook. Not that it was much higher, as it was lower now. But he had merely started thinking that he was slowly losing his sight. He was seeing a much lower kind of metal perdition than there had been.

Clearly one had to look closer, but, if one was focusing on it.

'He can't be dead.'

‘I checked on his pulse, though that had been pointless, since I saw the cause of it.’

‘How?’

‘Someone had strangled him, crushing his neck until there was only one piece of it left connecting it to the rest of the body.’

The body had remained there, from what he could tell. But Lara checked on it from time to time. Every time she headed down there, she found a missing piece of it. First the head had been gone. It must’ve rolled over.

Then two arms, a foot, and entire leg, a piece of the torso. No open wounds visible, as whatever had taken them made sure the rest of the gaps had been sealed and left there without a trace of them having been messed with it.

But if there had been one thing which wasn’t going to be taken sooner, that had been the collar with the numbers on it. Those never went down, though, they only went forward.

It was obvious now that whoever was doing that to them wanted to have some kind of satisfaction and in-fighting between them. Now that only the two of them remained, there’d be no explanation to what would be acceptable and what could go off without question. On a dark scale, the metal ware started acting up.

There were mounds of raised ground scales from around an area. More movers were being brought on their level. It was by means of elevation that contact could be established.

A confined mover housed four men, all of whom who hated one another and hadn’t cared for anything but their own mission. Each had taken onto himself that he would eventually do something to outdo the other by any means necessary.

In there, it had been permanently dark like inside, as that had been an act of vindication for the mere fact that they would work unceasingly and uninterrupted by their interactions. If they couldn’t see one another, then they could focus. If there wasn’t anything around their empty chambers, then they could focus. But there was one distinction between all of them. It had been the collars.

Each of them had been strapped and there in the dark a voice came at last. That had been a secluded chamber in which this stranger appeared.

‘I am android OI. Mark of sixteen valves spinning, are you in need of something?’

‘Who is this? Is this some kind of poor attempt at misdirection? Are you trying to get me to destroy my own devices?’

I won’t take kindly to that. You may have found a way to disable your notation but.’

His voice cut off as an orange light came from one of his visors. There hadn't been that much power to fully illuminate the room but it had been right enough for him to see what was going on around his face. Only one part of it had been that of a man, but he got a close look to it. For someone of about forty years old, his skin was yellowish sick, his unaltered eye had been frozen in place, moving only at some few and far in-between breaks.

Another one had been surrounded by a metallic implant which was connected with the rest of the metal helmet he bore. That wasn't real skin either, but a mere plastic imitation. Without a doubt, that wouldn't be easily breakable by no fish or by deranged attempt.

'I've come to deliver this. Free of charge, nothing for it.'

He brought him a bucket of screws and bolts and a few electric parts, a spanner and a hammer, and a small conduit which would work well in connection to about anything which had an opening.

'Where did you come from? Were you created by the engineers?

Or are you one of theirs?'

'Accept it and carry on. Your work is valuable. There's a benefactor which decided that you are to be chosen out of your colleagues to receive aid.'

But there was something the android hadn't told him yet. They had all received visits from it and didn't seem to care much about it. Clearly there was a misunderstanding which was to be ignored.

A new generation of machines was to be born below. And they looked like no human being at all. No, these were going to be dangerous servants. It was by their design, that each of them in part, if they were to be created would finally solve the problem of the sudden extinction they had been made aware.

a few months ago.

'There, I saw it, I saw it with my very own eyes. Look, fellows, there it is. The chamber had suddenly moved a fraction of an inch then.'

'What if you're seeing things? You senile looking bastard. '

'Well, then measure it.'

He had been right, and he was no old man, indeed, he had been closer to being white haired because of some mutation which occurred to him. It had been intimidating, to say the least, working against that time bomb. It was for that reason that they worked in the dark.

Their minds were so strong that they acted by feel and touch, memory alone. It could be enacted then, but one should know better than that.

‘Here’s a remote light, use it. No one should be able to see through the gaps of the door and you should be able to deactivate it at any time if you will it.’

As a man of science, he knew that the real cause, for which the light hadn’t been working, if he had to be honest himself and not lie, had actually been a power-shortage. But that explanation didn’t serve his ego. No, it wouldn’t, instead he chose to move ahead. Sooner or later he’d be left behind.

It wasn’t right. The android was missing his bottom half.

‘Taken for spare parts, someone needed it more than I had. We are often repurposed and taken out there. Beware though, there’s something out which had been released in your level. Do not make any effort to change your position yet.’

‘But what of the rations?’

‘We have refilled them. But ask no question of who we are, as that isn’t exactly what’s expected of us to say.’

In the blink of an eye, he had been lowered down. Lowered down farther than it was either expected or that he even thought it was possible. The man was the only one out of the four of them who had a glimpse of how many pieces worked together to make the bunker working.

Below the mover there wasn’t ground, a plate of metal which had been sanctioned in pieces which had moving pumps activating and pulling down the elevator. Even the pockets of dirt had been a ruse, only creating the illusion that there was a way out if they were to break the fuselage, or the metal walls surrounding them entirely.

The bunker was completely sealed.

‘Lara, I think I remember something important.’

‘What is it Victor?’

‘I think I know who did it.’

‘What are you talking about?’

‘I think I know who killed everyone. Malcolm, Ferdinand and the other two.’

‘You don’t actually remember their names do you?’

‘There’s too much on my mind. I can’t be expected to remember everything.’

Blockage in the system, what followed were a few turns inside the level. Most of them wouldn’t have questioned or even bothered knowing about them, but this was different. There were a few things which couldn’t have been taken into question. First the need to take care or to look as if one would be aware of what was going on there.

For now, those who were out exploring with their tiny light filaments had been greeted by absolute nothing. Many of the machines had a programming which prevented them from being crushed by them.

‘Another one of them is on their way.’

‘Wave at them, no, point towards the opposite direction, they need to be made aware that they’re not invited here. They’re simply not welcome here, you know?’

‘I think I understand what’s going on now.’

‘Do you, or is it a hunch? Did that thing make it obvious or what?’

He pointed at a lower level, which shouldn’t have been there. Not only that, but they weren’t even aware that it was supposed to act that way, any of them. Their first sight of their cattle having been gone wrong was into sight. A wagon made out of many heads seemed to be reeling in. Not only it had been dangerous to be approached by anyone living but it was clear that there couldn’t be any way to look and stay clear out of it.

Dangerous, maybe, but without a doubt one couldn’t make it in one piece of a stride. If they knew what those things would be on their way to become, they’d be turned out of place.

‘There, I think they got the message, I see that they’re turning. What about it? Should we simply try stamping it?’

‘Not yet, I suppose it won’t be able to climb away from sight. So, let it do whatever it wants.’

There was at least a hint of exposure there. Their bodies which had been planted in the designated dirt was supposed to help them stay clear of the toxins which were present in the bunker. As a side note, it had been discovered by a doctor Nicholas, of one of the unknown movers that the bunker had a special kind of bacteria which killed radiation.

As long as it was allowed to breed inside it, any kind of foreign element would be eaten. That had been an unknown fact to many of the people in hiding. What they did know was the fact that this bacteria caused some kind of degeneration of the skin. It drew the minerals from the body or the host and made it much weaker than it had been, previously, before the so-called exposure to it.

It seemed that without the host soil to keep them fresh and revitalized, they started growing much weaker, especially in those forms. They were being drained, not killed, but that would soon come. At least four of the heads had died and were encompassed in their acid, rotting while the others got affected by its mild form of necrosis.

Had it spread sooner, there would've been a chance to get through. But this wasn't what made it feel in awe. Something else had done it. And that had been taken as soon as they would know that something was going on. Clearly, to the benefit of either of them, they kept going.

'Leave them, eventually they'll simply die off. We have to take into account the possibility that there might be others in a similar situation like it.'

'And what if they are?'

'They could mutate, and we can't stand the risk.'

Slowly, farther aware, some area began being lit. Metal revealed itself as well as the surface which could have other things transferred them onto it. A dreadful manifestation had come to show itself there. The frightful cattle marched towards the point. If would have no soil to breathe from, it would have a sun.

'We need to take care that no one find out about us again.'

'And those we brought here?'

'They were all placed in their respectable cells. Worry not about it, they should all be singing down our play. Deceitful or not, we should be able to convince them that we're not responsible for it.'

'What of that?'

'I shall allow it. It should be stamped out eventually. Come, if we worry too much about it, we'll miss on the play.'

They moved and listened, seeing what was witnessed by others of their own kin. Finally so many of them had joined their rank and now they could finally sit and relax.

Two movers had intersected in the distance. It looked like this relationship, or bashing had damaged both of them. Despite there being a process in which either stood in danger of being crushed on the inside, this hadn't been the case any longer. They broke it.

And it didn't bode well with whoever was taking care of their destruction. A familiarity had come in a final decision which had taken upon itself to break the boundaries between them and cut the frames which separated them. The first step came. The symbiosis had damaged the walls between four chambers which had become one but this had been a first.

Though they were only two groups of strangers who hadn't even dared look upon one another, with the exception of a vague sight from the cockpit of the driver, they seemed like a foreign or some alien element. Both wore different clothes which were colored, canvassed, painted, had messages, words, plenty of things which weren't right at all.

Not only that, but there had been a vague impression that neither of them had any trust to land to the other party.

First contact established.

'Greetings neighbors, I suppose we should introduce ourselves first.'

This soldier stepped in. He had been the main view they had, but only because he was the only one to have been seen carrying a revolver on him. It had been holstered but that was enough to repel any attempt.

'So you're the ones who've done it.'

A jolt made everyone come back to life. They were aware of the moving plates by now.

'We should establish a hierarchy, quick. I have reasons to believe we might be in danger.'

'What for? Everyone should stand on their sides. because you have a revolver that doesn't mean you can order us around.'

'I can still do without so many mouths to feed. Don't make me do it now.'

A lot of tension remained.

One thousands lands flickered then. In the next few minutes, light would be established. Now that the surrounding area had finally been revealed, it was time to see where they were. Rail brandings lay about everywhere. The insides of the bunker seemed like rebrandished metals from about everywhere in the outside world. But those were only the addition on the side.

It had been clear enough that contact was to be established momentarily. The movers stopped responding tot their pilots and now, instead of receding, they started moving and extending in the empty space. Suddenly, everyone who had been inside stood in their places, frozen as to the fact that there was something to be had in there, this fear of being displaced.

'Look out.'

'Move aside, it should be safe as long as we don't make a move. stand aside and try not to get hurt, do you understand?'

'Hold me please, I think I'll fall.'

Various clicks could be heard outside as the metal started making contact in the empty space. There wasn't any way of knowing what would happen there, but seemingly aware of it, one could draw the conclusion of being trapped. Walls had been drawn from above, from places which gave no impression of there being any kind.

It would be obvious what they'd be after. That thing which made them so much more than aware that there'd be something in there unsuited for either one. An entire level of the bunker became a complex set of interlocked spaces separated by rooms.

This had been hard to deal with, especially with the armed men, who had immediately found themselves in their vicinity.

'Drop it, it won't take me too much to get both of you down.'

'Wait, wait, we're not alone.'

As soon as the doors opened, they finally got themselves surrounded by at least eight other men, all of which bore rifles, small handguns and even a bow. An actual bow with a big eye gone through its shaft.

'Well, it looks like we're off shot now.'

It was clear that there wasn't any way to get through it easily. One would have to pay a lot of attention to it. Not that it would matter for as long as they cared.

But through the cracks, there stood, a force which had forced them to look above them. If there was one thing which hadn't been planned it was for the presence of the evolved cattle there. Those thin walls bent easily and behind them there moved those long headed bastards who had found a new way to deal with themselves. Clearly, that had been it, a way for them to survive.

As the intensity of the toxin cleared, they could move freely through the cracks and breed through the act of war. It would be dangerous. No one would care for as long as there was one means of starvation and action. But they bent the walls and spread far and wide.

This frightened everyone who had observed it, without exception. It couldn't be questioned then, but this had been it. It had been a disturbing approach which only made it worse, as they began growing in their tiny spots.

Sheer size wouldn't do it alone. One could draw at least the way of pushing through the masses, only to absorb the sight which finally came into life.

Though they may have started as mere cattle, one could make the fine perception between what they were intended to be and what they had become. Their many heads weren't supposed to hang that way, not through that sort of angle in which they became a giant dome which in which they had all welded themselves together with the held of the acid.

Not only that but they had become intelligent. From inside their bodies, they took out tubes, which had helped them spray their own pieces in this weird acid. Sooner or later, this would have to change as well. And no longer would it simply melt but help growth. And the growth had done well enough to manifest itself then.

White plasters of moving raised pins pushed through them. If it wasn't clear before, it had been now. Someone was watching through the shroud of metal at it, and how it tried getting in. Many legs struggled to push forward but then, as the toxin would come in as well, the hole sealed.

A plague of metal had appeared, like some thin and precisely manifested disc of iron cut through the head and began shaping itself into the form on the extrusion in the case. That thing wasn't supposed to be there, but it had appeared nonetheless. Below fell the remains, which were still alive, moving in a weird manner which begged the question of there being a chance for them that they might not get through unless they ran.

By the time they had reached the doors, which long sprays of acid had penetrated the back of their heads, killing them instantly from all directions. It drew near, as disemboweled as it had been, pushing and beginning to it.

The result of the exposure could be reverted. Necrosis would be averted from it and now he would finally be well. It was something it couldn't tell immediately, but it wanted the satisfaction. The light in the room faded.

Ten-four, by the times the number had been set forth. One of the lowest levels had been reproduced to the scale of the original design, almost to a perfect copy, with the slight exceptions of a lack of drills and one thing which had defined it well enough, that being the fact that movers would now and then make noise as they attempted to break through the guarded area.

Many guards lay lobotomized and dead as well, with a small black box now being inserted inside each one of their eighty percent missing mass of the head. The vortex had been completely destroyed and the mask now stood completely broken.

If there was someone who had been missed, that was Malt. Without the guards being there either, anarchy laid. There was some ruin in there, especially since there wasn't any power left. Standing at the ruin of the park between which the crashed blocs stood a fire. The madmen actually started one there. It had been incredible how much time had been spared for it.

But then again, it hadn't looked any different either. It was still filled with the same atmosphere which made it so distant than it were.

A carrier filled with tick's stool flinging small bolts of blue light. A few marshmallows balls had been clamped and most of the androids had gathered and filled the city with everything they found out there. It seemed more so, with every passing day that it was more of their thing than anything other. Not less important it had been what was going on in their minds.

'So, both Claire and Malt disappeared, huh?'

'I suppose they did.'

It wasn't all that important any longer. They couldn't be set on one thing which was the next line of work. Now that there wasn't any disturbance and any central power, the devices on their doors having stopped, they were free. Without realizing they were free.

'Well, shall we at least try getting through with it?'

'Fine, first line of reason, the same as yesterday, we are to set the plan for tomorrow.'

'Which is?'

'I personally think we should ask the androids for a way outside. They seem to know the ins and outs of this place.'

'Never, don't question it any less, no longer, don't look into it.'

'I shall become the executioner.'

A voice shouted. He was a no one, a no one who had stretched his arms and prepared the palm of his hand. Whatever coursed through his veins wasn't good. But he was recognized.

'That's Sterl!'

Now known as the executioner, he looked down on an android that was kneeling in front of him, with the back of his head fully exposed.

'Don't do it Sterl, this isn't worth it? We need them to get forward here, please, don't do this!'

But this executioner acted on his own impulse to execute.

There was something in the eyes of this one. He lost his mind, and now he'd start a war over it. Every android stood then, watching. So had the man and the machines and the creatures, exposure still hadn't had a way to full enter this place.

It was almost as if there had been a toxin in it which devoured the very toxin which had been around.

But besides it, this one thing threatened to break the balance which had been observed. As the many androids had been already wide-spread in their quest on defiance, this one thing threatened everything they had worked on in secret for so many years.

‘I must complete my work and create the machine, I must prevent the destruction.’

‘The next race, the next one, I must create the descendants.’

‘Click clack, must tap the switch, Lara, I must know. I know who did it. It was you Lara, it was you.’

‘I don’t find you trust worthy, I don’t find you either. Please, allow me to leave this room, I can’t stand here any longer.’

‘Ivan is dead, mother, so is dead. Move on from it. Everyone knows what you’re hiding mom, please move on. I can’t stand it how it ruins you.’

‘They’re moving, everyone, everything is going on unexpected, we must bring it to a stop before they take notice.’

‘Bring help, they’re eating humans, the cattle had gone mad, they’re.’

Unimportant to this, he returned.

In that moment of anger and distaste, the executioner stopped. Everyone followed in his track and appeared to be not paying any more attention to it any longer. Something in him had been vaguely unnerving. He was afraid.

That was the man everyone had been looking for, wearing no mask. Being the simple looking man he had always been. Barnabee couldn’t believe his eyes. In all the years he had been experimenting in creating life, nothing had been as mad as this. It was almost as if the world had become a wicked dream from which there’d be no escape out of. No nightmare, for it was too mundane for it.

Creatures bowed, machines followed, and it was almost as if everyone had decided that they owed allegiance to the man.

‘Listen to me. Now, I need your help. I don’t know where Claire is, so, please help me.’

And as the sudden burst of rage which had been felt in his voice faded, he threw what he had carried for so long in his hand. The body of one the creators, the architects of the world, his charred body bouncing and twisting in the partially alive abomination it had become.

‘They appeared like they fell into their own trap now. They fell victim to their own poison. It was not them who made this world, they are liars. All of them all, I think we’ve all been deceived.’

For what he showed them was a body which had the head of a cattle transplanted in its gut. First it had devoured its head, and then it had been brought down. It was obvious, he was planning on hiding again in one of them, to repeat the same ruse and pretend they were something they were not.

‘I think they’re all up there, somewhere, dressed in the same way these creatures are. We must stop them before another one of these things comes.’

‘Malt, you barely returned. What does all this even mean?’

‘We must fight, that’s what it means, that we may survive. I have been out there, in the world beyond. I have met the men, the engineers, and the people. And.’

He took a moment to look around. Someone took his house. Malt wasn’t pleased by it. Neither of them had been his friends after all, only his acquaintances, so neither of them had been deserving of it.

Someone had a lot of explanation to come up with. No one wanted to speak. Everyone gathered around him, as they were drawn to this man they barely knew or had been vaguely interested in. With little in mind about it, there had been some vague dependency they felt towards him.

It hadn’t mattered that the androids couldn’t see humans as being right at all. With their visors, they were more than often staring at their insides than at their faces, the vision going a tiny bit farther away than the mere layer of their clothes. This Malt held something in him, but it wasn’t to be spoken off yet.

‘It doesn’t matter. We’ll march out there, with this.’

As he clapped, the automated system of the mover had kicked in. Whatever had happened for it to be as wide and strong as it had looked resulted in the supreme prototype they all looked upon. Things worked fast down there. Inside of there, there was this robot. It was still in the earliest concept of design, but it had managed to stave off the growth which threatened everything.

More so, he had looked into it for one or two times. The blinding rage he felt couldn’t have defied any other expectations that were there.

But they immediately marched in, even the executioner, indeed he came.

‘Now, listen, there’s not going to be any chance for us unless we pledge ourselves to the cause. We shall call ourselves the Coalition, then, the Collation of Malt.’

That had been too well to be true. He had gotten ahead of himself a tiny bit too quick for his own good. Whatever it had been, they looked at him with little knowledge of understanding.

‘What do you want of us?’

‘I need to each pick up a room and work a task. Everything has been modified accordingly to. To, to...’

He had seen them before. Malt hadn’t known what happened then. Everyone gave in too quick and after all that happened, this made him sick. He didn’t feel like he was there at all. No, the mask was still on, and he was damaged in the head. It would at least explain why he didn’t focus on anything major. That thing inside his gut kept him alive and kicking.

No, this wouldn’t be right. No one should’ve expected it, no one who’d dare to behave in that manner. A long time ago, he had been ripped from the place where he spent most of his life. All because he had been curious, right, in that moment where his senses had acted up and he decided to step it. For that reason he had dared stop the execution, otherwise, he wouldn’t have cared for another death.

But he thought he had been placed on that table, waiting for some kind of execution to be had. It repulsed him to think about it. Wonderingly aware of it, there was something which truly made him look at that reason. He would reach some kind of mild staring, the point where he couldn’t focus on anything any longer.

‘I shall make sure you suffer now.’

The glass had been thick enough now. A loss of focus had been brought to completion. It couldn’t be anything to be dismissed.

‘Don’t worry, I’ll start pulling pieces of you now.’

‘You’re not supposed to talk.’

Malt said in the dizziness.

The man pulled his mask off. He looked exactly like Malt. Oh, the confused look on Clair, and on everyone as they were put to sleep was well, it felt right.

‘Don’t worry, I won’t break you. I only wanted to have them all in one place. Pull off your masks.’

No vortexes. None at all, but his face, that had been the secret after all. It was why everyone felt so drawn to him. He had been the original. Not the one present there, in the location they had all been set to meet, inside the mover that being. But this Malt, the mundane, who may have suffered, not for the first time, some hit to the head.

He recovered from it. And for that reason he was special. Everyone down there had received enough to wager some kind of lobotomy. Looking back over the many times he had been in the bloc, he’d see people acting up.

Borby, who had finished a trade stood in his room with a bunch of ants inside his glass hide. They were forming their colony inside the glass dirt which had been set inside. Those were glass ants as well, which meant that when he were to apply enough heat, he could melt them, forming the small pouches which were set engrained in the holes they dwelled in.

He had taken a liking into doing that, forcing them to coil around and draw their own. But it had only been a child's play compared with his other project. This Borby filled his room with the cheapest, most useless utensils. Old things that didn't work at all, even after so many years of abandonment and reconstruction, everything he collected was still there.

But back to what he had acquired. No one knew that his roommate, Teery had gone missing. He had extracted the essence from the glass ants and had inserted into him.

'My excuses, friend, I have done my best to put back every missing piece of your lower body, but I may have missed a few pieces. You weren't planning on leaving any time sooner, were you?'

Only the silence confirmed it. He was a bust of glass, cracked on the inside, very little of him being alive. He had done something on himself as well. Borby wanted to be with him, and for that reason alone he had injected himself with the same kind of solution which started turning him as well.

Rumors started, talking of a man who had been standing too much time inside. People spoke often of it.

And by the time his apartment had been broken in, a part of the floor had been overcome by it. The guardsman proceeded into breaking him apart and repurposing it at that. It had been one of the few occasions in which they broke through.

He had seen the world outside, Malt, out of everyone, he had been out there. Not stranded on the flying ship, but out there, in some form. There were green field of flatness, which had tiny sharp hairs which could cut through metal.

Around them moved a set of forlorn stranded whales which had to endure the many bodies it had eaten over the years. Inside of it, the digestive system had malfunctioned, pushing through the end of its other functioning insufficiencies. Other than that, it waited. From the poked holes inside of it, there was something which escaped.

A mist from the dead whale, as it had stopped for the last time. The bodies and the organs of the whale had struck a deal. Both would work together and escape from it, forming large clusters made out of them, connected by the sheer desire to survive. Sometimes they would become long, other times, they'd spread enough to replicate many wide-spread legs.

He had seen that, as the green connected to the blue land. Where green wasn't present but the buildings had erupted from the red, inside marble quarries. It was neat and cold down there. He had entered it and spoke to one of the sculptors.

'Oh, I see you're trying to replicate the Greeks. What a marvelous folk. Are you aware that they had mastered everything?

How I wish I lived there amongst them. My life would've been complete if I were an ancient Greek sculpture.'

'Young man, can't you see that I'm trying to concentrate? Why, someone needs to revive the art. Someone needs to bring the old back. It was then that the malign ended and where dreams had been reached by the craftsman in service of their gods.'

'I see. But would you not spare a moment that I may ask, why is it that you're alone? I see that they're all dead, lying on empty stools, bleeding, killed, no, themselves. They killed themselves, haven't they?'

'For this legacy, no one might spare anything less than their entire essences. Listen to me, oh, young man. Leave this place. We have all failed to bring back the dream. Is it not sad that after so many attempts so many of them gave up?'

'It is. Especially since you got so close to it, why is that everyone gave up?'

'My naive youngling, it is because they already reached the epitome of art. There's no need for them now, no one wants to live in the past.'

'But I do. Please, I'd do anything to live there, a moment longer.'

But Malt grasped his face and looked away in shame. He ran as far and couldn't look back at the disgrace which had been the world. So much chaos everywhere and he didn't know whether or now what he was seeing had been worth.

'I will find a way to gain true sight of what's in front of me. One way or another, I shall see it.'

Malt declared and to his splendor laid some hope.

That inside the bunker, there'd be a way for the movers to stop their limited clocks of life.

'My body is being taken now.'

Said the resident of Mover Claw, named after the great hero who had snapped his arm to escape his own rage. A great sacrifice for a great man. There, it would be that he'd end.

One never gets to enjoy the insides of a Mover for its full appearance and the way it looks. That wild thing, which spread below had been.

They spoke now, and in the dark their bodies began growing. One gift of evil from their gods, they have started taking in their appearance, with the only despair being the fact that they had been given their heads in return. It had been awful, the way in which they looked upon the residents on that level.

Not only had their sheer size been threatening but the mere fact that they had been filled with some wild aggression.

‘We will have him and he’ll suffer for the rest of his known existence. He shall be crushed underneath our.’

The words spread some light and as they did, the many ticks which had lain around the dark suddenly lit to reveal what had been going on. Only the two of them remained now. Malt had made sure to stamp everyone else then.

Beyond the border of this known sheltered life, disorder could only begin. The first constructs made out of the pestilence had formed for their new fashioned world. They looked like solid masses of green gas which held inside of them the crushed car parts and fallen debris.

‘My android is now complete.’

Now a man yelled. The savant had done it, a new kind of android which was given a life unlike any other, bursting with emotion and humanity. Power had been restored inside their Mover for no other reason at all. But what had this magnificence been? Nothing could be seen but it.

A gas stroke inside the mind poked the blunder of the circuit which had caused an explosion to occur in the middle of the illusionary night, but still, it happened for it to be seen, that small element of pox which started crawling inside the bunker. They now summoned it from below, as they had been in connection with their gods above.

But, Victor, that man. He was still trying his best to turn the lever back and forth, without realizing that humanity had been spoken for. If he stopped then, the extra protection over the lid would give in. Everyone would die afterwards from the nuclear radioactive fallout which would start dripping below the outer rim.

Everything was vaguely calm. Victor had stopped flipping the switch, his arm had been tired. The lid above opened and led all of the radioactive waste fall through the top of the ceiling, being led in the bunker. The world seemed to have spilled in, pushing the Movers farther down while flattening the levels into this one whole par grim.

Before the terror could have a chance to spread and grow below, the people inside the entirely extended level had been crushed by the weight which had been spread and pushed down upon them. Everything now rested on hold above the blocs. Many pieces of the ceiling which had been made out of added material, which strapped them as an inner layer of protection got repelled by the modified Mover in which everyone had been in.

But the giant so-called creators stood there unnervingly aware of something little more than awe. There was some dreadful company to be had inside the place. An assault of senses and the deranged had arrived. Some self-replicating machine had already begun spreading and attaching itself to every mover in sight, though that had been it, chaos.

And it hadn't stopped there. Millions of movers had been then pulled like from a gust of fetid air, inside their own world. This chaotic dance of gusts and winds spread them around the world in a paragon of confusion.

Before long they had been placed inside the old refuge-like homes they used to call the earth dwellings they owned.

'This can't be happening. We don't have provisions now. We're stranded out here in the middle of nothing.'

A voice said. They were indeed affected by the intrusion of it, that disease which replicated air inside their lungs. As it entered, they started dropping like flies. All that effort now gone, as humanity died in that moment before anything could be made out of it.

What could be heard echoing between the clouds had been the sound of some mad and defiant magnificence. It wasn't even obvious at that, this curl of bowels which occurred in his sides. But there wasn't anything to be prevented any longer. With the machines which had been set like drones inside the movers, they would be preserved.

It didn't matter who'd step in there, as only this remained, the one moment of realization that the planet would be inherited by giant Gods of pollution and nuclear devastation, and a few selected machines which would last in their small pocket underneath dirt.

'I seem to remember something.'

Malt said. Who was he after all? He remembers growing up into a world which had been normal. As a child, he remembered both of his parents, who had been very much alive, he thought. He had a mother, a father, a baby sister and a younger brother.

He had been fond of Ivan. It was something which he almost wished he had, before being brought to the ship and being used in the way he had. The life he had before everything grew so confusing and before everything started happening so fast. No expectations either.

'Ivan, do you want to go out and play in the snow? It's winter, come on, you shouldn't play by yourself.'

'Malt, I can't. Can't you see that I'm not playing? I'm trying to do my homework, my alphabet is still not working well.'

‘That can wait, you need a break, little guy. I want us to go out, that’s all. We don’t spend too much time together and I don’t know when I’m going to leave again with work.

One day, you know, we won’t be able to do anything any longer. Maybe we’ll grow apart. Perhaps we already grew apart, but. We could at least enjoy this winter, little fellow.’

He looked sad. It was something which he either buried deep in his mind or which had been brought back by the fact that various parts of his brain weren’t working out properly any longer. It couldn’t be culled off. They needed to have that talk.

But he wanted to wait there for a bit longer, in Ivan’s room. It was all so cosy, being made out of wood. Malt remembered the details well, even then, like the shade of the carpet, the one candle, and the icons of the saints, his book shelf, his large dresser, his desk and the bed. The lamp, the many shaded walls, the dark stains left by his ink on top of the ceiling, the additional chair, the pipes and the heater, the draperies and the window.

The coat he left that day on the bed, the fresh sheets, the small rounded ball, the many bodied doll, the other table, even the specific names of the authors he had seen. Even what worked and didn’t work inside his room. The tiny box in front of his bed, which held all of his old toys in it, the broken tiny robots, the screws he found and the toys he made when he had been younger.

He looked above the shoulder then. Two books stood there, stenciled. Ivan had been trying really hard but he had failed to properly copy the characters from one side to the other. He would need so much help that his mother couldn’t provide on her own.

‘I’ll make sure to send you letters, if I go. You know, I love, Ivan, right?’

This he couldn’t remember, but he swore he did. Ivan turned to face him. He was a sad-looking kid without any friends who couldn’t do anything on his own. Malt knew that Ivan would live a hard life, especially with Nadya growing up.

So many things to do now, and he couldn’t be in every place at once. He swore there was something to it, some need to make it so they’d reconsider. There was the door. It was time for him to go. Ivan never left that room with him and I left him there.

There was a time when everything was right. I was walking through the snow right through the snowstorm when this special unit agent came and approached me.

He opened his human face and revealed himself as masked on. It was strange meeting and a stranger talk I had with him. Immediately after pulling off his mask I saw myself.

‘Well, how’s it going now? Am I doing well in the world?’

‘Why, yes, we have done quite well for ourselves, do you realize how much of a defiant thing it is to stand out there in the snow? It’s cold, they’re dying out there?’

‘Who’s dying?’

‘I am, we are. They all look like you, like us for some reason and everyone is too afraid to come inside because they know he’s there.’

‘Who? Ivan?’

‘Indeed, he’s hurt, he closed himself in his room and he refuses to step out. It can’t be helped, why, I’d say it needs to be noted that there’s some reason for which I’m needlessly trying to get away from it.

I fear he may be stuck there forever, until I won’t be able to help it any longer and break in.’

‘Why is that?’

He’s our brother, you know that would hurt him, seeing him act that way. Plus, if I’m to go to work.’

This was rather distracting. The snow changed to a raw umber. The shade of the house turned to a dawn red. It looked like he was in some oil painting, as the man in front of him got covered in some dirt.

‘You know he dreams of dying, don’t you? He’s so alone in there, his mind isn’t working properly, and he may never be fond of anything that’s right. The things you’re going to bring him, like the matches, the sparks and those dreadful clocks.

Neither of them are working right. You’ve tried and done it. Remember, you told him to fix them but he could never learn how to do anything properly.’

‘Ivan, try retracing the steps. I unlocked it and removed the screws and opened the device in front of you. We went through this multiple times, you know it right.’

The boy couldn’t help it, no matter the attempts, he tried and failed, time after time, again and again until it’s been nothing there. It couldn’t be questioned by anyone there. A failure of the mind, a part of his head wasn’t working properly, that must’ve been a family thing.

But Malt knew he was right. So he hit his younger brother in the head.

‘No, don’t make me remember that. I don’t want to remember it. Please, I’m a good brother, I’m trying to help him, to bring him goods.

I'm working towards getting him a better life, that's all. Why does nobody believe me? He's my brother, I'd never harm him.'

'How about her? Claire. Would you hurt her?'

There wasn't any sound yet. He expected another thing to emerge out of the sudden, now that he would try to pay some attention, unable to stare or be aware of what was going on there.

'I'm trying my best to help Ivan.'

Another shot came to his mind. Ivan was trying to walk properly, it was something he struggled learning as a child, being affected by a mild case of poor balance. Malt approached.

'You're not doing it properly, you need to be helped. Get back up and try again.'

But the boy was still standing, until he drew closer and threw him back on the ground. It wasn't the right thing to do now but the boy began crying and complied.

'I can't do it right.'

'Perhaps in time you'll learn, but unless I push you to it, you'll always find an excuse to get away from it. Can't you see it now? Everything you do is making me feel bad. Do you want me to feel bad?

I was able to walk properly at your age. No one had to help me.'

'But I can't, you saw it, I'm going...'

'No, you're not going to mom every time you need something. I will discipline you, do you understand?

Unless you do it right, I will force you to do it right.'

Malt could only see himself as a good brother now. Why wasn't this part of his mind killed by the gas?

It should've gone down the drain with the rest of it. But he knew what he was doing, he pushed his brother again and again until he couldn't help but stop.

'Fine, I'm apologizing. I'm sorry for what I've done to him, to my brother.'

'You can't apologize any longer, the door is closed, and you know that. There's no way to return there any longer, there's no way for any of us to go back there.

No one will make you happy.'

He had remembered the next set of memories by himself. For some reason, this face mirror tapped in a place which made him want to start doing it on his own.

Ivan was simply standing in his room for far too long. It was getting on his nerves, him doing nothing. He wanted that kid to at least pick on something to do around the house. Was he doing in there? What was he doing inside the room?

Too long, he's been there for too long, leave, allow some time for peace to be had. , anything, don't be there, kicking your feet against the edge. I want you to be out there, doing something, meeting something, even I were to drag you by the ears.

This was painful to watch. Or to hear. But their mother wasn't home, she wouldn't be able to know. He never told her, at any moment, he. He believed.

'She never found out, did she? I don't know. It's been so long and my memory is being hazy, everything is wrong, there's too many things wrong which I can't explain.'

Move on from that stop. The wind blew harder and harder, with every look taking away from the sight of the sea. Every time a strand of water skipped, there would be a ripple spreading through. It was dangerous, that no one would look away. So many people gathered on the shore, too many to count.

I wish I was there amongst them. I wish Ivan had been with me down there. They gathered during the night and appeared to be pacing bluntly. Small lights were flowing in the distance, floating akin to the flames, as they tiny rags filled with hot air. The sight looked like blue or teal, a sight he never laid eye upon.

Nights like these used to be decent, but now they were empty and only made him feel lonely. So many disgusting lights had been bore. But he thought of the wrong thing, he couldn't remember what was right.

'I know you're evil. I know you're the lowest of the scum. But I need to know this, we are alone now. No one but the two of us will know. I can't help it if I'm hurt, I can't help it if I have these feelings going through my head now.

But please help me understand. Here's a knife, I know you are unhappy. You can go ahead and stab me if it makes you feel right, but I don't want to be left alone.

This is my part. I know it's wrong, but I can't stand the thought of being alone out there. No one can stand me once they find out what I'm like.'

The creature he was talking to was silent. It waited there in vague consideration. This wasn't fair, it wasn't fair, and he knew this wouldn't make him happy. But everyone told him it would, otherwise, he would end up alone and abandoned.

‘I know most people would find this wrong. They don’t understand it, I know I’m going to leave as soon as you’re done. You know I can’t stay for long after this, my heart wouldn’t be able to take it. But every time I think about it, this only makes it worse, you know?’

Perhaps I knew it was over between us a long time ago and I only needed an excuse to leave while being up ahead.’

Nothing could be left unsaid. He will do it and I will leave. This nasty, nasty creature would do it. She would do it and I would leave. That’s what’s supposed to happen, no more lies, no more tests, and no more suspicion, say it.

He waited there for something to happen, these kinds of waits were the hardest when everything and everyone worked against him.

Malt had no desire to know or see her again after. He walked out of the room bleeding and in tears. This wasn’t supposed to happen, she wasn’t supposed to do this.

There hadn’t been a change after it. Malt grew cold and distant towards her, after he caught her. Every single time, every time they met, every interaction felt out of place. A piece of him died then, and afterwards it had been abandoned.

He would be a new man, completely disconnected from reality, the way he was meant to be. Free from the pain or the thought of betrayal, no more would he have to pay any attention or have responsibilities for someone else. It was at that moment when things simply corrected themselves.

After this event occurred, he would himself walk through the back room where the work was being done. Some servers were being charged by the minute, transmitting information and making sure that every piece of equipment was in order. A few of the many uniforms came from time to time to check whether the temperature raised itself or dropped heavily below unfathomable levels.

Equipped with a set of long electro-charged scythe-looking claws, they held an evenly formed body which had been grown in captivity. Its fat pushed against the chargers which made it work properly from time to time. Not even right, as it seemed, there was some inner-placed desire to draw back on it. This made the small sheltered mass of blue burst with energy, which had not only produced a growth, but which had also turned on the metal antlers.

‘I will check every piece here evenly; until it’s decided that everything’s in order.’

The second uniform said from his black box. He constantly turned on the lever but no sound came afterwards. It was mostly automatic than anything else now, which only made it seem so much less important. It would be cruel to stop them now, but they felt weak compared to him.

If only he could open one. That already happened. An act of dissection revealed much about what he hadn't known about the uniforms. Inside one he had found an escape. He took this change and jumped in, making it through the enclosed walls with hope that he would land safely.

At this point where wasn't any return. He couldn't tell whether this place had been part of the floor and only a cut through the body of the guardsman had revealed it, but he had uncovered something there, an entire military base. Of course, though his limits had been known to be reached, he looked past everything in sight.

It made him unhappy. They were down there as well, though more calm and they actually approached him.

'I see you have discovered a way in, greetings Malt. We haven't had the proper introduction yet, but I'm the other one.'

'Weren't you supposed to be one of the guards? Am I going to remove the mask and see myself inside of you again?'

'There's nothing of the kind here, it's only us. As flawed as we are and simply as we're seen, it's mostly us.'

They didn't attempt to corner him yet and they simply made sure that they had taken the right distance.

That sight fell short of where he found himself in a blink of an eye. Another view came before it.

He tried looking around for someone else who may be able to do anything about it. Someone else to talk with and discharge the amount of expectation he feels like he should carry on with.

'I wish I had a chance to explain to you that no one wants to be there.'

The place was lonely and quiet.

'Then why isn't anyone leaving?'

'Because of that thing.'

One lousy twisted android came with his head intertwined between two long legs. He had lost his arms but appeared to carry one metal basket filled with enough spare pieces to build up an entire metal-tin-tan. There could be a fortune made out of some many people who'd get tans on the North Bloc, who were in waiting for something to happen.

'Look, I wish. I wish that had been the reason but I couldn't help it. No one can get up to do anything, we never could.'

It was Barnabee. He had been sad, depressed. He had seen him from somewhere, or some other place.

‘I can’t help you. You know I’m caught in about the same kind of conundrum, right?’

‘Too depressed to do anything? I know, everyone’s found some way to cope with the junk we keep getting.’

‘How come no one told me about it?’

‘Follow me, Malt, I’ll tell you in a moment.’

They went through around the blocs. Now that he had the chance to look around, he saw the buildings for what they were, grand, tall, wide, widely colored and filled with some kind of enthusiasm-driving angles which made him happy. He felt content being there again.

Some people came near the windows and looked at him. It couldn’t be explained at all, but he spared not a second more to look at them. That made him sad as well, especially those who were outside, sitting on benches, or trying to plant trees in the designated areas with the help of the uniforms.

‘I never knew them to be so nice. What got into them?’

‘They’ve always been nice, what are you talking about?’

‘Barnabee, I saw them, I tracked them down a few times and they would always knock on doors, and harass everyone. And the many times they’d chase.’

‘Malt, that never happened, they weren’t the ones doing it.’

No amount of knowledge could be spared. It wasn’t even fair. He hadn’t chosen to lie about it. There were a few things which didn’t fit right. They were trying their best not to look anywhere else.

But everyone was looking so accusatorily at me. I haven’t done anything. Malt thought, I haven’t done anything.

They were constantly slamming at the door, trying their best to get it. No one wanted to understand that I haven’t done anything, but someone called them. But they could never get through past the door, which meant he would be safe.

‘Stop already, go home! You won’t be able to get it by no means. I’m trying to survive, I’m only trying to mind my own business.’

He was sitting on the floor, in a mess of a room, with no electricity going on for at least half of the house. He had never brought on guests inside. Without much in mind, there hadn’t been any pleasure derived from it, only the interest he had in looking around. He developed it at times, every since he moved in with his new line of work.

No one came there, no one came back home. And it was quite interesting being there. Half of the things were missing and, frankly, the place had been devoid of life.

But if he looked at the floor, he'd see it. The corpse was there, where it had been supposed to be. Nothing was certain any longer, but he had lain in his desire to proceed with that need. To, to go back down and look at them, to talk to them. They were important to him, he needed to see them again, so he could establish contact again.

'Please, let me go down there again, I don't want to be here, take me away from the noise. I can't listen to the noise, it keeps going on for some reason.'

Above him, he heard his neighbors arguing.

He had made a mistake into looking away. He couldn't help himself then, but the way out wasn't there any longer. Another missed chance in his life. But it wasn't going to get any better now. Some annoyance could be remotely thought to have been right, it was a mistake, it had been a way to get away from all the noise and all the battering of the door and the sound of the engine and.

A few steps down there and he had reached the floor where he looked at them. He had always imagined them different, since he had never been caught by the uniforms, they always had this strange look upon them. Either they would hide something else underneath their masks, or they would wear no mask at all.

He stumbled on a bunch of stranger, or they wore paint and war apparel. Their black box had been a piece of a tank which aimed at the door and got ready to take a shot. It wasn't right.

It wasn't right, that wasn't right either. Every single time he looked on it, everything was out of order.

'I wish things had been easier with you, but they're not.'

And there she was the one he had thought himself to have fallen in love with. That was Claire. Out of all the bodies, all the mess, all the years he had spent alone, it had to have been her. It looked like she was waiting outside the apartment.

This had been the right choice, it had to be. He knew well enough that if he would let her go, they would never see each other again. He turned around to his world, no longer aroused by the thought. Had his vision been any better he would've seen them come in.

It's ten o'clock in the afternoon. Going down by the hall reveals much about the building now. Obscure pieces of the walls missing in the daze of so many wrong things which had occurred prior to him coming back there. Noise was damned. Brooding inside a door which had opened revealed him, this stranger, and the strange looking fellow, who wore his trench coat and a small fisherman's cat on his shoulder.

His yellow teeth distracted from her fish-fur and her green eyes. He was long haired and wanted a piece of mind.

‘Say, say, why are they dragging you away?’

Rather than being pushed away, he joined us. Neither uniform appeared to care much about him being there at all. Presently, it could only be told that there was a desire to push others out of the way, it couldn’t be though off. His presence was bending their bodies into looking crushed. Some bones twisted and their heads wrapped around his distant form without touching it.

‘What are you doing to them?’

‘You answer first.’

‘I think I’m being detained for someone I’ve done. Don’t ask me what, I may have hurt someone.’

A slip. But he got it and understood.

‘My body possesses some strength you see? My every move appears to displace and move and deform everything in their places. Yet it does not damage, it’s mere a means of protection for myself.’

‘How come I never saw you here?’

‘Oh but you have, it’s only that you don’t remember me that often. No since I have acquired so many toys from my fellow androids. They helped become immortal by being placed into one of the many disjointed worlds which lay between us.

That way, a piece of me gets traded with another while everything else gets traded as well with one of their worlds. Think of it like small cuts which don’t align but get overlapped and moved so they could vaguely synchronize and give the impression that they’re made of one part.’

It had been a strange fellow this one. He didn’t explain why his was fading but he had no chance off to divert himself from it.

‘Look, I can grant you a gift if you want, on the house. Since you don’t actually go ahead and try doing anything on your own, we shall make it so you’ll find some way to occupy the time.

This is the gift you shall be given, the gift of dreaming.’

‘During the day? Wouldn’t that be dangerous?’

‘Oh but that would be a nightmare for both of us, if you were the decline. Malt, can’t you that everyone started dying?’

The uniforms lay on the ground, bleeding. He couldn't figure out what was going on, especially since he hadn't been given any explanation on what the cause of it was.

'Everyone will die eventually if you stop thinking about them. You may not have been aware of it, but they are kept living through some way or another.

If you stop, there won't be any way of going back there. We both know your memory is fading, that's right. But if you don't make an effort to fill the gaps by any means possible, if you don't rearrange what you know, this won't end up well.

They will both die and be forgotten. None of your experiences might matter at all, can't you see? You're still in the past, you're still underneath the bunker, in the bloc, everywhere. Now, go on back there, and don't blame everyone for what you're doing.'

Without question, he took it from him.

'Careful now not to dream of the damned. If you get mad and let your mind get in the way.'

'I know what I'm doing. I got so far, haven't I? With everything I've seen, and all those bursts of anger, I know I'll make it right somehow.

Now I can control them, I can fight through it and not give in. Don't make me do it, I won't do it. They'll all live how I wish and they'll be happy about it.'

It had to be different now. They couldn't be caught and forced into work nor trapped. He had vaguely learned that lesson on his own skin. If there was one thing one could notice and allow, it was the fact that this wasn't a dream any longer.

He had given them the world, in its every damn aspect, this great one, Malt, savior he was known as the one who'd save and make sure everyone was taken care of.

'Why do I have to be old now?'

No one was there to hear them. For some reason, he had grown over-protective on his brood. His teeth acted like spittle, moist and soft, constantly dripping and falling off his chin. His body was hunched and weak, from the year of work which had been needed to lay the foundation of this world. It couldn't be questioned why he was there.

Nowhere near him they had each been forced in their tiny homes, no longer allowed being in the proximity of strangers. It had been less distraction and more so.

What happened?

He approached the road and entered a house. Something inheritably wrong happened to them. Was this another one of this miss alteration?

‘Can you hear me? Is there something wrong with you?’

Through the clothes wore the skin and the body which turned them into shaking cocoons. The eye sockets and mouths could be seen as a way of falling rubber, as the mouths opened and noise came out. But only enough to hear.

‘Free me, please, free me from this.’

A mass of black smoke came out of his lungs. Of course it had to be a smoke, he still saw it through his holes. And that thing in his wife’s liver, open, and was a type of acidic alcohol.

Too many closed spaces inhabited the bunker. Not enough freedom in terms of who was allowed to see who.

One small thing could be changed, as he saw it fit. Yes, this would fix about everything with no chance of redemption or looking out of place.

For that reason, the humans became the cattle. This was the right natural order which should’ve been imposed on them from the stars. The movers had been crippled since they and instead had become prisons with fewer objects and rooms inside of them. Now they had bars and the exposure had been completely nullified.

Instead, the imprisonment made their meat much tender and helped the growth in their captivity. Every few hours, these drifts as they cherished themselves as, the many-headed walkers had grown their human-like heads which had been a result of a trade agreement between them and the androids which had enabled them to acquire some technological knowledge, which had been traded between them.

It was by this tiny arrangement that they got ahead.

‘Do we have to keep them like that? I can’t help it but feel bad for them, they seem to be hurt by their condition especially since they’re intelligent being.’

These new bodies the androids had didn’t suit them that well, especially since they needed some metallic face-implants for every big bloated red head and their many in-grown claws, stings and filthy teeth they bore. Of course the acid had been much obliged to be had, as a mean of self-preservation and a way for them to defend themselves from others who didn’t like them.

But at best they had become a habitation of depraved locals. No one cared much about one another except the occasional interaction.

‘No, it’s settled that they cannot be permitted out. When time comes, we’ll eat the fattest ones and continue the breeding with the others. This had worked for far too long now. We cannot stop the process since it works so well.’

‘But, wouldn’t it be fair for us to continue in any other way? If we could drag them out and integrate them with us.’

‘Don’t forget who is in charge, android. We are far outnumbering you and let us not forget that your metal is what makes you thick. Without it, your life is finite, dead, ended, destroyed. Nothing to keep that of which you have taken from us.’

This was the talk of a paranoid grunt that was making sure everything was in check. Without self-consciousness, there was more than one way to get through life. It wasn’t fair, it couldn’t be right, but what would one keep in mind? Was it that they took one additional step and prepared for the destruction?

If it hadn’t come from above, it came from inside.

At the deepest level, though now they were far more widely open and exposed, they had amassed the greatest bomb that ever laid there. It had been one thing Malt had forgotten to omit. The fact that they were bent of taking their host’s nature.

And these creatures had been cold and unrelentless.

‘By this, brother androids, we shall get right of their lives, entirely. As soon as they are dead, as soon as we will have far surpassed their living gift, we shall fill it with the likes of pure machines.’

‘What of the humans? Will they not suffer the same fate as them? Is it truly any better?’

By memory alone, their lives had been far too stricken by the lack of any selective breeding or of knowledge. Now they had acquired the primitive traits their ancestors fought to hard to endanger and prevent, which caused this extinction.

‘I will eat you, living monkeys, you filthy ravaged things! I’ll make you all suffer.’ A particularly insolent vagrant said, who bore only four big heads and a body which looked like that of a root. He had been brought there and left there with the sole purpose of making sure they felt unwelcome.

Not only had it not been right, but it was damaging. The human beings could only make grunts and noises while sitting and shaking in the opposite corner while this vile creature blew tiny strokes of acid in their way. Though it couldn’t shoot that far, it had still been dangerous to see.

‘I knew what I had to do then. See, my body, despite being made of metal shared its physical characteristics with them. Someone messed with my program but I knew, I have realized that I may have been part of them, a long time ago at least.’

‘And how did you proceed with him? With this violator?’

‘With him being stuck in there, he could do little to turn around. We only have this acid spewer coming from one shaft. Despite seeing me and pleading for its life, I drew closer and closer by the second until we have reached an understanding.’

By that, I came and used both of my arms and palms to crush and smash its head both sides, until it was dead.

‘He bled with each stroke of the hardening which occurred. It desperately tried to coagulate its wound and stop the bleeding but I kept it wide open, taking each chance I could to strike at it and create more wider holes for it to bleed from.’

‘That sounds mightily appealing. Do go on.’

‘As it died, I opened its back and saw the presence of smaller heads which had been separated amongst its spine, being given life. Now, I have never seen the process in which they gave themselves life, but this was interesting.

The small line which connected them together appeared to pump the needed liquids which facilitated their growth. As soon as I applied some pressure to each stroke and each line, I saw their heads collide.’

Not a single second passed until I saw it last no longer than it was in need of. Pain grew stronger. ‘I made sure he would suffer through this need of his, don’t worry, we shall pay enough attention to carry on their legacy, even if it may not be the right thing to do. We share this bond with them, we were made to govern over ourselves.

Their sacrifice and their burden needs not be forgotten.’

But it came then, out of nowhere, this tall and destructive molester, which body its tall body, flat on each side, drawing up and down various metal needle-like expulsions which were quickly turned inwardly and pushed out. Two feet stood there, giant, combed at the connecting reactions which held its balance. An intense amount of head had been produced from its insides, pushing forth some kind of inherited appeal to the amount of rage it felt.

Two obtrusions, like holes popped out in its front. This creature, for it wasn’t fully machine looked like a box of evil, legged and pissed and is spouted its fuel by drops which had been forced out and spat constantly out of its mouth.

It moved with an unfathomable speed and crushed their bomb immediately, giving it no change to go off at all. Not likely, as it had been, there was this was their interest. Unlikely told, they would be held from any construction.

‘Run, it’s not safe!’

It didn't stop there. With a crushing kick and a spur, it came, madly, spewing as much dust and heat as possible. This molester had crushed and rubbed the android to a pile of unnerving remorseless unsanctioned desecration. Not unlike anything, there had been this need to push forward this excess of desire which didn't stay for long.

Without a doubt, there was a venture of much needed interest into the flight. They all ran from the sight but it had been too fast. No one was allowed to escape once this transgression has been found and thought off. It wasn't likely to be considered fair or right, but they had been crushed. IT went through the blocs and started rummaging through the apartments and through dormitories as soon as it had the chance.

Molester of objects, loser of appeal, destroyer, whatever it had been called, managed to destroy every android in sight. With that, he proceeded to do as much damage as it could, pulling the electrical cords, breaking the illumination devices, charring through the buildings until they fell. No one would head down there and as the echo of destruction had arrived through the upper levels, the many inbred protectors started making their way down there.

'We must look and find out what's wrong.'

'There's noise, danger, danger, don't head down there unprotected.'

'But we're not unprotected and we shall deal with whatever kind of threat there might be there. I shall make sure there's no way to look into it. My heart yearns for the sight of battle now.'

'That shall bring our destruction if we head down there, I know if it. I sense the feeling, not of ours, but one of theirs, the machines had brought something on themselves which may not possibly bring ruin to us as well.'

It was obvious, that, by the way it had stomped the acid-filled bodies, that the substance had no effect on it. This had been a matter of some interest, nothing more. Only the engulfing thought remained and nothing more. The fantasy of destruction that they may get down upon it and fight through the mass.

No longer caught by it, there were the means of living. Without a doubt, the ones out there were scarce and spread, many lay dead by the time they had arrived down there, at the last level.

'They have arrived before us I see, look at it, this is what's left of our people and of our legacy. There's nothing left, nothing to be called off. Without a mark or hope that we may change, it isn't safe to say what's happening any longer.

We need to evacuate and flood this place.'

But the sight was too unnerving and distracting for them to look away from as it destroyed and malformed the place into an institution of rubble. So many lost dreams occurred to him then, which may never be called off. If there was a chance for them to go back at it, that had been gone.

‘Make sure you coat your tiny stings with the acid, we shall prevail.’

Each of them spit and walked, but this was a fight which couldn’t be won. The molester outmaneuvered them as he spat concentrations of heat which melted through their bodies. Cries arose but couldn’t be called as hope wasn’t meant to last. It was a distant kind of interest which only lasted for short amount of time.

They had been forgotten and turned to a mush of bodies there. Now the molester started carrying a giant whip which bore their heads and those of the androids, the bodies and every representative head-shape he could find. It was an insult to the fact that it listened and understood what their offsprings grew like. And it had been aware that they would know.

As it operated in the next level, he appeared to be stalking his targets. Of course he wouldn’t proceed into complete desecration immediately, but he would at least try pushing himself out of the way. He went and snicked and crushed the filthy scoundrel. It approached the cage and looked behind it. what could he do about it?

What could Malt do about this conundrum? He appeared to have set himself for departure. They weren’t working well, as human being any longer. They had lost that thing which gave them the freedom to move and reciprocate any kind of affection. And it worse, as their bodies lead to an empty storage organ underneath the floor, buried in the ground, which facilitated their insides to grow and mixed inside of it. Not even the children had been spared from this insult.

Ivan, he would’ve loved Claire. Perhaps he would’ve seen her as a second mother, if he only cared enough about exploiting him.

He walked step after step and he looked forth to implanting the rest of the metal bars through both of his ankles. It was obvious that he was hurt enough not to care about how much pain had been inflicted upon him.

‘No, Ivan, try it again, I’ll make you start it again. We’ll work on it slowly. Now, move as I want you to.’

It hadn’t been what he had expected. There were pieces missing of his eyes and face, the reason being the fact that he didn’t want to remember the punches he had given him for each time he fell. Without punishment he would end up in the dark room again.

A red light came bleeping and nastily going on as he was dragged through the locker, changing to a green and nastily looking bird-blue. One mockingbird could be heard singing by the outside world. He wished he had the chance to get through it one more time and make it past the clock. A defiling sight waited for him.

Two wooden wheels interacted and kept ripping and reattaching two men together. Each of them was missing the lower parts of their bodies. From inside came the ification which waited for the right moment when they stopped spinning. They circled their living legged intestines together into the empty key-shaped dynamic stone slab which protruded towards them.

It was clear that they were trying to match the need for something which was clear. No one would admire it, other than the two of them, Malt and Ivan.

Now he would be punished by it, the thing he had tried to avoid too much.

‘I’m sorry, little brother, but I have to let them enter your face. See, there’s an opening which goes through your skin, muscle and bone. They will enter your brain now and make you right so you may be able to walk straight.’

He was unsure himself why that had been, it couldn’t have been a physical deformation, he hadn’t one, and he hadn’t inherited anything from there. Out of the two of them, he was right, working, frail. Why can’t he be content with what I do to him?

I took this opportunity to push him around, so I could get him a few steps closer to it while they were doing their thing. Though this one was weak and frail, he’d do nothing out of fear that he might possibly disappoint his brother. And that would be a mistake. Hold him still now.

It was painful for Ivan. While those long intestines started, started going through, or over his head, Malt started rubbing soap over. His mother often passed this responsibility onto him.

‘If she asks you why your eye is bruised, you tell her that you fell while trying to get over a crack in the ground, all right, Ivan? You will tell her that, Ivan?’

‘Malt.’

‘I’ll take that as a yes, then we’ll do something together, later if we have the time. But make sure she doesn’t find out. Work is already getting out of hand and I’m not willing to get into another argument with her.

do this thing, and don’t tell her. I know you’re hard of hearing, but we don’t want you to get a scolding, do we now?’

‘No, Malt.’

‘Perhaps you’ll understand one day when I’ll, when I’ll be over with you. Then, I’ll, I’ll see that you are.’

He looked lifeless in his memory, or was he always like that? There wasn’t any charm in that boy left, but he had never thought it was because of him, no, it was, growing up there, with no friends. That must’ve been, or.

Malt thought for a second. He did recall the bathroom as well, as tiny as it had been, a big bathtub rested in front of the sink and a toilet which had been adjacent, crumbling floor patches and a wooden door came hand in hand. There was a light on top, and a mirror above the sink. What stood out was a small hole which rested underneath the sink, revealing the pipes hidden in the wall. They were no longer obscured.

‘I wish we had good memories together Ivan, but I’m not able to find them. Don’t get me wrong, I think of the most terrible things but I’m trying seriously hard to find one.

We were happy together, I know we must’ve been. Claire and I were great, we were plain and simple and we were made for one another, until she left or I got her to leave.’

His throat gave in. There, he walked on, back to jumping into the fray and swimming inside them. Those bodies of the trapped souls were down there in their full embrace. Both the parents and their children’s insides had been stored and kept to safety only so no harm may come upon them.

‘Well, I’ll try eating and eating and.’

Before his teeth could even lie upon it, he made a hole and found out that he had opened another rip through the intertwined stomachs. That room could finally be made a great use of. Though this had been confusing, as the room was inverted, he brought the means of a certain growth which may occur into his head.

‘There, I’ve got you what you needed, some guts, kid, this way you’ll be able to get strong like your older brother.’

‘We’re both in this together, aren’t we? Should we not make the best out of it then?’

Malt came and pulled his brother’s head wide open, so even more of the guts would get inside of his head. He was starting to think now, to speak, he could the sudden jerks in both of his feet occur with even less of a ification now.’

I think we’ve made progress.

The base had been constructed with only one hope in mind that being the complete obliteration of the other forces on the ground. Any kind of aerial assault could be vanquished by here sight. Inside of it, going millions of feet below, there was enough mass and backup nuclear warheads installed for long-term protection. Nothing could be spared, no amount of resources, food, water and every other kind of needed conveyer’s tool for personal use.

On top of the base, one of the many panes opened and started raising four metal bonds which had been kept floating by their electrical connections which promoted some kind of peculiar flight. Now that they were in place, the gate opened, the energy pulled in with a magnificent display of colors which shifted from ultramarine to the sight of ivory space, with their growth-inducing stars exploding in sight while filling the majority of the portal with their radiance.

From its insides came the entry. It was only then that they had been summoned.

Eight giant alienatic being which spread widely as their bodies thinned way in the back to a single point which emerged into a tail. It pushed and dragged and had the appearance of being spined, dwindling not at sharp ends but as the holes in those extra spines revealed themselves, tiny blotches of energy shot like streams of water.

Though they all appeared to be double headed, they could only bear one mind and one feature which brought the distinction between their faces. It was the many cuts, which made they look like carved dolls, their other limbs being fingerless, armless, handless and rather docile. They floated and curled like some sharp shoot spear-anchors which held them on the ground.

Much of their bodies were changing in the same way the portal had been until they had properly materialized. But these beings were indestructible, unable to get damaged by any proper means. They were giant in the sense that they rivaled the tallest human constructions. Without a way to compare them to the likes of anyone alive, they were what they seemed to be. Contortions which not only weren't statues but were idols, floating, waiting to be served.

A violet-green color emerged, in the finality of form. Yet they weren't pure either as their bodies appeared to have been altered somehow by technology. The same thing which brought them here appeared to be lodged inside their bodies, being connect with a few inner-beings which had acted like bridges to act like an insurance that they wouldn't absorb too much of the energy.

Inside them, what made the entire mass of their bodies had been the fluid which encapsulated and slow the protons which had been shoved inside of them. Unlike anything else there, these beings inside looked unable to drown. No, they were strong and as immortal, though weak enough to be used for the vile purposed there were.

Yellowish picked bodies floated like some fat conjoined drifts of growths. Their many legs had been restricted growth, even thought they could reconstruct themselves from any living piece which may have escaped.

They were prisoners who weren't allowed the time of the day. And in their suffering emerged an inner echo which shook these giants, as they had paid no attention to others.

'We have arrived here to your time of development. Look at us, we are far surpassing your own desires, we shall make it so we can push and destroy any malformation and damnation you may create.

You've been deemed as being untrustworthy of development because of the destruction your kind had brought upon itself. And now, you shall be forced to stop.'

A representative of humanity came. Something was fishy there. It was one of the human beings who had survived the damnation, it was clear that, Malt had perhaps changed things a lot too efficiently.

Human beings no longer suffered radiation or exposure. Behind them, it seemed like they had also acquired the support of those evil ones who now governed over them. Not even their kind had been seen as being remotely trustworthy. Relentlessly, they waited.

‘We have done a lot to make amends for everything that happened here. Look, we have even proceeded to make a pact with them, only so we may be allowed to continue our research in peace.’

They paid little attention to one another, as a matter bred out of the fear that their interaction may be damning for both sides. If one were to draw the one, utmost important detail about them, it had been the fact that they were spreading the poisonous gas between them way too often. Under their eyes, they were as damaging if not more damaging than humans, as they acted like conduits for the natural and the unnatural.

Without balance, this was a threat which could leak somewhere else, which was unquestionably unsafe and shouldn’t have been allowed to continue at all.

‘The likes of you are as responsible for the humans as well as yourselves. Both of you got hand in hand, so what have you to say in your defense and theirs?’

It was clear that they were seen the same, as in the fact that they were both humanoid, despite their sizes. Only one difference, being the main thing that they were disturbing looking, even for them. IT wasn’t meant for them to look upon these strangers without a way of being.

And as the mind progressed towards damnation, they had been showed the many beings which inherited this planet. They were frail and weird-looking, enchanted by metal yet hadn’t meant to do anything.

‘We also made connections and peace which the many people which inherit this world. Why is it that you have come here? That portal below wasn’t meant to be activated.’

‘Your ways of alternating between total annihilation and quick adaptation, these revivals and these changes shouldn’t have happened at all. There is something wrong going on here, which far surpasses the likes of living.

The laws of the universe don’t apply here and there’s a cause for it.’

They had suspected something akin to the lowest live forms there could be, not in a biological sense but an ethic one, which was rooted in the most annoying of interests.

‘Look, see, wonder at what we created. This new world had been modified only so the greatest of minds could work together upon its development.

Together, we have managed to make peace, bringing prosperity to us all.’

Below the lines of the levels, there was at least that one violator who had been alive. No interest had been shown at all, without a doubt, whether or not, there could be some interest shown there.

As the violator emerged through a few movers, he had shown that he held no sympathy for anyone. Only the rage consumed him to the point where his inability to hold still and prevent himself from attacking and assaulting whatever came into his sight brought some disobedience. It was near his own perception that he would have to destroy as much as he could.

By the time he had been done with one of those units, their insides had been broken through, afterwards, they had been flattened and destroyed. It could be contested no less, that sudden surge of many emotions which shot.

They were not expressed in the same way normal humans had. It shot through the exposure field and opened gaps for air. Though the exposure may have been eliminated almost completely, tiny areas of it still remained widespread, enough that they could be found. Once eliminated they left gaps which were immediately filled and got lit but the ammonium inducing self-propagating explosions which happened there.

It was a strange reaction which propagated itself time after time until the air had been filled with many such explosions. Only some trickles of the marks remained, as the destruction offered no less of a disturbance than it had been felt. Violator or no, he brought some gaps in the air which could never be filled again.

The entire stability of the bunker had been taken into question, as periods of time began emerging, pushing ahead some kind of transmission of airless breaks. Often, as they happened to come, at first it dizzied the trapped humans before they fell but it had the least arrogance that they wouldn't feel pain any longer. Vehemently, he stopped and prepared himself for another leap.

But there wasn't anything in his sight standing. Everything had fallen under him, with little chance of rising back up.

'I need to be done with Ivan now. After him, perhaps I'll turn my mind back onto you.'

Said Malt, though he didn't see what chaos had occurred in his bunker, he felt the violator there. Too much destruction occurred for him not to be aware of it.

Ivan took priority now, as he had refrained himself from looking.

'Damn it young brother, you got away again. I'll make you pay for it next time if I get you.'

He couldn't focus on it for too long but he knew he had taken too many of his memories with him. It was the only good trick he appeared to have acquired and used for himself. This way, he had become practically untraceable, with every means of direction possible. It couldn't be thought off as a means of getting back at him but a natural way of prevention.

The two of them had drifted apart and it wasn't safe any longer to stay. By the time he had arrived there, in one of the chambers he still had access to, Malt had been struck free of moving. The two of them couldn't be there at the same time, it would've been a paradox of many extremes.

This Claire, this version of her had been the one from the bloc. It was Ivan from his childhood as well which couldn't have been together at any other time, by no means on integration or any interest.

'What are you doing here? This is the one place where you don't belong, I don't want you here at all.'

She appeared to ignore him. Both of them were doing the same, being rather caught on by the papers through which they were going over. Words didn't come lightly now, and he was having as much trouble with her.

But if there was something in terms of how she had been acting around him, it was the fact that she was gentle. It was right and that had been the only important thing which mattered. Neither of them would see the daylight if it were up to him. This image where both his younger brother and her, her child, oh, now he understood.

'Is this the way you're trying to get back at me?

By showing me how good of a mother you could've been? My son wouldn't have been born right, unlike Ivan. The two of them were...are nothing alike, are they?

Both of you left me that day. I never tried getting in the way of your happiness, you know that. Let me go of this guilt, I can't handle feeling bad about it. Give me more time and I'll make as many amends as I can, I'll set everything right.'

Still no response, they hadn't cared about it, nor had they bore any kind of stigma to it. If this wasn't clear yet, there had been a way to test it out. Follow her around. Claire.

Entry into the foundry, he remembered that image well. Whether it had been a piece of some printed image or a painting which had been ripped apart, he came to adore that tiny thing. It was so simple and yet it made him feel instinctively at ease, knowing that there was always a way for things to get worse. This made him much calmer in the approach.

'Sweet, sweet metal, great forges now lay in dust. I have picked you up.' But that hadn't interested him as much as the machines which worked at it. They worked in unison as the many men who had given into labor started paying attention to what was going on in the areas surrounding them.

'I could see you even from a mile, Claire. I knew you'd come around sooner or later.'

She was as beautiful as in the day he first laid eyes on her. If this was to be his name, he would be. 'Phineas, that's who I am.'

Malt couldn't believe himself now. He had put a lot of effort into this disguise, even though it had looked silly, but the town was simple. Claire wanted that life but he could never let go of her, not in the way it would've reminded him of his brother, Ivan. Clearly hurt by him, he lost some amount of dignity. Ivan was dead to him then, he walked over his body.

This didn't bother him at all, as he was way too preoccupied with her, a woman he was seeing recently. It was hard to tell but he found her on the way out that day, more like, stumbled upon her, brewing through the nests that felt from the illumination sticks.

For as long as he went now, the first love had gone with his child. They were on their way, and this new Claire took her place. He could never get their names right, which prompted him to look into this other woman's business. Without any effort put into her, she would end up there, another stranger in the bunker.

It was getting old now, but he was at least actively recruiting them, without having to go from woman to woman, or citizen from the place he kept dwelling in.

'This is where I'll draw the line. I won't rest until I got both my brother and my lover together, no matter what it takes.'

Dormant people never came out of hiding that way. Everyone from that Mover looked at him like some undisputed stranger. He never could've paid enough attention to everyone else inside the room.

For him they were disposable, even in memory. That standing tyranny of metal, the mongrel with its electric ticks had to go. Between eight steps, he leaped in closer and strapped himself next to it. Without even thinking or considering it, he grasped and flapped his palm against it, ripped its body apart from the side.

From its insides, that substance spilled on the floor and spread with all those metallic getters. By no amount of curiosity could they be called into action, born, bred, asked for. Ticks died without their fluid that was what he wanted of them. It didn't matter in what other circumstance they had been prior to their meeting. He wanted them to die immediately and he had achieved it without much of an attempt.

'Have I made it clear enough that makes the rules here? It's time someone took over.'

'Malt, wait, this isn't what we signed up for.'

Said a strange from the northern bloc, who had most of his memories intact. He had lived a good life there, in the cold and had never strayed away from it. Even as a child, he had been raised by everyone else. The snow storms, the snowmen he made, all the days of cold mass he had celebrated were with him.

'I remember the cold machines who came and sang to us those carols' I still keep dearly in my heart. They had some strangely multi-colored bulbs and they were chained together, walking in pairs.

This may not mean much to you Malt, seeing how you may have changed, but I still have my memories in that place.

Even the most mundane happenings, like crossing from one building to the other to meet the other younger kids, and feeling the same happiness we shared together as the guards came to bring us toys. I don't know what happened to them, but I know that they were human.

Before whatever happened in the central power building, they were right inside.'

The Northern bloc, he had almost pushed it away. It was reminiscent of his home, perhaps that being the reason for which he pushed it as far as he could. Without it, there would be no Ivan to draw him in the bunker. Without the factory which followed, there'd be no way for him to have survived so far.

'The threat, the threat, beware of the atomic bomb. Work tirelessly, men, for your wives and for your children. For your brothers and sisters, for the soldiers dying in the war and for your country, now we must raise ourselves to the test and bring our future to fruition!'

It had been an immaterial friction then. He would've thought himself better but he wasn't. He wasn't going to pay any attention to what was going on there. This came after his brother's abandonment. But at the same time, this is where the Northern bloc was, where it had belonged, in the cold.

Come to think of it, the living quarters were much shorter and far more wide-spread than what they were in his compiled experimental ship. Malt spend a good deal of years working there, of course he would remember the kid.

'Aleksandr, that's your name, right?'

A feisty one, the little kid, it was night and I was tired. But he still found it hilarious if he threw a snowball at me. For such brave soldier, he was a screamer, who had his head kicked in. Why were they were, in the distance?

It felt like long metal sun spiral spinning in the air, which held a thick in the middle of it, under pressure.

It was a threatening attempt to shoot a bolt of lightning in his direction. The others were piled behind an invisible wall, watching like some spectators how this play between him and the kid carried on. His bloody knuckle left some drops of blood which left their mark on the snow drift.

It went fast and over his head.

'A few inches below and you would've hit something'. '

Malt set with little self-interest in the manner. This wasn't a bolt of light but mere a tiny spark which traveled through the air. Something close to some kick there but he hadn't an idea why they were there.

‘All of you need to leave now. Neither of you can be trusted enough for me to feel safe about you butchering.’

Dark snow, this wasn’t right. He had painted the lower field with the kid. It shouldn’t have gone that way, but they had to piss him off.

‘You can’t be here, I did not allow you to appear in this place. If you don’t get it right in your tiny heads, I’ll have to block you from ever appearing in any of my memories and visions by force.’

He came closer to them, these inverted white-glooming invaders. But they were not alone. Standing near them had been the giants, the ones who had come here to investigate what was going on. After they had stopped down into the bunker, they reeked of their compulsory nature.

It wasn’t supposed to get bloody. He had never lost his temper that way.

‘Listen you insolent creature, you have messed with the natural order and have twisted it into a deformed version of reality which blended with your own personal selfishness.

Release yourself from this throne. Give up your desire to change and release them from your bond. Your actions afflict the very qualm which keeps reality together, henceforth you are the one who must stopped by force.’

They were so many out there, floating from about every direction, directing them as they pushed energy outside their bodies. It was a paralysis which forced him to stay. Now even those citizens pushed forward.

‘That had only been a distraction. I see. You shall never get me for as long as I can be wherever I so desire to be.’

And it was the safest place he could possibly think of, resting against his lover’s beast. Claire was there, lonely and afraid. Amongst them were the other workers with their families, on their way to be relocated to a much safer place.

‘We’re being invaded, that’s why we’re here, If I seem to hold that account.’

‘It should be safe now. As long as they don’t drop anything on top of us, we should be safe.’

It wasn’t fair that she had to carry that life while having to deal with their safety. Alas, the truck stopped. More than a few others came in and appeared to be prying in with their gazes. Regardless of how evenly they had looked upon themselves, it was safe to go. Two more families joined. It felt like a filthy act, but Malt felt like they belonged there with them.

He had never been surrounded by so many calm people. Most of them would shout at him or plainly walked by without giving a second thought on him.

‘Could I please take a moment now to rest? It won’t be too long Claire.’

‘Take all the time you need now, it’s safe now. No more bullets, no more pain, we’ll have to work things out.’

It happened after she left. Perhaps they met by chance, or it had been destiny which placed them together, but it was hard to her now. Mostly, it had hard to hate anyone after so long a time he had spent alienating and pushing everyone away.

The country laid in ruin and it wasn’t coming out any better.

‘Malt, do you think your family is safe?’

‘Why are you asking that now? You’re safe, my child is safe. I don’t want to be separated from you now, I couldn’t forgive myself if that were the case.’

If I thought about their well being, I could return. What If I left her and went to search for them? Ivan couldn’t walk properly, Anna wasn’t in the best of minds to take care either of herself or of him.

‘Claire, I left them behind for you, remember? Can’t you remember? Of course you can’t. You can’t seem to consider anyone else other than you and that kid inside of you.’

‘Malt, that’s not what I meant. They’re my family as well now, this thing inside of me keeps us together.’

People were staring, stop it now. Sensations like these never left you once you experienced them, the people who watched but never said a thing nor acted. What happened in their minds? Why couldn’t they mind their own business?

And this made too much noise now. He could feel them coming closer, especially since they weren’t in the real world any longer, it was the one which had faced destruction. Within their range were the vapors which killed humanity. Perhaps now they would be left behind. It wasn’t clear enough whether they’d be adaptable to every kind of disease he could bring amongst the way, but he would try it. If that meant he would be safe.

‘Tell me Claire, did you ask me this to shame me in front of all those, all these people? Did you consider the possibility that I may hit you if this had been asked in private?’

Now everyone know what I am, a man who abandoned his family during the war. Do you seriously want to know the truth now?’

The tears hadn’t done anything to slow him down. Not a single bit, he went on as if they were irrelevant to him, but this had been lived through before. Disregarding the minor addition, most of the words had been there, and hadn’t been changed at all.

‘Both of them are dead, you know that, we both know this. Neither of them could’ve survived, you’re not dumb Claire. Why would ask this of me, now?’

Both of my hands kept her from trying to either punch or jerk away from my grip.

I couldn’t trust myself any longer and for that reason I have lost faith in all that was dear. My eyes were going to torment me no longer now.

They could not judge me in this place either, this place I have made. A secret set of chambers underneath an abandoned shack in the forest. It’s been a while since I got away from the truck. I couldn’t be questioned by anyone, if I could spend the rest of my life here.

No longer would I have to give explanations to anyone. Nor would I attempt to distance myself from them, friends, that’s what I called them. Dear people who had always been in my mind. You hide from me and I can see inside your hearts.

Your bodies are broken, they had been stolen from your homes and pushed away. Even when I returned back to the plane I have created, I see that you have stolen them.

‘Where are they? They’re not in their homes, they’re not in their houses, and I know you’re hiding them somewhere. Don’t make me look out of them.

I shall grab you and drag you, all of you. Is this what I have to look after? A future spent alone? If that is so, let me be the one who ends his memories.

Let me bring an end to everyone who’s ever come into contact with me. I am the one who’s evil, if I am scum, if that’s who I truly am, then hear me. You can look at me no longer as a friend but as an enemy. All of you, whoever you are, if you have ever done as much as crossed my mind, then know that I shall make you suffer.

It its time, then, you will live no longer in my mind, as you no longer live in the past or at all.’

With that he went bringer of extinction, breeder of violator. He would use them, repurpose them with the only hope being the destruction of everything which had been right. There was no longer an excuse for him to be human. Now he would be an infiltrator, bringer of disease and uninterest.

‘Spread, as far away as you can, like fleas, like insects, like rats, whatever you want. Together we shall bring finality to all the pain and all of which I suffered.’

The war wouldn’t be fought by men against men, no longer would there be lead, or planes which would drop any kind of bomb like that. They would bring the destruction which is fruitfully needed for the final action.

I could feel them coming. Still after me I see. Why am I followed? Why am I seen like such a disturbance? I have come to understand that reality is meant for my joy, as it would be meaningless to be called any other way. Look at yourself, you pitiful and disturbing looking creatures.

You flattered no sight, no eyes may look upon your faces without feeling disgust. They will feel some calm in this hatred, after I'm done with you we shall settle once and for all what it means to corrupt reality.'

He felt some joy in his words, as he was looking for those stoles cocoons made out of his humans. They were his. Yes, that wasn't wrong of him, he knew they were him, they belonged to him. He wanted them so much and it couldn't be that he conceived himself to wonder. What if he had taken one and eaten him.

There, the first man from the bloc. Though Malt never thought about truly interacting with anyone at all, this Barnacle was right. It annoyed him, the utmost that he would run now.

'Stop, you've spoken with me before. Why are you trying to get away now?'

'Stay away from me Malt, I know you've changed. I can still see it in your eyes. There's something wrong with you, they lack that human touch to them. You've lost everything which makes you human. You're filth now, look at yourself.

Your body changed so it could reflect how horrible you appear on the inside.'

'Don't mock me now or I shall make your punishment go slowly. as I did with Ivan, but ten fold.'

Yet he hesitated to leap at his throat. He saw something close to hair texture but it was smoldering like a never-ending falling stream which never went out of its way. Each of the hairs was trying to get away or hide the fact that they hid the extensions of the scalp. They roared and moved and tried dancing in their mad shaking state.

It felt painful to watch, this thing he had become, especially since he had been unaware that his face tried to escape. There was body nearby, in the corner before the way ahead. Malt pulled out his face and felt as if there was only the sight of some disturbing gaze, headless but with the remaining remnants of the vortex which contorted at the back of the mask to form its face.

Quickly, upon the reveal, the mass of that vortex turned into a few nastily living suckers which receeded through the neck and entered the body. Ahead of him, he lay, Barnacle, which had his head still standing.

'I want it for myself. Perhaps if I were to disguise myself, I would be safe. No one would judge me or think of what I am.

They heard me, they must've heard me, but I know I can change. If only I could pretend that I'm not myself. Yes, I could be you Barnacle, and that way I could escape from any kind of guilt I feel. No longer would I be the abusive brother, son or husband. Without you, I will have to live in my skin, and that's something which cannot be permitted.'

No longer would his attempt to escape be tolerated, for as much as it was obvious, I would arrive.

He was silent before the process had begun. It was obvious that he didn't enjoy being abused in such a manner. But he waited and spoke even now and then. A piece of his neck was already starting to shake as Malt came to desire entry into his throat. His interest made him stop bleeding. Interestingly enough, he wasn't mad about it.

Barnacle took the initiative.

'It's ironic. I've created so many animals and creatures of my own, Malt and I felt nothing about them or about taking their lives. Why do I feel something now?'

'Pain? Do you wish me to stop and take your life before I may proceed with it?'

'No, it's not that. I feel some self-pity, nothing more. I feel bad because only now I've come to realize the bad things I've made inside that room.

Malt, I think I spent a bit too much time in it as well. It's not you, I think everyone's done it for far too long.'

Looking back at it, that was obvious. What I have done would shake this man as well, even if he wasn't recognizable anymore, he could still look at this creature and see the lonely man who distanced himself then.

'I remember doing something bad. No, it had been something atrocious, even by our standards.'

That solitary room wasn't right, I always knew I had been given too much space for a reason. So I did what I knew best, I started taking everything apart and got myself acknowledged in the art of rebuilding from scratch. After proceeding to cut off the bed, I've noticed something which hid itself in there.

I do not know when I had stumbled into my room but I was aware that there was some wrongness to it. Not the scent, not the sight, not the strangeness, it was the fact that they put something for me to see.

'Barnacle.'

It said. But I knew it wasn't it. That form appeared to be there but it wasn't, I couldn't feel it by touch. That weirdo jumped in my eye but it didn't move away with each turn, only when I came to look at the side of the bed from which I took the cut. He had the appearance of a flat two dimensional twist of shadows. Four shades which looked like them twisted in every direction constantly, like some turning wheel while it spoke.

'I want you to do something. You've passed the first test now, know that we're in this together, partner.'

‘Wait a minute, I haven’t agreed to anything, I’ve barely arrived here, please, let me be. I’ll cover you and we’ll never speak to one another again.’

‘I’m afraid that will be impossible, it’s far too late for you to look away and act as if you never stumbled on me. This will be ingrained in your memory and his.’

He was somewhat intelligent and had some knowledge of the future. Had he known that he’d be taken and absorbed as well? It was something on he knew, whatever being this was.

‘This I need you to know. I wish you well, but I can’t waste my chance even if it means disregarding you as a living creature of meat. Follow my request now and see it to my order.’

I had been spoken to by him, constantly while working. There wasn’t anything less of a desire that I would’ve left him there.

‘But I have to see it for myself.’

Said Malt, though he had been aware of the danger that carried with itself, as he was in too many places at once. If one were to find one of his many apparitions, he would know how to go ahead and track the original one.

How much he had been annoyed by this, it was to no countenance and no one else to know other than him.

‘If only I could have a sight of that creature inside your bed and inside your eye. By your description alone, I think I like him.’

‘See to it that it’s that way, stay out of my mind for now and listen Malt. While I’m still alive, I’ll do my best to change you.’

‘Why? No one likes me. How many of you have come to enjoy my presence in the bloc? Or how about the outside world?’

They had all forsaken me, everyone I’ve ever known has left me once they found out who I am.’

‘I haven’t left you yet and I think I won’t be able to any longer.’

Barnacle said with a migraine like shatter of his throat. He had felt as if this cured his sense of morbidia. It wasn’t right but its effects had been inverted to the point where his death-cells started drowning his nervous system as they began shutting everything down slowly.

‘Listen to me, he wasn’t supposed to be there. I was a good man before coming to the bloc, a worker, a husband who could never give his wife children but I knew when to leave, exactly when it had been too late for me to make a change for myself.’

He had me in chains inside my head. Nothing felt right any longer, I had become less of his partner and more of a servant.'

'Talk to the machines, I want something more from them.'

'And if they resist?'

'Well make sure that they won't.'

It was difficult for a while, especially after being in there for so long and never having seen them. Those strange creatures were anything but trustworthy to me. Other denizens may have had some reason to trust them but I knew better than them.

I saw what they were hiding, especially underneath one single sloppy coat of metal-looking wax. Though they may have pretended to be androids and machines, those things were very much alive, organic as well. They knew how to hide it and manipulate people like me who watched. This sight hasn't been given to me by him, I knew it for myself. And If I knew something the others didn't that gave me an advantage over them.

'I have to exploit them, somehow, that was my only chance as a newcomer. You may not know this, but life out there isn't what it appears to be. There are things you simply don't talk about.'

And everyone knows what the alternative is.

It was no easy task this one, especially after observing them for so long. Despite their behavior being present in my mind, I had known it to be a fact that they were aware of us. Of both of us, which made it more interesting than anything I've set my mind on.

They would avoid my room every single time they walked over, not because they had eyes but they felt it, somehow. I have been observed by the tall ones, the brooders, the mothers and the other tick carriers and if there was one thing I could've noticed sooner, it was the fact that they had a way of knowing without looking.

And that may have been the only information I needed to go on. Concluding that the only way they could've known about what happened inside this place being the numbers which kept going down with the cipher, I came up with an idea. If I could manipulate the date coming up in either direction, perhaps I could be offered as many services as I could take from them.

With that alone, I had an advantage, I knew what I could do and how I may be able to work things out. For every decade went up or down, they appeared to show up at my door at different intervals, without any announcement I could ever think one. The big ones came out of nowhere and never spoke, while it was for this time alone that the android showed up out of nowhere.

‘You’re looking for something aren’t you?’

‘I am, I am, but, what are you?’

‘Delivery for you, that’s what I’m supposed to do, you’ve earned yourself something good. Anything you need as long as it’s in my power, say it and I’ll try obtaining it for you.’

‘But I’ve got nothing to give back to you, this wouldn’t be much of a trade in that case, would it?’

‘No, it’s not a trade, it’s service, always service. Trade comes later once you have something to trade with and not with I. My type only delivers, now, what do you want?’

This had to be it, he had to know what lay in my room. As the door opened past the hinges, I knew it was the right amount of space. He’d look in and not think about it for more than a second.

‘Well, what will it be then?’

‘I would like a desensitizer, one which would push forth some intensity. I want a few batteries as well and cables to connect and.’

‘Enough, I’ll see what I can bring you here. Don’t spend a second more thinking about it, we’ll work it out.’

He left afterwards, without spending one more second for another explanation.

Nothing had been right ever since. Not in that dimension, not one a planet which wasn’t oblong or which may have looked round at all. The scarcity in resources and some kind of pragmatic unity faded immediately, before any world could be put in. From outside, it looked like several flat lands pushed and jerked, contorting the planet into some giant blow which, every now and then created spherical smaller half-planets which were still connected with the structure.

Its rotation had been affected the most. Instead of being part of the planetary belt which went around the run, it circled every single one of them. Blasted things, they would destroy everything.

‘It was normal before they came. Before their arrival, this planet had a way of working, but now everything’s ruined.

The chaos spreads through every single dwelling, there’s no longer a single flying structure with blocs on it but several of them are flying around.

And look at it, we’re not even standing on a stable planet any longer. It’s a disgrace now, that it’s slowly becoming a belt surrounding the galaxy.’

‘I’m afraid, good man that it’s much worse than that. The planets had little interest to him and sooner or later he might decide that they’re unworthy of being here.’

A nasty smile went on and off. This was another blind scoundrel, the skewer, the shimmer of humanity. He was standing, barely straight, barely tall, and unable to look in any other direction than what had been previously accepted and now he looked at the coming of the pus.

‘The gas is livable, as the exposure either starts going on and off, now everyone lives in relative peace so why complain about it now? Of all the times I’ve been alive, I can’t help it but realise that I’ve grown accustomed to this living.’

‘It’s only because you don’t work. The factory has been destroyed, remember? We were supposed to be workers.’

‘No anymore, ever since I stumbled upon them, these...these strange walking metallic figures, I’ve come to the realization that it isn’t working for me. This isn’t doing it for me any longer and I almost wished there was a way out.

And look, it came. Finally, I am free to do what I desire most. I can look for whatever.’

‘Enough, listen to yourself, this isn’t your mind’s work, what man would give his life for them?’

He pointed at tall, leg-crossed breakers who shoved their far ends into the ground. On top they were preparing their tanks so their ticks may feel some quiet.

‘I am afraid to look in there. I’ve heard that they’re starting to outgrow those neurotic enchanters they have inside of them. If they are left to grow with no consideration, then we might have a problem on our hands.’

‘Well, we could always take a simple break and take something without consideration.’

Both of them had quickly been trampled afterwards. They had been too busy slacking to observe the giant repertoire of moving ticks which simply ignored them. Underneath them, lay a colored gray carpet of red splotches.

so it would be said.

‘Barnacle, you could’ve stopped a long time ago. What made you keep going?’

‘It was him. As I have said before, he’s responsible for everything I made.’

And in a short time, they had arrived with everything I have ever asked for. Every piece of the clock and string of metal rubs, without delay or alternative, in the right condition that I may begin my experiments.

‘You wouldn’t like to see my room now, Malt. It’s a disaster, let me tell you, it’s not a sight someone like you should lay eyes upon.’

My tools had been connected to at least a quarter of the wall in front of me. It stood by the shingles of the tapestry, culling the electricity from the source on top of the ceiling, as it reeked of fire and smoke. But those were good, I made use of everything there, even if it meant making a small coat of alabaster to absorb it.

But that creature which called itself Irias-lone-form waited there, in patience. He told me of what I would hallucinate of as soon as the converted smoke came out in order to be aborted into the air.

